CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.

COLOMBA

A Lyrical Drama in Four Acts, founded on Prosper Mérimée's Tale by

FRANCIS HUEFFER

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

A. C. MACKENZIE

Price, in Paper Cover, 5s.; Scarlet Cloth, 7s. 6d.

"Wherever Mr. Mackenzie may have acquired his experience, the fact that he has a firm grasp of the form and spirit of dramatic music cannot be denied by any one who has ears to hear and eyes to study a score. Neither is there a trace of the beginner's uncertainty in the purely musical part of this work. Mr. Mackenzie has a style of his own; he owes allegiance to no other composer, although he has evidently studied the recent developments of music with care and intelligence. . . . The manner in which the gentle theme of the Vocero is worked up to the passionate cry of vendetta is a real stroke of genius."—The Times.

"Colomba is without doubt the most powerful English opera of modern times."—Daily Telegraph.

"It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that no event of higher importance than the production of 'Colomba' has for years stirred the world of English music. . . . It may be said, without hesitation, that the new opera is an acquisition and an ornament to English art. . . . Any composer might have been proud of such grace, spontaneity, tunefulness, and character as are here apparent. . . . The ballet music almost deserves a separate notice, so bright, piquant and diversified are the melodies. . . . The saltarello, too, would be enough to make Mendelssohn jealous, were he alive, and allowing him a jealous disposition, contrary to his nature."—Standard.

"To sum up our impression of Mr. Mackenzie's work—it may be characterised as the production of earnest endeavour and considerable artistic acquirements, manifesting much aptitude for the realisation of dramatic effects, especially in concerted music, and a practised command of orchestral combinations and varieties."—Daily News.

"The music has a great amount of that individual character which, for want of a more perfect term, is called genius. The scoring is masterly throughout, and as the voices are treated tenderly and considerately, the pleasure of the hearer is proportionately great."—The Morning Post.

"A success at once pronounced and decisive last night awaited Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's opera 'Colomba.' From the striking orchestral Prelude (encored) to the magnificent Finale there was no diminution in the interest of an audience comprising a large number of musical professors."—Daily Chronicle.

"With regard to the music to which Mr. Mackenzie has set this interesting and picturesque story, it may be said at once that it far exceeds anything else that has been heard from his pen, both in melody and dramatic force. Hitherto there has been no English work in Mr. Rosa's répertoire which would bear comparison with the operatic productions of contemporary France or Germany; but in 'Colomba' Mr. Mackenzie has produced a work which can hold its own beside any opera of the past decade."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Colomba is a most valuable addition to the repertoire of English opera, and justifies highest anticipations of its composer's future."—Globe.

"A work of which Wagner, in his best 'Flying Dutchman' time, might have been justly proud. . . . The Overture is charming. There is not a dull scene (musically) in the whole opera, of which, as far as melody goes, the gem is certainly the 'Corsican Ballad' in the third act, prettily sung by Miss Perry as Chilina, to whom, though hers is comparatively a small part, fall the two airs to which the opera will owe its popularity, and through which it will become widely known to the concert-going and outside public."—Punch.

"Colomba is throughout full of charming tunes, some of them of a nature to haunt the ear but invariably refined, and even when most lively free from the slightest tinge of vulgarity. . . . We cordially congratulate Mr. Rosa on having added to his répertoire an opera which is an honour to English art, and we believe is likely to keep the stage, and we no less heartily compliment Mr. Mackenzie on having made another step upward on the ladder of fame, and surpassed in 'Colomba' all that he had before achieved."—Athenæum.

"It is past a doubt that Mr. Mackenzie has written the best English opera; but he has done more. He is on the road to European fame; and he possesses sufficient individuality, energy, and, at the same time, becoming modesty to enable him to press forward without precipitancy, and (health and strength permitting) to reach the goal. The success of 'Colomba' is an encouragement to English musical art; and, as time unfolds the secrets of the future, we may find that the seed now sown will 'shoot out great branches.'"—Academy.

"The Vocero is treated so as to be a lovely thing in itself; and it gives rise to a theme which is afterwards employed in the most skilful, appropriate and effective manner. From this alone it might be judged that Mr. Mackenzie had a musical sense of poetry as well as a remarkable command of orchestration."—Saturday Review.

"As to 'Colomba,' its success is altogether beyond the most sanguine expectations. On Friday evening hundreds of people were turned away from the theatre, and I was informed that the demand for seats was unprecedented in Mr. Rosa's experience as a manager."—Weekly Dispatch.

"In 'Colomba' melody, and melody of a very fascinating kind, reigns supreme. . . . In short the opera is musically no less than dramatically interesting from the opening Prelude to the final bar."—Sunday Times.

CHARLES HALLÉ'S "PRACTICAL PIANOFORTE SCHOOL."

SECTION I.—"ELEMENTARY."
SECTION II.—"EASY."

SECTION III.—"MODERATELY DIFFICULT."
SECTION IV.—"DIFFICULT."

SECTION V.—"VERY DIFFICULT."

SPECIAL NOTICE FOR THE NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION.

FORSYTH BROTHERS have great pleasure in drawing attention to the New and Enlarged Edition of Charles Hallé's "Practical Pianoforte School." A great desire having been expressed that Mr. Hallé should make Sections 1 and 2 more extended, he has added sixteen New Numbers, consisting of Airs and Melodies arranged by himself, three Pieces written expressly at his request by Stephen Heller and Ferdinand Hiller, and other favourite works. He has also enlarged and re-arranged the Pianoforte Tutor, making it the best and most useful Tutor ever published. The first three Sections have been re-engraved in the same improved style as Sections 4 and 5, making the whole work uniform, and as complete as the best engraving, printing, and paper can make it.

PREFACE TO THE NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION.

THE great success of the "Practical Pianoforte School" having made it necessary to engrave new Plates, I have taken the advantage of it to correct the few misprints which, in spite of the utmost care, had crept into the former Edition; and, in compliance with the suggestions received from many eminent Teachers, have considerably enlarged the First and Second Sections, earnestly wishing that the usefulness of the work may thereby be still further increased.

CHARLES HALLÉ.

E. PAUER'S

BIRTHDAY BOOK OF MUSICIANS AND COMPOSERS.

Cloth, gilt edges, 3s.; Leather, gilt edges, 4s.

THIS elegant little book contains upwards of 500 dates and places of the births and deaths of the most celebrated, influential, and popular Composers, Singers, Instrumentalists, Musical Historians, Archæologists, Authors, and Critics, with a short account of their lives and reference to their chief works. In the place of poetical extracts, used in the well-known Shakespeare, Tennyson, Longfellow, or Scriptural Birthday Books, more than 450 brief but highly interesting paragraphs are given, so that every day of the year may be musically associated with an unusual amount of information in a compact and agreeable form. These 450 paragraphs have been carefully selected from the biographies, letters, and essays of the most celebrated ancient and modern Musicians and Authors of England, France, Germany, and Italy, and illustrate every phase and feature of Musical Art. This little book is at once a useful and practical book of reference and a highly valuable book of information. A carefully prepared table of contents facilitates the finding of the respective dates, while its elegant appearance and convenient size especially recommend it as a useful, attractive, and acceptable gift.

CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of

LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."

SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).

PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).

MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

A system of construction which, by a careful application of scientific principles, Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have brought to great perfection, is now generally acknowledged as the only one calculated to render the Piano almost impervious to the deleterious influences of damp and extremes of temperature, while it stands better in tune with one-fourth of the usual tuning—a most important consideration where tuners are not readily obtained. The inestimable advantages thus secured are augmented by an increased power and purity of tone hitherto unattainable in the Upright Piano,

A selection from numerous testimonials will be a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the Pianos manufactured by this Firm:—

The Pianettes manufactured by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.—Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Opera.

I consider that Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. Their Pianettes are specially deserving of notice in being remarkable both for their cheapness and general excellence. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,

English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Brackley Villa, Dulwich.

I have on several occasions selected Pianos from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, and have great pleasure in stating they have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate.

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON'S Pianos may be purchased on the Hire System, and obtained of all the principal Musicsellers throughout the World.

LIFE OF MOZART

PAULINE D. TOWNSEND.

THREE VOLUMES, CLOTH,

PREFACE BY SIR GEORGE GROVE, D.C.L.

Price £1 11s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

"Mr. Grove, in his brief and able preface, calls the publication in an English dress of Otto Jahn's famous biography of Mozart 'an event in our musical history,' and his statement cannot be considered an exaggeration. . . . The English public is to be congratulated upon a translation of his monumental effort which may without exaggeration be called excellent. Miss Townsend has done her work with skill and conscientiousness, and we doubt whether a much more careful comparison with the original than we have thought it necessary to undertake would discover many, or any, serious blunders."

DAILY NEWS.

"He (Jahn) has made admirable use of Nissen, with his laborious compilation, and of all other authorities, and he has succeeded in producing a work which is complete without being confusing through excess of detail, and in which the interest of the narrative is not broken by undue reference to other writers who, treating of the same points, have treated them differently and often incorrectly. . . . The work has been well translated, and it is prefaced by a brief but interesting introduction from the pen of Mr. George Grove."

THE ATHENÆUM.

"It is with great pleasure that we are able to speak in terms of the highest praise of the manner in which Miss Townsend has acquitted herself of the by no means easy task of translation. In so voluminous a work as the present it is almost inevitable that a few slips should be found; but those that we have noted are not only extremely rare, but mostly of slight importance. . . . We have done inadequate justice in this review to one of the most important works in the whole domain of musical literature; our excuse must be the absolute impossibility of dealing fully with it within reasonable bounds. We conclude by most cordially recommending it to all who are interested in music, and need only add that the printing and general appearance of the volumes are worthy alike of their contents and of the reputation of the firm which publishes them."

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

THE College was inaugurated on the 7th ult. by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. At present it occupies the building formerly used by the National Training School for Music at Kensington, and facing the west side of the Albert Hall. The building is not adapted to large assemblies, and the ceremony, we are told in the report in the Times, from which we are about to quote further, had necessarily somewhat of a private character: "The Prince of Wales, the President and, it may be added, the founder of the institution, accompanied by the Princess of Wales and the Princes Victor and George, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, and Princess Christian, arrived about noon at the College, where their Royal Highnesses were received by the trustees, the Duke of Westminster, K.G., Lord Charles Bruce, M.P., Sir Richard Wallace, M.P., and Sir John Rose, the Director, Mr. George Grove, D.C.L., and the honorary secretary, Mr. Charles Morley, and were at once conducted to a room on the second floor, in which the ceremony was held. Among others present were the Prime Minister and Miss Gladstone, the Archbishop of Canterbury and his chaplain, the Rev. Randall Davidson, Earl Cadogan, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, Lady Folkestone, Lieutenant-General Sir Dighton Probyn, V.C., Sir Philip Cunliffe-Owen, Miss Courtenay, Sir Charles and Lady Freahe, the Lord Mayor (Mr. Alderman Knight), Sir J. Whittaker Ellis, Sir H. Thring, Sir Samuel and Lady Wilson, the Treasurers of the College, Baron Ferdinand de Rothschild and Mr. T. P. Chappell; Mr. Henry Morley, Sir Julius Benedict, Professor Macfarren, Mr. Charles Hallé, Mr. Henry Leslie, Sir George Elvey, Madame Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt, Madame Arabella Goddard, Mrs. Stirling, Mrs. Madge Kendal, Mr. Arthur Sullivan, Mus. Doc., Dr. Bridge, Dr. Stainer, Mr. Joseph Barnby, and Mr. Eaton Fanning. Mr. John Francis Barnett, Mr. Charles Godfrey, Mr. Henry Holmes, Mr. Henry Lazarus, Mr. Walter Parratt, Mus. Bac., Oxon.; Mr. C. Hubert Parry, Mus. Doc., Cantab.; Herr Ernst Pauer, Mr. C. Villiers Stanford, Mr. John Thomas, and others of the professional body of the College. The Archbishop of Canterbury offered the following special prayer: 'O God, who art the only author of order and beauty, bless, we beseech Thee, this College to the perfecting of science and skill in Thy pure gift of music; and grant that the good intent of its Founders may be so answered in the diligence and virtue of its students that both the restful delight of man and the glory of the Divine worship may be enhanced ever more and more; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.' The collect 'Prevent us, O Lord' and the Lord's Prayer closed the religious service."

At the conclusion of the ceremony the Royal party visited in turn all the class-rooms in the building, where the students and pupils were already in their places, with the professors of the various departments of instruction. So that the mechanism of the new conservatorium was set to work at once, and has already been busy for at least three weeks in a mission of a more than usually comprehensive nature; designed ultimately to collect and promote the latent musical talent not only of London and the home counties, and of the United Kingdom, but of India and the colonies and even of the United States and all English-speaking countries and nations. With these more than national and even more than Imperial objects the College commences with a subscribed fund amounting to £110,000; by the aid of which, and as a bold but wise beginning, fifty scholarships have been established. Of these, thirty-five confer a free education in music, and fifteen provide not only a free education, but also a maintenance for the scholars. Half the scholarships are held by boys and half by girls. "London, with its vast population," said the Prince of Wales in his inaugural speech, "sends only twelve out of the fifty. The remaining thirty-eight come as follows: twenty-eight from fourteen different counties in England, two from Scotland, six from Ireland, one from Wales and one from Jersey." The scholars were selected from 1,588 candidates examined by local boards. Subsequently 480 were sent up for a final examination conducted by the various professors at the College in Kensington. The result was the unanimous election of seventeen scholars for the pianoforte, thirteen for singing, eight for the violin, six for composition, two for the violoncello, one for the organ, one for the clarinet, one for the flute and one for the harp. In addition to the fifty scholars, forty-two persons have entered their names as paying students in the College. The professors chosen by the committee of directors are—for the piano, Mr. Pauer, Madame Arabella Goddard, Mr. Franklin Taylor and Mr. John Francis Barnett; for singing, Madame Lind-Goldschmidt, Mr. Deacon and Signor Visetti; for the violin, Mr. Henry Holmes and Mr. Gompertz; for the organ, Mr. Walter Parratt; for counterpoint and composition, Dr. Bridge, Mr. Villiers Stanford and Dr. Hubert Parry. "Among the professors of other instruments," said Dr. George Grove in the spoken address he presented to his Royal Highness at the opening of the College, "are the honoured names of Harper, Lazarus, Thomas and other ornaments of the English school. Declamation will be specially cared for; and for this the names of Mrs. Kendal and Mrs. Arthur Stirling—(cheers)—are sufficient guarantee." Dr. Grove took occasion to remind the Prince and the world again that the hope so long entertained that the Royal Academy of Music would join in the project—the College of Music—had "unfortunately been dissipated." This gave rise to the following letter, which appears in the Times simultaneously with and annexed to the report of the opening ceremony:—

"Sir,—Having had the privilege to be present at the opening of the Royal College of Music to-day, I cannot but believe that Mr. Grove's statement may be misinterpreted, in which he said that the hopes had been dissipated of alliance between the new institution and the Royal Academy of Music; and I feel that the fact should be made known that such dissipation has not resulted from unwillingness of the Academy direction to meet the views of his Royal Highness. In proof of this I quote an extract from the report of the present year of the Committee of Management, and shall be greatly obliged if you will give it publicity through the Times: 'Your Committee have to state that the communication to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, embodying the resolution passed at your adjourned meeting on March 25, 1882, has been acknowledged by the secretary of his Royal Highness without comment. This communication included a transcript of your reply to the invitation of the Lords of the Privy Council for remarks on the petition of his Royal Highness for a charter for a Royal College of Music in June, 1880, stating the elasticity of the charter of this institution, and offering to modify the working of the Academy in any way, according to this charter, that might meet the views of the Prince of Wales.—I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully, W. MACFARREN.—Royal Academy of Music, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square, London, May 7."

In the eloquent speech delivered by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales a far higher view was taken of the mission of the College than might have been suggested even by national musical requirements, much less local rivalries. With that genuine kindness, always the soundest basis of good taste and happy allusions, his Royal Highness expressed the deep personal gratification he felt at the manner in which the country had replied to his appeal for aid in establishing the College. The sincerity of the Prince's words may open the hearts and purses of many whose minds are not usually sensitive to the claims of mere music. We have not the slightest doubt that before long the whole sum needed to worthily accomplish the intentions of the founders of the College will be subscribed by the nation. Meanwhile, there is no object in pandering to our national failing—hypocrisy—and slurring over the fact that the £110,000 subscribed, equal to a twelve-thousandth part of the national income, or to about one-third of a farthing per head of the population, is by no means munificent or encouraging. The subscription is the result of fourteen months' whipping of the country, since the bishops, ministers, clergy of all denominations, the nobles and municipal dignitaries of the kingdom assembled in the banqueting room of St. James's Palace, and swore fealty to the designs of the Prince of Wales and his Royal brothers in regard to the establishment of a College of Music. Boxes for voluntary contributions in the streets and lanes would have produced more. There are, of course, abundant reasons for this apparent niggardliness. Some of these reasons are political, some religious, and others are only moral and even musical. But the main reason is that whilst the heart of the country is true to the project and to the Prince, the national intellectual bias is opposed to what it is pleased to consider non-essentials. We are all honourable men and lovers of music; but, to the ordinary educated Englishman, music is an abstraction until united with some essential, such as sectarian opinion, or utilised for charitable purposes, or made incarnate in a brass band ministering to the works of the flesh and of fashion. Few men know more of the world than his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. He knows thoroughly the small difficulties in the way of his musical enterprise, and he will overcome them, for they are really not serious when once we face them without circumlocution. English society is immensely ovine. When any distinguished personage—a judge, for instance—takes off his mask, the press and the well-dressed crowd quickly follow the example. The Prince of Wales has told us that amongst the successful competitors for scholarships in the new College were a mill-girl, the daughter of a bricklayer, the son of a blacksmith, and the son of a farm labourer. Each of these is, perhaps, drawn from some particular fold and will be watched by anxious shepherds who will only be partially reassured by being told, in the words of the Prince of Wales, that among the higher objects of the Royal College of Music are the discovery of latent musical ability, and the extension to those who, with natural gifts, have been blessed with little of this world's goods, of the opportunity of obtaining instruction, and joining together in the study of an art which softens asperities, inspires kindly feeling between various classes and proves that all mankind are kin—an art that, as he says, is in the best sense the most popular because, at the least expense, it provides for the happiness or pleasure of the greatest number. "The time has come," said the Prince, "when class can no longer stand aloof from class, and that man does his duty best who works most earnestly in bridging over the gulf between different classes which it is the tendency of increased wealth and increased civilisation to widen. I claim for music the merit that it has a voice which speaks in different tones, perhaps, but with equal force to the cultivated and the ignorant, to the peer and the peasant. I claim for music a variety of expression which belongs to no other art, and therefore adapts it more than any other art to produce that union of feeling which I much desire to promote."

These words are genuine, and are not the words of common liberalism or of common benevolence. They are redolent of the political philosophy of the day. In their very nonconformity we lose sight of the presence of the Archbishop of Canterbury. With the remembrance of such frankness and universal liberality on the part of the President of the Royal College of Music, it cannot possibly happen that the purse-strings of the nation will be tightened by narrow prejudices, local jealousies, provincial vanities, obsolete economic doctrine, intellectual fastidiousness or any of the smaller causes which might induce the general public to discuss the cui bono of the new institution. It is at present a question for the general public. As for the musical world, it will have ample time to mature its judgment and suggest changes after the College is in working order.

A BIRTHDAY LETTER FROM WAGNER TO HIS MOTHER.

THERE can be little doubt that the publication of the collected letters of many of our most eminent composers has been the means of enabling the public to form a more accurate estimate of the inner nature of the creators of those eloquent works which have raised music to its present high position than can be gained by a perusal of biographies which, however carefully compiled, are too often coloured with the opinions of the writers. It has been truly said of literary men that the habit of expressing themselves in studied phrases—and perhaps a vague presentiment of the possibility of anything from their pen being some day published—prevents them, even in their most confidential communications, from talking upon paper with the same freedom which they would adopt in ordinary conversation. Musical composers, however, can in no degree be influenced by such considerations; and in their letters, therefore, we find that unreserved and spontaneous reflection of the feeling of the moment which constitutes their real charm; such mental photographs, indeed, being more valuable than the purely physical ones which merely recall the features of those who by their genius have won our undying love and gratitude. It may perhaps be urged that letters never intended for the public eye should be held by those who receive them as a sacred trust; but, however this may apply to private individuals, the earnest desire of those who would wish the world to share their knowledge of the worth of the man, as well as of the genius of the artist, should be respected, and the relatives and friends of great composers, therefore, who, without betraying private confidences, will place before us some of those unstudied communications which, as we have said, reveal the true character of the writer, confer indeed a lasting benefit upon posterity.

A letter illustrating most forcibly the truth of these remarks has recently appeared in the Deutsche Rundschau, written by Richard Wagner to his mother on her last birthday; and a translation of this having been forwarded to us, we place it before our readers in proof of the power of a great composer to express the purest of human feelings as eloquently in words as in notes:—

"My dear Mother,—It is so long since I have offered you my congratulations on your birthday that I am really glad for this once to avail myself of the right day—which the pressure of business has so often in former years caused me to overlook—and to tell you how rejoiced I am that you are still spared to us—that I can still look forward to sitting with your hand in mine recalling the days when my youth was nourished and fostered by your tender care. Nothing but the consciousness of your presence among us would suffice to unite your children into a family; we, driven hither and thither by the winds of life, ever forming new ties, new interests, find our bond of union in the thought of the dear old mother who has never had a tie but that which bound her to her children. God grant that this happiness may be ours for many years to come, and may He long preserve in you so clear a mind that the only earthly joy which remains for you—the joy and sympathy in the well-being of your children—may be yours to the very end! Perplexed as I often am by the riddle of life, now urged forward, now held back, always striving after perfection, seldom attaining the success I long for, wearied and disgusted by contact with the outside world and by the contradiction of my dearest hopes, the only pleasure that never fails me is in the enjoyment of Nature. When I fling myself with bitter tears and lamentations into her arms, she consoles and strengthens me by showing me what fancied sorrows they are that oppress mankind. We lose ourselves in striving after an impossible ideal; then Nature recalls us gently back, and would fain convince us that we are her children as surely as the trees and plants which spring from seed and shoot upwards warmed by the sun and strengthened by the fresh air, to live on until they have scattered the seed which is to renew the eternal youth of all created things. If I can once grasp the idea that I, too, belong to this bountiful Nature, my thoughts are no longer centred on self, I am conscious of my fellowship with all that is good in mankind. And how can this feeling exist without bringing with it a yearning love for the mother who bore me, and who withers while I bloom? We, dear Mother, can afford to smile at the wayward mistakes and follies of human society tormenting itself to invent new theories of life which tend only to confuse, destroy, or sever the loving ties of Nature! How surely are all the trifling differences that have come between you and me dissipated by these thoughts! Turning my back on the turmoil of the city, I wander into a lovely wooded valley, stretch myself upon the mossy turf, admire the freshness of the foliage, and listen to some wood-bird's song till tears, but not of sorrow, start unbidden to my eyes. Just so I feel when, through the mass of wayward folly which clings to me, I stretch my hand to lay hold upon yours and cry 'May God preserve my dear old mother, and when it pleases Him to take her from me, may it be gently and without pain!' We need not speak of death, for do you not live on in your children a richer, fuller life than yours could ever be? Thank God that He has blessed thee in thy children! Farewell my dearest Mother. Your son, RICHARD.—Dresden, September 19, 1846."

With a recollection of the many hard things which have been said of Wagner, it is refreshing to peruse this exquisite tribute of affection, which seems to take us at once from the imperfection of the world with which he manfully battled to the perfection of the mother to whose peaceful home he was ever turning for that sympathy which he vainly sought amongst his fellow-artists. The date of the letter shows us that it was written before "Lohengrin" was finished; but the fate of the operas he had even then given to the world had, no doubt, so embittered his better nature as to force from him harsh declarations against those who had, as he thought, courted the favour of the day at the expense of the art he loved. His earnestness in the mission he had undertaken made him too exacting to be satisfied with partial concessions to his views. "We lose ourselves," he says, "in striving after an impossible ideal"; and no doubt when he made this assertion he could scarcely, even with his sanguine temperament, have believed that this "impossible ideal," to attain which had been the aim of his life, could have been rendered possible by the exertions of the minority which had at that time been converted to his theories.

We remember an enthusiast in the music of Beethoven expressing surprise that such wonderful tone-poems could emanate from a man whom he had been taught to believe was a sort of tolerated barbarian, rarely appearing amongst his fellow-men, and having but narrow sympathies with either his family or his friends. One day we found him poring over a recently published volume of Beethoven's letters, which he at once confessed had entirely changed his opinion, for he there discovered that the composer had not only sacrificed time, money, and tranquillity of mind with the hope of benefiting his brother's child, but that at his death—which was in a great measure caused by his nephew's cruel neglect—he had left him sole heir to all his effects. The many letters, too, written to his scapegrace relative had been scanned again and again by the delighted reader who had been thus converted; and especially did he draw our attention to the one concluding "Now farewell, my darling! deserve this name. Retain what money you require; anything you want shall be purchased for you when I come in. I embrace you, and hope you will be my good, studious, noble son."

Something of that impatience of restraint and defiance of existing forms was no doubt the reason why Wagner became so aggressive as to earn a character with those who knew him not which in many points resembled that of Beethoven. But it must be remembered that Wagner's personality was always before us; whilst, until lately, little was known of Beethoven save by those who, with much difficulty, had gained access to and conversed with him. This it is which makes all the admirers of the great operatic reformer anxious that no feeling of antagonism with his works shall enter into the estimate of his true character. Leaving, then, for the moment his music out of the question, let us turn to those heartfelt words penned away from the turmoil of the world, and meant for no eye but that of his mother. Her last birthday must indeed have been brightened by that "one touch of nature," which showed that the stern duty of the artist had not dulled the loving kindness of the son.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XIII.—CHERUBINI (continued from page 259).

THERE is trustworthy evidence to the effect that Cherubini made no very considerable figure in London. For example, little is said about him in the English musical history of the period. Lord Mount Edgumbe does not even mention the composer's name under this date in his well-known "Reminiscences," and Parkes, the oboist, whose chatty "Memoirs" are full of personal observations, dismisses him in a few lines. We read in the last-named work: "The Italian opera was this year (1786) acted by Signor Babini and Signora Sestini. They appeared in a new opera of Paisiello, entitled 'Il Marchese Tulipano,' under the direction of Cherubini." There is also a reference to the production of our master's serious pasticcio opera "Demetrio," in the course of which it is said: "Cherubini, who selected and composed this opera, was a scholar of Sarti; he was a young man of genius, and the overture and the duet in the third act gave promise of future greatness." Beyond these meagre words, written at a time when Cherubini had achieved the greatness promised in 1786, the gossiping Parkes has nothing to say. Dr. Burney is hardly more communicative. He styles Cherubini the "nominal composer" to the King, and devotes but very few lines to the young Italian's work in London. The whole subject, indeed, is barren, for even Mr. Bellasis, who cannot be charged with wanting a spirit of research, fills scarcely more than a page with Cherubini's doings. Fétis dismisses the same theme in a dozen lines, while the author of the article "Cherubini" in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" makes nine lines suffice. Certain facts stand out, however, with sufficient clearness. One is that Cherubini made as favourable an impression as could be looked for in the case of a young and almost unknown man. It is certain, likewise, that he was well received in the highest society. The master himself remarks in his short autobiography: "During his stay in London he had the honour of being presented to the Prince of Wales, afterwards Regent, and then King under the name of George IV. This prince was very fond of music especially vocal music. Cherubini played on several occasions with him and the Duke of Quisbourg (Queensbury?), with whom he was very well acquainted." The actual amount of work done in London by Cherubini we shall perhaps never know. No two writers bear precisely the same evidence, but it appears that beside "Demetrio," for which six numbers were written, he produced a comic opera, "La Finta Principessa," and one of serious import, "Giulio Sabini," libretto by Metastasio. This last was, according to Burney, killed by an inefficient representation, much to the chagrin of the composer.

At the close of the season of 1785 Cherubini went to Paris—a mere holiday trip, but one big with fate, as such things often are in a world where the unexpected always happens. In the autobiography we read: "Towards the end of July this year he paid a visit to Paris, where he first made the acquaintance of the celebrated Viotti, with whom he formed a close friendship and with whom he promised to come and spend the next year in that capital. It was during this visit that he was presented to Marie Antoinette, by whom he was most favourably received, and who expressed a wish to hear some of his music at the concerts which took place in the Château de Versailles." Cherubini owed what he had of royal favour at this time to the good offices of Viotti, who took the greatest interest in his gifted countryman and laid himself out to serve him. On this matter M. Pougin says:—

"Having amassed a veritable fortune on his grand European tour, he was in consequence independent and divided the pleasant and smiling existence he led in Paris between important labours in composition, the care he bestowed on his pupils, numerous mundane relations and periods of intelligent and studious leisure. When Cherubini, preceded by the great reputation he had achieved in his own country, came, to a certain extent accidentally, and made his first stay in Paris, Viotti, whose generous sentiments were equal to his admirable artistic powers, determined to know him, and welcomed him like a brother. Older by some years, already settled a considerable time in the French capital, where he possessed an immense circle of acquaintances, and well versed in the artistic life of the day, Viotti constituted himself in some sort the protector, the guide and the mentor of his compatriot, infusing into his intercourse with the latter such amenity, graciousness, and affectionate cordiality that Cherubini, touched by such conduct, soon returned sentiment for sentiment, and an almost fraternal intimacy, never afterwards to be disturbed, was thenceforth established between them." Nothing could have been more fortunate for the Italian stranger than Viotti's sympathy and support. It meant friendship in a strange land, and, more, it meant professional help. Not only did Cherubini obtain through Viotti a royal audience, but by the same means, as Pougin suspects, and we are ready to believe, he gained a hearing at the Sacred Concerts, then under the direction of Legros, once an operatic singer. At those entertainments Cherubini made his first public appearance in Paris (September 8, 1785), when a "symphony" and three airs from his pen were performed. The "symphony" was doubtless an overture, the master never having written a work of the class now specifically so called. It is of course impossible to ascertain the precise reception accorded to the master and his music, but at least one of the critics was hard upon both. Searching the files of the Mercur de France—a print very well known in connection with the Gluck-Picinni squabble—M. Pougin came on the following:—

"At the concert on the 8th inst. we heard several airs by a new Italian composer, M. Cherubini. They were a symphony and three airs. The symphony must have confirmed the opinion of those who consider that this style of writing is not that in which Italian composers distinguish themselves. The airs appeared to possess greater merit; the incoherence of the ideas and the small amount of character and interest in the motives, however, were indicative of the composer's youth."

However mortified by opinions like the foregoing, Cherubini felt that his trip to Paris had borne good fruit. Thanks to Viotti, he could number amongst his acquaintances such people as Mesdames de Polignac and de Richelieu, MM. Florian, Marmontel and Abbé Marellet; and he obtained a footing in the famous "Société Académique des Enfants d'Apollon," at one of whose concerts he first heard a symphony by Haydn, and "learned," says Arnold, in a passage every word of which we endorse, "how to combine depth with lightness, grace with power, jest with earnestness, toying with dignity."

Cherubini returned to England for the opera season of 1787, but soon after the failure of "Giulio Sabini" he quitted our country and kept a promise to Viotti by going to reside permanently with him in Paris. It must not be supposed that he retired from London in dudgeon. The opera was "strangled at its very birth," as Burney expresses it, through no fault in itself; wherefore Cherubini, though greatly vexed, discharged his duties conscientiously to the end of the season, and also had printed and published in London a set of six nocturnes.

The circumstances attendant upon our master's return to Paris may be gathered from his autobiography, in which we read: "He was again presented to Queen Marie Antoinette, who received him with as much kindness as ever, and admitted him to the private concerts she gave in the Château de Versailles, at the Princess de Polignac's, where she sang, and where pieces of Cherubini's, rendered by the celebrated Garat, were among the compositions performed. At this period, too, Viotti urged him to undertake a French opera, and for this purpose made him acquainted with Marmontel, who intrusted him with the book of 'Démophon,' which he began to set." The master's next effort, however, was destined to be made in the land of his birth and in the capital of the Sardinian kingdom. For fifteen months he remained in Paris, doing nothing of which trace is left, except write a cantata, "Amphion," for the Olympic Lodge, and set music to eighteen romances from Florian's "Estelle." That otherwise he was not, strictly speaking, idle, may be assumed in the case of a man who left behind him so many proofs of industry. Perhaps he devoted himself to the study and meditation which must at some time or other have preceded the remarkable development his genius soon after underwent. But, however this may be, we know that he made good his footing within the charmed circle of Parisian artistic and social life. Miel states, in his "Notice Historique sur J. B. Viotti," that he assisted at the matinées given every Sunday by the great violinist in the apartments common to them both, while his favourite pupil, Halévy, tells us, in the interesting "Études sur la vie et les travaux de Cherubini:"—"People's saloons were thrown open to him, and he was admitted to all the sweet delights of high Parisian life. . . . It was a happy time for him, because he felt greatly flattered at this success. He was then eight-and-twenty. A portrait, painted somewhere about this time by Mdlle. Dumont and preserved in his family, represents him as elegant, neat, endowed with a noble and expressive physiognomy and a persuasive look. The world liked him and he liked the world. He was for a moment the fashion, and became a 'lion.' He used to speak with pleasure of this period of his life, and retained an agreeable recollection of all the delicate marks of respect and all the little attentions then paid him." It is, perhaps, hardly to be wondered at that the master sat at his desk very seldom under conditions so fascinating to a still youthful man.

The time came, however, when he had to fulfil an engagement made in 1784 to write an opera for the Turin season of 1787-8. To this end all the dear delights of Paris were given up, and in October Cherubini set out for the Sardinian capital, where he wrote his "Ifigenia in Aulide," and produced it during the month of February following. The new opera was received in a manner extremely gratifying, despite the fact that it paid scant heed to the traditions of the Italian stage. A propos M. Pougin has discovered, in the Calendrier Musical for 1789, a letter addressed to the editors, in which some interesting details of this event are given. Subjoined is an extract therefrom:—

"At a moment when admirers of the lyric stage are regretting Gluck and Sacchini, it is consoling to announce another artist, who, though still very young, is even now producing the fruit of the ripest talent. This artist, already known by several successes in Italy, is M. Cherubini. He has just brought out at Turin an 'Ifigenia in Aulide,' which owes its extraordinarily flattering reception principally to the composer's efforts thoroughly to ally the musical effect to the sense of the words, a plan almost unknown in Italy, and interesting for our stage, to which M. Cherubini intends to devote himself. The music of the new 'Iphigenia' is, so they write from Italy, in a style quite new to this country; now sublime, now tender, but invariably energetic and attractive, it produced almost unheard-of effects. The Court even could not resist the general enthusiasm. Our princes, who do not usually applaud performances, applauded a great deal, such is the power of superior merit to extort imperiously tributes of praise."

It is curious to read here of a movement towards greater dramatic truth, when the present struggle, fought on the same ground, appears to indicate that it has only just begun. But between the reforms set on foot by Cherubini a hundred years ago and those now advocated in the name of progress, there is a difference indeed. It may be interesting to cite the opinion of Halévy with regard to the work in which Cherubini made his first step on an independent course. The French composer says in the "Étude" already spoken of:—

"This opera differs in style from Cherubini's preceding operas. It is already more nervous. We see springing up in it a certain freshness and vitality of which Italian musicians of his time were ignorant, or for which they did not care. It was the dawn of a new day; Cherubini was preparing for the struggle. Gluck had accustomed France to the sublime energy of his masterpieces; Mozart had just written in Germany 'Le Nozze di Figaro' and 'Don Giovanni.' It would not do to be left behind; it would not do to be beaten; in the lists he was about to enter he would meet two giants. Like an athlete before descending into the arena, he anointed his limbs; like a warrior about to engage in combat, he girded up his loins."

The struggle, however, was not to take place on the Italian stage, but in the great arena which witnessed Gluck's triumphs. With "Ifigenia in Aulide" Cherubini took leave of his native country. He wrote no more Italian operas, and when he crossed the Italian frontier on his way back to Paris he bade the "land of song" a final farewell. Thenceforth he was a Frenchman. Halévy, from whose rhetoric we have just quoted, credits Cherubini with a presentiment of eternal separation from his native country, and fancies that the well-known trio in "Ifigenia" is the expression of a natural sorrow. He remarks:—"Perhaps in this noble and sweet piece of inspiration he was addressing a last farewell to his country, which he was about to leave, and leave for ever, since, despite the desire and wish I have frequently heard him express, it was never his lot to set Italy again. Perhaps he felt remorse on the eve of adopting another land as his own. At the moment of consummating a voluntary exile, and of abandoning the country of his birth, perhaps a secret instinct, one of those voices that never deceive, warned him that the separation would be eternal; that he would not behold Florence, or the beloved family he left there, any more. A mournful reminiscence must have been awakened in his heart. It seems as though the beautiful trio, which it is impossible to hear without emotion, was the echo of this profound regret."

The foregoing is no doubt pretty sentiment and may have a basis of fact. On the other hand, it is very likely that Cherubini anticipated the future as little as any of us, and had no more idea of saying to Italy "Good-bye for ever" than had Robinson Crusoe of a prolonged absence from England when he dropped down the river on his memorable voyage.

Serious work awaited Cherubini in Paris, whither he returned in March, 1788, only a few days after the production of "Ifigenia." Some time previous, the Opéra had accepted a lyric drama from Vogel—at that time a popular writer—on the subject of Démophon. The book, according to Pougin—Fétis tells quite a different story, which need not be credited—was written by Desriau, and the artistic world generally believed that Vogel had finished his part of the task before death overtook him. It is certain, at any rate, that the overture was several times performed in public with brilliant success.

Naturally the public looked for the work, and were somewhat annoyed when it appeared that Marmontel and Cherubini were engaged upon the same subject, with every prospect of having their labours preferred to those of Desriaux and the departed Vogel. A fatal prejudice very nearly arose on this score, nor were matters improved by the fact that Marmontel, a hot partisan of Picinni in the late war, had many opponents only too ready to serve him an evil turn. However, Cherubini's "Démophon" went over the head of Vogel's, and was produced September 5, 1788. As to the effect it made, contemporary evidence is not altogether of one mind; still, reading between the lines in certain cases, it is possible to get at the facts. The Mercur de France, a friendly witness, declared in a first notice "Démophon" was very successful from beginning to end. In our next number we will go more into details concerning the very numerous beauties to be found in the poem and in the music." Later, the same journal remarked, "The score has now been judged by its true value, and the composer has reason to feel satisfied with the opinion thus formed—namely, that it was impossible for any one so young and with such a slight knowledge of our stage to begin more brilliantly, and that the work proves he possesses everything requisite to do still better." Then came a number of qualifying criticisms, put with the skill of a practised journalist when he desires to justify his own perspicacity without hurting a composer's feelings. These we need not quote, one fact being more eloquent than many words—the fact that "Démophon" was performed only eight times and then withdrawn.

Fétis, who is more trustworthy as a critic than historian, takes pains to set forth the reasons why "Démophon" so soon broke down, and lays much stress upon Cherubini's sudden plunge into the difficulties of a new stage and a strange language. He writes:—

"The score furnishes a curious subject of historical study, if compared with 'Ifigenia,' which Cherubini wrote in Turin at the beginning of the same year. In the latter score melody abounds, and, among several numbers full of charm, we remark a trio of the greatest beauty. 'Démophon,' on the contrary, offers us only aridity in the cantilenas, vague motives, numerous defects in the rhythm and symmetry of the phrases, and, what is worse than all, languishing monotony in the general colour of the work. Even the harmony has nothing distinguished about it, and it is difficult to recognise in this feeble production the hand of a man who soon afterwards justly caused himself to be considered a great master. Whence could arise the embarrassment which thus oppressed his genius?"

Fétis answers this question by reference to the novelty of the composer's position, and also by indicating the character of Marmontel's "pretended and detestable lyric verses." He says: "Poor Cherubini did not know what to do with these verses of all sizes, which sometimes compelled him to make his phrase five bars, and sometimes allowed him only two, or forced him to augment the value of the musical tempi, so as to make two bars out of one. The composition of this opera must have been a long torture to him." Let us add here the words of Halévy: "I regret that Cherubini, on arriving in Paris, should have fallen into the hands of Morellet and Marmontel. . . . That had occurred to Cherubini which happens to a traveller who, thrown into the heart of a great city with which he is not acquainted, asks his way from great lords and the like—men only accustomed to go out in carriages. With the best faith in the world, they give him false directions and lead him astray. An honest bourgeois who plods the streets on foot would be worth a hundred times as much." On this matter of Marmontel's work we have no desire to challenge the evidence; but, bad as his verses may have been, they did not alone bring about failure. No opera with really good music in it was ever ruined by a poor libretto. The power of the composer, armed with all the potent means of an irresistible art, conceals the weakness of the poet; and in the case of "Démophon" we are bound to conclude that Cherubini had not familiarised himself with the highly dramatic French school into which he abruptly passed from the pure melodiousness of Italy. According to some eminent critics the change, though abrupt, was not complete enough for success, Cherubini taking into his new style not a few traditions from the old, and thus producing a composite work adapted to please neither Italians on the one hand nor French on the other. M. Pougin is of this opinion, and writes: ". . . despite himself the old Adam sometimes reappeared, and was seen sacrificing, almost without suspecting it, to the gods of his early years. Hence certain discrepancies and an inevitable inequality in the entirety, as such, of his work, which appeared somewhat composite, and in which on account of too great an amount of reflection the inspiration lacked abundance and spontaneity." Years ago, in his work on the Académie Impériale de Musique, Castil-Blaze expressed the same idea: "'Démophon' marks the epoch when the musician changed his style. The author has not yet any settled system; the beginner navigates his bark between Gluck and Picinni. His airs, graceful and tender in expression, belong to the Italian manner, which he abandons directly a strong situation arises."

The failure of "Démophon" seems to have invested Cherubini's position in Paris with a measure of uncertainty. It was more than an artistic rebuff, since it entailed pecuniary loss. The master himself bears witness to this in an autographic note written late in life: "I first supported myself (at Paris) on what I earned at London, but that was not much, and then on the trifle for which I agreed to write an opera in 1787 at Turin. On coming back to Viotti's in Paris I composed 'Démophon,' which was played at the Grand Opéra in December (?), 1788. This work gave me author's rights, but they did not bring in much seeing that it was performed only eight times, and that even the little I made was swallowed up by what I had to expend for having unluckily taken it into my head to have the opera engraved at my own cost." His impecunious circumstances were not much relieved, we may suppose, by the writing of a cantata, "Circé" for one of the Olympian Lodge concerts, though he may have felt honoured on hearing it sung by Rousseau. Happily light soon broke through the dark clouds and Cherubini found place and pay.

The circumstances attendant upon this change in Cherubini's position are fully set forth by M. Pougin, according to whom there were in Paris, just before the Revolution broke out, only nine real theatres open to the public, and three of these—the Opéra, the Comédie-Française and the Comédie-Italienne—were almost reserved for aristocratic, artistic and literary society. The time was fully ripe for enterprise in drama, and, as usual, with the hour came the man, who, strangely enough, stepped out of Marie Antoinette's tiring-room, in the person of her hairdresser, Léonard. This individual had a soul above the curling-tongs, and a vision that took in more than the pomade-pot. Seeing his opportunity, and justly measuring the advantage given him by nearness to the royal ear, he availed himself of both so well that a patent from Louis XVI. soon empowered him to open a new theatre in Paris, devoted equally to Italian opera, French opera and comedy, and to be called the "Théâtre de Monsieur," after the distinctive title of the Count de Provence, his Majesty's brother. Léonard lost no time in forming a partnership with Viotti, who knew better than a hairdresser what to do with a theatre, and who had such confidence in the venture that he risked upon it all his fortune. Others being confident likewise, a joint-stock company was formed, a lease of the theatre in the Tuileries—where "Monsieur" dwelt—obtained for thirty years, and a company of artists got together by Viotti himself, who brought from Italy what has been called "the most admirable troupe that had ever appeared in France." Few operatic enterprises ever started so well. M. Pougin gives the names of the chief performers, and a magnificent list it is; while in the roll-call of the band we see Rode, Baillet, Hugo, Duvernoy, Schmerza, Othon and others scarcely less famous. As a matter of course, Viotti found a post for his dear friend Cherubini, who, we are told, was "intrusted with the highest direction of musical matters, as well as with the mission of watching over the studies of the artists; of undertaking the modifications it might be deemed useful to make in the Italian works produced; and, lastly, of composing the new numbers thought necessary to be interpolated." The enterprise in which our master was thus honourably employed launched itself before the world on January 26, 1789, when Tritta's opera "Le Vicende Amorosa" was performed.

MUSICAL DIRECTORIES AND MUSICAL AMATEURS.

A PAPER on the Compilation of Musical Directories, read a short time ago before the Liverpool Society of Professional Musicians, and subsequently published with various criticisms as a pamphlet, and circulated in this form among the members of the musical profession, deals at some length with the injury likely to be done to teachers of music by the insertion in the directory of the names of persons not altogether bond fide professional teachers of music. But, since it is clearly open to any one who may happen to have engaged a teacher of music to dismiss him if he prove incompetent, it would appear that the only persons really injured by the directory are the publishers of music from whom compositions may be, and are, thus obtained, by persons not entitled to it, at the professional rate.

The evil complained of by the author of the paper alluded to has already been described as one more easy to acknowledge than to remedy. We scarcely think that a publisher will be found sufficiently enterprising to compile and publish at his own expense a directory containing none but the names of those who have passed a certain standard, erected for the purpose, of musical examination; should such a one be found, however, the test to be applied and the individual to apply it would, to say the least, afford matter for interesting discussion. In the case of the other remedy which appears to have been suggested—namely, the compilation by the Liverpool Society itself of a directory containing such names only as had satisfactorily passed a scrutiny of their own—the result might, and probably would, be estimated in proportion to the value set on the discriminating powers of the Society.

It has been said that the clerical, legal and medical professions afford instances of what should be in the musical. This, we do not hesitate to say, is a mistake. Between the clerical and the musical professions there can be no analogy in this matter of registration: either a man is in holy orders or he is not; the barrier between priest and layman which is raised by a third party has no parallel in the art of music. Nor are the legal or medical professions altogether happy examples; certainly a directory compiled on such principles would be an impossibility till the passing of the proposed but doubtfully desirable Registration Act. Each of these three professions that we have named is, it must be remembered, a profession, while music is an art, and herein lies the reason of the dissimilarity. We are not aware of the existence of a directory of, say, painters, or sculptors, or poets, or actors, constructed on the examination-for-admission principle, and the obvious reasons which render such a work almost impracticable would not be strained were they applied to music.

Again, were the institution of an examination of this sort a fait accompli would it, as in the legal and medical professions, require a knowledge of all the various branches of the subject? Surely it were unreasonable to require a bassoon professor to be a satisfactory organ-player, or an organist an accomplished tympanist, or that either should of necessity be erudite musical historians? Or, on the other hand, would it be matter for great surprise were a successful teacher of the pianoforte to prove anything but a skilful contrapuntist, or a profound contrapuntist anything but a great composer? These are the reasons that render registration a matter of difficulty as well as of doubtful desirability, and these are the reasons why there is scarcely more analogy between the legal or medical professions and the musical than between the musical and the clerical. Further, were an examination established the passing of which would alone confer, say, the title of musician, is there anything to prevent a person who either possesses or chooses to acquire the requisite knowledge but who does not make music a profession or means of livelihood, from entering for and passing such an examination? Is it not a fact that many persons who do not look to music for their daily subsistence are nevertheless the possessors of a musical degree from one of our universities, and are therefore, on the test system, fully entitled to a place in the Musical Directories and the advantages attendant thereon, although as bond fide professionals they may have even less right thereto than the gentleman who boasts but one week's acquaintance with the German flute? Moreover, while a teacher of music may be not one whit the less a bond fide teacher and a competent one to boot, albeit his or her name is not to be found in the pages of a directory (a glance at once reveals to us the absence of several such names), does it, on the other hand, at all follow that the mere fact of a person having chosen music as a means of existence, and thereby being "professional," and entitled to a place in the pages of the directory, is in itself any guarantee of competency as either a performer or a teacher? Is it not, we would ask, an unfortunate fact that many a professional musician is inferior, both in knowledge and accomplishment, to many a so-called amateur?

This leads us to the most important reflection suggested by our theme—a reflection but for which we had probably not put pen to paper on the subject at all. It is this: Why is there, why should there be, the lurking feeling of dislike, of hostility to amateurs (using the term in its highest and truest sense) that in many quarters there undoubtedly is? Why should the rank of amateur which, strictly speaking, has included not only Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Flotow, but, a name of which all Englishmen may well be proud—Robert Lucas de Pearsall—be provocative of feelings of malice and all uncharitableness, only a fraction of which find vent in complaint at their being able to obtain music on professional terms? Would any musical directory have been rendered more perfect by the omission of such names as those we have just named? Is not the answer to be found in this, that many, many amateurs eclipse and outshine on their own ground many professional musicians, not only by superior talent and skill, and accomplishments, but by superior general culture and social qualifications? Is it by any means an unusual thing to meet with a skilful professional musician who is incapable of mixing on terms of social equality with those with whom he is by his profession constantly brought into contact? Let any one, for instance, inquire for himself from an authentic source, and ascertain what was the real, the primary reason that for years led up to, and at last resulted in the establishment of what is commonly known as the Arts Test—that is, the necessity to matriculate—being imposed on all those who seek a degree in music in either of our Universities. The professional musician who may happen to find himself supplanted by or brought into unfavourable contact with the so-called amateur must first seek at home for the cause of the mischief, and must by paying more attention to general culture, to social qualifications, and to the means of improving both, effect in himself the remedy he desires.

These are reflections which cannot but be present to unbiassed minds, and these are reflections also which, in anything but a hostile spirit, we offer for the serious consideration of professional men; they assuredly will, if properly regarded and acted upon, be found to effect much more for the well-being and advancement of the profession than would the mere compulsory elimination of the names of more or less incompetent persons from any number of musical directories.

WE cannot of course know whether the opera-going public of the United States is deeply interested in all the opinions of the prime donne who are now such frequent visitors in the principal cities of the American continent; but certainly, judging from the constantly reported conversations with these "Queens of Song" in the local musical press, we should imagine that they are gradually assuming a sovereignty over the entire realms of the art. The established custom of "interviewing" a celebrated vocalist—generally commencing before she has set her foot on shore—is usually carried on so vigorously wherever she will condescend to receive an accredited correspondent of a journal that not only are all her artistic intentions in the future duly chronicled, but her estimate of the capabilities of other singers with whom she has been associated are as faithfully echoed as if they were of the utmost importance to all interested in the healthy progress of the lyrical drama. "Why is it," said Madame Patti to an interviewer, "that I am reported as predicting a failure for Mr. Abbey's opera-house? Why, I wouldn't say such a thing any way, for I know Madame Nilsson very well, and it would certainly be very unkind of me to predict a failure for her in her performances in the new opera-house next season." "I have always had faith in the music-loving public of Boston," says Madame Albani, "but since singing there on Saturday last I am inclined to disbelieve in their appreciation of music." Under the heading "Madame Theo happy, but shivering," we are told by one who interviewed the singer in the cabin of the vessel which had just arrived at the pier that she remarked, "Oh, it's so nice to go away for a little time to come back and find your friends are so fond of you"; and that in reply to the earnest question, "What was the difficulty with Capoul at Havana?" she said, "Well, now, I can't tell you; really I don't know." No doubt these are all excellent gratuitous advertisements; but are they of the slightest importance save to those who issue them?

"AN Italian Ecclesiastic," says an American writer, "who once confessed to me his astonishment at the rich, powerful voices and fine concerted singing of the English labouring classes whom he heard in the fields and the streets, attributed it to the fact of their hearing fine military bands and good church chanting all over the island." We cannot but express our astonishment that this "Italian Ecclesiastic" should have constantly heard such good concerted singing amongst the labourers in the fields and streets; and still more are we surprised that he should have imagined this musical culture to have been owing to the "fine military bands and church chanting all over the island," for assuredly few country labouring men have the opportunity of hearing a military band at all, and in many of the rural districts much of the church chanting is hardly of a very high order. That there is a good time coming, however, is proved by the fact of the support accorded to the "Park Band Society," the Prince of Wales being not only a contributor to its funds but a member of the committee. The Society, it is stated, now supplies Victoria Park, West Ham Park and Hyde Park with music during the present summer; and we may confidently anticipate that in a short time this movement will not be confined to the metropolis. Street-music has had its day; and now that London has set the fashion of giving open-air concerts in appointed places at appointed times, itinerant musicians will find their occupation gone, and must either emigrate to a country where organised bands do not exist or find some profitable employment at home which tends rather to benefit than to annoy their fellow-creatures. There may soon be sufficient reasons for the opinion expressed by the "Italian Ecclesiastic"; but bands have yet to be formed where they can be heard by all classes, and we have still something to do in improving our "church chanting."

When a well-known dramatist of the sensational school was once passing a hoarding whereon was displayed the representation of an exciting scene from one of his melodramas, with the words "Every evening" in staring letters printed over it, he is said to have exclaimed to a friend with whom he was walking, "Now that's what I call popularity." Unquestionably he was right; but then it might be said by authors of a higher class that it is not exactly the kind of "popularity" which they would desire. With equal truth it may be asserted that, although all artists would wish that a knowledge of music should spread amongst the people, they cannot but feel a shock when they have a "Vocal Waltz" forwarded to them by a grocer (signed by a composer who is known for better things), the title and words of which are in praise of the proprietor's "beautiful tea." On the title-page of this effusion (which we have recently received) is a well-executed illustration representing a young lady singing and playing at the pianoforte, whilst several couples are waltzing in the background; and, strangely enough, in the midst of the dancers a lady and gentleman are seated drinking tea, at the imminent risk of having the cups dashed from their hands by the impetuous waltzers. The chorus of this piece (appropriately marked "ad lib.") is written, not in unison, as might be imagined, but in four parts, so that those who intend to advertise this "beautiful tea" in the drawing-room must rehearse the music before taking their partners. Whatever may be said of this degradation of the art for the furtherance of commercial enterprise, there can be little doubt that the idea is growing; and now that culinary compositions are gradually creeping into our houses, we must not be astonished if in a short time we hear our servants not only shouting out a chorus in admiration of somebody's tea, but footing it vigorously to the inspiring strains of the "Egg Polka."

A CONTEMPORARY devoted to the protection of tradesmen from fraudulent customers had, some short time since, an article cautioning the public against persons who are almost daily advertising a pianoforte of inferior quality as "by one of the best makers, and having all the recent improvements." This extraordinary bargain is sometimes to be disposed of immediately, because its owner is "about to quit the country," but more often "in consequence of the sudden widowed condition of its possessor." It is a curious fact that this distressed widow is constantly moving, and always has a pianoforte of the same class at her new address; so that we may imagine her deceased husband was a manufacturer of these instruments, and that she is selling off his stock by degrees. The writer of the article alluded to quotes the assertion of an intelligent tuner, who says that "on an average twelve pianos, at least, out of twenty are utter rubbish, and that only about one in twenty is really satisfactory in quality of tone and mechanism, and in capability of standing in tune." Of course this is the result of "bargain-hunting," the experience of this witness being especially derived from his daily business intercourse with persons in the habit of attending auctions or salerooms. We should be glad, indeed, if we could help the good cause by earnestly advising all purchasers of pianofortes who do not deal directly with the makers to seek advice on the matter from really competent judges. The safety of the knave is usually secured by the ignorance of the dupe; and that ignorance upon the real worth of so complicated an instrument as a pianoforte is widely spread can scarcely be doubted. If proof were wanted, let us mention a case which we have lately heard, where a dealer—half, we believe, in jest—announced one of his pianofortes to a lady as being "jewelled in four holes," a fact which materially enhanced its value to the purchaser, who at once ordered the instrument to be sent home.

ALTHOUGH the titles earned before the public by English composers are those of which they have a right to feel the highest sense of satisfaction, the recognition of such distinctions by Royalty should be considered by all thus honoured as conferring a national stamp upon their position in the country where they have worked and won their fame. In this light we record with pleasure that at the opening of the Royal College of Music it was announced that the degree of Knighthood would be bestowed upon Professor Macfarren and Mr. Arthur Sullivan. On their claims to this honour we need not here enlarge, for their works are too well known and too widely appreciated to render it necessary in an art-journal to do more than briefly call attention to the event, with an expression of extreme gratification that two such representative men have been selected as recipients of the Royal favour. We have also to announce, with equal pleasure, the Knighthood, at the same time, of Dr. George Grove, whose services to music and to the literature of the art have been invaluable. For many years he has been an earnest worker in the subject which he has at heart; and now, as Director of the Royal College of Music, he is worthily chosen to receive the reward of his toil in the cause by a title which shows how thoroughly such labours are estimated by her Majesty. To all three of the new Knights, then, let us tender our sincere congratulations; for by their recently acquired honours they have not only raised themselves, but the art which they have so long and so faithfully served.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE short season of twelve weeks, which commenced at this establishment on the 1st ult., is, we presume, considered by the lessee to be sufficient for the requirements of the aristocratic supporters of Italian opera who are content to hear their favourite prime donne go through the round of their favourite characters, effectively or ineffectively supported by any singers who may happen to be available at the time. In pursuance of this plan the system has been adopted of placing the name of the vocal heroine of the evening at the head of the bill, so that persons purchasing tickets may know that the artist, and not the work, is to be considered the attraction. It is scarcely, therefore, necessary to say that the duty of the critic is now confined to judging the qualifications of any new singers who may be presented during the season; for certainly it would be wasting valuable space in a journal to chronicle the repetitions of Operas which for years have been the accepted vehicles for the exhibition of our recognised Queens of Song. On the opening night Verdi's "Aida" introduced a débutant in the part of Radames, Signor Marconi, who, although coming with a high reputation from Italy, can hardly be considered capable of sustaining a permanent place as first tenor. His voice is somewhat unsympathetic in quality, but in declamatory passages he is heard to great advantage as Lionello in "Marta," Faust, in Gounod's Opera, and Arturo in "I Puritani." Although the want of tenderness of expression was sensibly felt, he sang many portions of these works extremely well, and received deserved applause. The great effect of the season has undoubtedly been made by the baritone M. Devoyod, as Neluko in Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine." The new-comer possesses an exceptionally fine voice, which he uses with the utmost skill. His acting of the part, too, was marked with intelligence and sound judgment throughout; and the warmth of his reception sufficiently proved the firm hold he had taken of an audience not usually over demonstrative. In the arduous part of the Fester in "Rigoletto," and the comparatively small character of Valentino in Gounod's "Faust," he also fully evidenced his high artistic qualities, and thoroughly established his position. The first appearance of Signor Battistini as Riccardo in "I Puritani" was fairly successful. He has an agreeable baritone voice, and acts well. Signor Ravelli, who is already favourably known as a member of the company at Her Majesty's Theatre, made a good first appearance at this establishment as Edgardo, in "Lucia," and afterwards sang the part of the Duke in "Rigoletto" with much success. The production of "Carmen," with Madame Pauline Lucca in the title-rôle, and of Boito's "Mefistofele" must be mentioned as two of the important features of the season; but the only novelty—Ponchielli's "Gioconda"—is announced for the 31st ult., too late for notice in our present number. Madame Albani and Madame Sembrich have been greeted warmly in their well-known characters, both vocalists returning to us with even renewed powers. The interior of the house, it must be mentioned, has undergone many changes, chiefly with a view to the safety of the public in case of any alarm; and the restoration of "Fops' Alley" may be pronounced a decided improvement. The Conductors during the month have been Signor Bevgnani and M. Dupont.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

MR. THOMAS WINGHAM's Symphony in D (No. 4), given at the last Concert in April, must not be passed over without a word of recognition due to its serious aim and clever workmanship. Being the latest symphonic essay of its author, it may also without hesitation be called his maturest and most original achievement in that branch of composition. Originality at any price seems indeed to have been Mr. Wingham's guiding motive in designing his Symphony in D. Not that he in any sense deviates from the rules of classical form, which his early training has made a second nature to him; but within that form he gives free play to his imagination—with different results in the different movements. Two of those movements, the first Allegro and the Scherzo, which takes the form of a minuet, are charming, while the Andante, founded upon a theme of a light, operatic type, and the Finale, boisterous rather than "majestic," leave much to be desired as regards both invention and thematic development. But, in spite of these inequalities of workmanship, the general impression of Mr. Wingham's Symphony is decidedly favourable, and gives rise to expectations of further progress. At the same Concert M. de Pachmann gave a truly masterly rendering of Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, and Miss Mary Lemmens made a favourable impression in Handel's "Lascia ch' io pianga" and a ballad from M. Delibes's "Jean de Nivelle." The first Concert in May was memorable by an interesting revival, if the production of Schubert's fragmentary Symphony in E, finished from the MS. sketch by Mr. John Francis Barnett, can be thus described. The work bears the date of 1821, and therefore belongs to a comparatively early period of the master's career. The influence of Mozart is indeed very obvious, especially in the first movement and again in the Scherzo. But in the Andante there is a beautiful melody conceived and scored in the genuine Schubertian vein, and the Finale—perhaps the most important movement of the four—is of considerable dimensions, and well worked out. Mr. Barnett's treatment of the meagre and in parts scarcely recognisable sketch cannot be praised sufficiently. As the artists of the Renaissance used to reconstruct antique statues from a torso, or perhaps a head and arms, so Mr. Barnett has followed Schubert's indications with skill and care, taking his suggestions from a stray accompanying figure here or a detached chord there, and producing a work which recalls the style of the great master in every bar and in every instrument. His own artistic individuality not being very strongly pronounced, he found it perhaps the less difficult to assume that of Schubert for the nonce. A composer more fit for the task could not have been found. We may add that the manuscript of the Symphony is in the possession of Sir George Grove, and throws an interesting light on Schubert's mode of workmanship. Of the Concert given on the 12th ult. it will be sufficient to mention Dvořák's interesting and well-written Concerto-overture "Mein Heim," played for the first time in England. The annual performance of the Ninth Symphony, with Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Orridge, Mr. Harper Kearton and Mr. King in the solo quartet, took place on the same occasion.

We now come to the great event of the season—the first performance in this country of Berlioz' "Messe des Morts," looked forward to with much interest not unminged with anxiety by musicians and amateurs. As it turned out, that anxiety was too well founded. The production of Berlioz' gigantic work with such materials as were at his disposal was on Mr. Manns's part decidedly a case of "vaulting ambition that o'erleaps itself." The Crystal Palace choir as every one knows is not the strong side of the Crystal Palace Concerts; neither the intonation nor the sonorosity of the voices is above suspicion, to say nothing of the refinements of expression which can be thought of only when perfect accuracy has become a matter of course. To attempt Berlioz' music with such a body of singers, and to attempt it without a single rehearsal in conjunction with the orchestra, was a proceeding for which it is difficult to find a parliamentary expression. The result was such as might have been expected. It is true that absolute disaster was avoided, but the singing throughout was coarse, and the intonation, especially in the tenors, faulty to a painful degree. The accompaniments, on the other hand, were well rendered, and showed that Mr. Manns as an orchestral director had done his part with his accustomed zeal and intelligence. But here also circumstances beyond his control had proved too much for the excellent Conductor. Berlioz' orchestra in this work assumes monstrous proportions. There are indeed, to speak correctly, five different orchestras, the principal one, consisting of over a hundred performers, and four separate brass bands used chiefly to emphasise the "Tuba mirum spargens sonum." The effect intended by Berlioz here is of a distinctly scenic not to say theatrical nature. The brass bands were at the first performance in the chapel of the Invalides placed in different parts of the enormous building, and answering each other from a distance conveyed the idea of the angel's trumpet being re-echoed from east to west, from south to north. At the Crystal Palace, where all the performers were crammed together on the same platform, the poetic meaning of this terrific noise was, of course, entirely lost. It appears to us that Berlioz (in his Mémoires), and his admirers and enemies after him, have laid too much stress on the colossal orchestra employed in the Requiem. Leaving these merely external features aside and looking at the music itself it appears extremely simple in structure. The choral writing, although for six parts, is much less complicated, for example, than that in "Romeo and Juliet," and the formal structure of the piece shows no bold innovation of any kind. Like all other Catholic composers, Berlioz takes his musical suggestions from the Roman liturgy and the old Church tones are introduced more than once—e.g., in the Canto Fermo of the "Dies Iræ," which stands, as the analytical programme remarks, in the Hypo-Dorian mode—i.e., A minor, with G natural instead of G sharp. The Requiem might be fitly divided into three different portions, the religious, the dramatic, and the lyrical. By religious we mean orthodox rather than individually fervid. The Introit, for example, and, again, the Hostias et Preces do not essentially differ from the typical settings of these words by other Church composers. They are essentially orthodox as far as Berlioz could be orthodox. In the "Dies Iræ," on the contrary, Berlioz gives full rein to his imagination. Here everything is intensely dramatic, from the terrific clash of the "Tuba mirum" to the subdued passion of the "Salva me, Fons pietatis." The lyrical element, on the other hand, reigns supreme in the "Sanctus," where the tenor solo (admirably sung by Mr. Harper Kearton) is identified with a melody of suavest beauty. Even the short fugue which alternates with that melody gives additional charm to it. We cannot for the present attempt to give a detailed analysis of Berlioz' composition, which would require ample musical illustration. The performance at the Crystal Palace, moreover, cannot in any sense be called final. It was an attempt rather than an achievement. We hope soon to have an opportunity of returning to the subject. The supineness and pusillanimity of our great Choral Societies cannot be illustrated more strikingly than by the fact that so remarkable a work by so famous a composer had never before been heard in this country.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THIS Society earned golden opinions on April 27 by producing in St. James's Hall, and for the first time in London, on an adequate scale, Schubert's Mass in E flat—last of the six left to the world by that truly inspired composer. Like most of Schubert's works for the Church, the Mass is divisible into two highly contrasted parts—the one all beauty and power, the other formal, constrained and unexpressive. It was not for him—so, at least, he appears to have thought—to depart from the traditions of the great masters. Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven had observed the rules which prescribed contrapuntal treatment for certain portions of the musical service, and Schubert followed their example, but with a difference. They could put themselves into scholastic bonds and be none the worse. Not so with the less perfectly trained master, who wrote contrapuntally like a student, and seems to present every fugal number as an academic exercise. The Mass in E flat is a great work, therefore, not because of, but despite, the movements wherein Schubert appears with cap and gown and carrying his Gradus. Elsewhere the Mass offers an example of crowded beauties—of everything in music that delights the ear or pleasurably excites the imagination. The "Kyrie," some movements of the "Gloria," the "Incarnatus," the "Dona nobis"—all these illustrate Schubert's best and most characteristic qualities in a manner at once bewitching and impressive. They represent the consecration of fascinating beauty to the service of religion. The Sacred Harmonic Society did well to rescue this Mass from neglect that threatened oblivion. It is now saved and will be heard again and again. In acknowledging this result let us not forget to praise a most conscientious and successful performance. The Society's chorus, though quite young, was expected to do well on this occasion. As a matter of fact it did better than even the sanguine expected, singing the often difficult music with a taste and correctness beyond praise. Much credit is due to every member, but especially to Mr. W. H. Cummings, who had superintended the vocal rehearsals. In the capacity of a choir-master Mr. Cummings now takes the highest rank. The orchestra well supported the singers, and with such soloists as Miss Marriott, Miss Hancock, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Newth and Mr. Hilton, Mr. Hallé, who conducted, had an easy task in leading the entire performance to a successful issue.

The season, which we are glad to know has proved fortunate, came to an end on the 11th ult., when "The Messiah" was performed in presence of a large and sympathetic audience.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE fifth Concert, on the 9th ult., was, but for its inordinate length, an excellent specimen of what a Philharmonic Concert should be, for it included a work by a classical writer, which, although written many years ago, had never before been heard in this country, and a composition by a young Englishman who has fully succeeded in creating a public interest for everything that comes from his pen. The first of these, a Motett by Cherubini, was composed in 1818 for the religious service at the French Chapel Royal. The original score was acquired by the late Prince Consort, and lent by the Queen to the Philharmonic Society from the Musical Library at Buckingham Palace, the performance on this occasion being by permission of Messrs. Ricordi, the proprietors of the copyright. The work is written for tenor solo, four-part chorus and orchestra, and is in every respect a thoroughly representative composition of the great master. Preceded by a brief instrumental introduction, the tenor solo most forcibly expresses the words, the second part especially being quite dramatic in its treatment. Of the three choruses which follow, the second, "De profundis clamavi," is the most striking, the solemn grandeur of the writing throughout indeed displaying to perfection Cherubini's marvellous command over choral and orchestral resources. The important tenor solo was effectively sung by Mr. Vernon Rigby, and the choral portion of the Motett was, on the whole, well rendered by the Philharmonic Choir. The second novelty was an orchestral piece composed by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie expressly for the Society, illustrative of Keats's poem "La Belle Dame sans Merci." In proof that we have no appropriate title for this species of composition, Sterndale Bennett termed his fanciful instrumental piece "Paradise and the Peri" an Overture; and Mr. Mackenzie, who now contributes a work similar in character, calls it a "Ballad." Neither of these names is perfectly satisfactory; but whatever this beautiful tone-poem of the composer of "Colomba" may be called, it is indeed welcome, both on account of its abstract merit and its deep sympathy with the scenes and incidents it aims at depicting. A very striking phrase, given out by the trombones—which we presume may be termed the leit-motive of the piece—and a charming melody, vocal enough to be put to words, obviously the strain of the lover, appeal at once even to those not musically sensitive enough to appreciate the skilful treatment of the themes and the rich glow of the orchestration throughout. The repetition of the opening Largo mesto at the end of the work effectively suggests the commencing and final verse of the poem, but the composition by no means takes the form of a thematic index of the several events narrated in Keats's verses, and Mr. Mackenzie, apart from the excellence of his music, may be congratulated upon thus steering clear of adopting a style of writing which has deservedly provoked much harsh criticism upon "programme-music." Under the steady direction of the composer, the work was well performed, and at its conclusion Mr. Mackenzie received an ovation as warm as it was thoroughly deserved. The "Ballad" is indeed a worthy contribution to the treasures of the Society, and its cordial reception will, we trust, insure for it a permanent place in its répertoire. The violin-playing of Signorina Tua was marked throughout by that excessive refinement and accuracy which invariably characterise her performances; but we should like to hear her in better music than Max Bruch's Concerto in G minor, although it must be said that her rendering of the Adagio revealed the possession of high artistic qualities. Chopin's Pianoforte Concerto in F minor was finely played by M. Vladimir de Pachmann, who seems, deservedly, to have been accepted as one of the most perfect exponents of the music of the Polish composer, and at the termination of the piece he was greeted with enthusiastic applause. Signor Mierzwiński gave the Romanza "O! muto asil," from "Guillaume Tell," and "Fra poco," from "Lucia," with much vocal power but undue exaggeration of style; Signorina Tua played some short pieces with good effect in the second part; and the orchestral works—Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, and the Marche Hongroise, from Berlioz' "Faust"—successfully displayed the powers of the band, although the tempi of some of the movements in Beethoven's Symphony seemed strangely at variance with the character of the music. With the exception of Mr. Mackenzie's "Ballad," the whole of the Concert was conducted, as usual, by Mr. W. G. Cousins.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE new season of these Concerts began auspiciously on the 7th ult. in the usual place and under the customary conditions; that is to say, with a fine orchestra of over a hundred performers "led" by Herr Ernst Schiever, and conducted by the great chef after whom the enterprise is named. We could not now dispense with Herr Richter and his interpretations of great classic and famous modern works. The Viennese musician, unknown among us a very few years ago, is now necessary to the completeness of a London season, in which fact he himself might see an adequate testimony to extraordinary merit. The first Concert, devoted to the memory of Richard Wagner, presented, we need not say, a liberal selection from that master's works, including the "Faust" Overture, the preludes to "Parsifal" and "Tristan," the Liebestod from the last-named drama, and the Dead March from "Götterdämmerung." This was perhaps as good a representation as possible, in the concert-room, of a composer who wrote for the stage only, and that so as to make transfer difficult. About the music itself, nothing new can be advanced; we must, however, bear emphatic witness to the great merit of its performance. Even those among the distinguished but not crowded audience who cared little for the selections could not have failed to see that the perfection of their rendering made the Concert a worthy tribute to Wagner's memory. Beethoven's Symphony in C minor completed the programme, and was also splendidly given. The Concerts thus had in every respect an impressive opening.

The second performance rapidly followed the first, taking place three days later. It was of more varied and general interest than its predecessor, the programme having as its chief feature Raff's Symphony "Im Walde," with which lengthy and, in many respects, masterly work, were associated Brahms's second Concerto for violin and orchestra, and the Overtures to "Coriolan" and "Tannhäuser." On this occasion vocal music was introduced—for the first time, we believe, apart from choral works—Miss Orridge singing Gluck's "Che farò." Are we to understand that the experiment of orchestral concerts, unrelieved by songs, has not proved successful up to the point desired? If so, the Crystal Palace authorities have shown wisdom in withstanding for years past the demand that vocal music at their Saturday Concerts should be abolished. The difficulties of Raff's Symphony were easily met under Herr Richter's skilful guidance, and, for the first time in St. James's Hall, amateurs were enabled to judge the work under fair conditions. As much cannot be said regarding Brahms's Concerto, because it was impossible for Herr Richter, charmed he never so wisely, to endow the soloist, Gospodin Brodsky, with the qualities necessary for perfect playing. The Russian artist is, no doubt, an able man, but he does not reach the standard which many abler ones have set up amongst us. At the same time, we do not wish to be hard upon him. Perhaps he was "out of form" that evening, or out of sympathy with his theme. At any rate, he has done much better at other times and in other things. About the rendering of such familiar Overtures as "Coriolan" and "Tannhäuser" not a word need be said.

The programme of the third Concert (the 21st ult.) was much more attractive than either of the two foregoing, and drew a larger audience. In what did its superior charm lie? Hardly in its brevity, we should imagine, although it was unusually brief. Perhaps, in the interest now associated with the music of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, whose second Scotch Rhapsody, "Burns," had a distinguished place, and probably was quite new to many amateurs present. We have not now to criticise this work, the task having been done long ago in connection with at least one previous performance at the Crystal Palace. Enough if we remind our readers that the Rhapsody, which is rhapsodical with a method, comprises three movements, each based upon a Scottish air. Thus, "Scots wha hae" gives a theme to the opening Maestoso, "She's fair and fause" to the slow movement, and "I coft a stane o' Haslock woo" to the finale. With what fancy Mr. Mackenzie has treated the melodies of his native land those who know his talent—and they are many now—scarcely require to be told. In this respect, and as a specimen of skilled orchestral work, the Rhapsody deserves unqualified admiration. Well played, it was naturally well received, and Mr. Mackenzie bowed his acknowledgments from his place among the audience. The "Schicksalshied" of Brahms, one of that master's most characteristic and difficult works, tried both band and chorus severely, but all engaged passed well through the ordeal. This amounts, under the circumstances, to no slight praise. The seventh Symphony of Beethoven was, of course, splendidly played.

THE BACH CHOIR.

THIS valuable musical association concluded its public labours for the year on the afternoon of Saturday, April 28, with a performance of Bach's great Mass in B minor. It was the revival of this colossal masterpiece which first called the Bach Choir into being, seven or eight years ago, and the artistic success then achieved and universally acknowledged led to the permanent organisation of a body of amateurs originally brought together for a special and temporary purpose. In the interests of truth it cannot be concealed that the performance of the Mass now under consideration, the seventh in the history of the Society, was scarcely up to the customary level of excellence. The Bach Choir has taught us to look for perfection, and this was not attained on the present occasion. Absolutely it was a very fine interpretation of the work, the splendid choruses which conclude the "Gloria" and the "Credo" being given with noteworthy effect, but relatively to former renderings something was left to desire. Occasionally a point was feebly attacked, or a phrase blurred, indicating, not the contempt bred from familiarity, but the over-confidence resulting from the remembrance of previous triumphs. Mr. Otto Goldschmidt may be trusted to impress his forces with the necessity of preserving caution, even when victory seems a matter of course. The soloists were Miss Carlotta Elliot, Madame Patey, Mr. W. H. Cummings and Mr. W. H. Brereton. Mr. Carrodus led the orchestra, and Mr. T. Pettit presided at the organ.

MR. WILLING'S CHOIR.

AT the Concert given in St. James's Hall, on May-Day, Gade's "Psyche" was repeated, under Mr. Willing's direction, with a considerable measure of success, due, in great part, to the good work done by the band and chorus, who showed as much familiarity with the text as could reasonably have been desired. The audience, though by no means crowded, expressed a measure of gratification as great as that which often comes from a full Hall. No wonder, for Gade's music, if never sensational, according to modern notions of that quality, is ever appropriate and beautiful. It keeps within the strict limits of art, and always has in view those accepted canons apart from which the composer is like a mariner without a compass. The solos of "Psyche" were undertaken by Madame Howitz, Miss Warwick, Miss Ehrenberg, Mr. A. Thompson and Mr. F. King. Most of them received justice, and Mr. Willing, who conducted ably, may be congratulated upon the general result. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous. It calls for no remark, save to note that some selections from Sterndale Bennett's beautiful and favourite Cantata "The May Queen" had a conspicuous place, and were not the least well received.

MRS. LAMBORN COCK'S CONCERT.

WE were glad to find so accomplished a professor as Mrs. Lamborn Cock setting an example to concert-givers by selecting a programme of the highest interest, and engaging executants fully capable of doing it justice. Her Concert on April 30, at St. James's Hall, in addition to many other attractive items, contained a worthy tribute to a sister artist in the production for the first time in London of Mrs. Meadows White's "Ode to the Passions," a work which materially increased the already high fame of its composer on its first performance at the Hereford Festival last year. A second hearing of this melodious and sympathetic setting of Collins's words not only confirmed the favourable opinion we have already expressed upon the composition, but revealed new beauties, both in the vocal and orchestral details—an unflinching proof of careful and earnest workmanship, which merits record. The principal vocalists—Miss Santley, Miss M. Hoare, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd and Mr. Santley—were highly successful in the solo parts, Miss Santley gaining much applause in the beautiful invocation to Hope, Mr. Santley exciting much enthusiasm by his fine rendering of the solo "Revenge, Pity," and Mr. Lloyd creating so marked an effect in the Recitative and Air "Brown Exercise rejoiced to hear" that he was encored and compelled to repeat it—a compliment alike due to the attractive character of the air and the excellence of its interpretation. The trio, with chorus, "Melancholy"—well sung by Miss Santley, Miss M. Hoare and Miss Hilda Wilson—was also warmly received; and the choruses, in spite of an occasional slip, were thoroughly appreciated. The rendering of the orchestral portion of the composition was scarcely all that could be desired; but, judging from the cordial greeting accorded to Mrs. Meadows White, who was called into the orchestra at the conclusion of the work, this did not detract from the effect of the music upon the audience, for the applause was general and most enthusiastic. Choral Societies—especially those which can command an orchestra—will find this Ode a valuable addition to their répertoire, for it presents no formidable difficulties, and will insure a welcome wherever it is heard. Senor Sarasate's performance of Raff's Suite for violin with orchestra (announced as a new work to this country, although it had been previously heard at a Philharmonic Concert) showed the exceptional executive powers of the player to the utmost advantage, the third movement especially—Moto continuo—being a marvellous display of skill and accuracy; but we cannot say that, as a composition, the Suite can ever take high rank, although there is much graceful writing in the Menuetto, No. 2. Sterndale Bennett's Fourth Pianoforte Concerto (with the charming Barcarole) was carefully played by Mr. Cusins; and Mr. John Thomas won much applause for his rendering of two harp solos of his own composition. Amongst the vocal pieces must be mentioned the song from Mr. Cusins's Oratorio "Gideon," "The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous," the truly devotional character of which was so deepened by the singing of Miss Hilda Wilson as to elicit the warmest applause. Miss Marian McKenzie was also highly successful in Edward Bache's ballad "Farewell," and solos were given by Miss Santley, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Santley with much success. The singing of the Philharmonic Choir in the part-songs "My lady comes to me" (Pinsuti) and "As the sunshine to the flower" (Cusins) was much admired. With the exception of Bennett's Concerto and the part-songs (when Mr. T. Pettit took the bâton), the performance was conducted throughout by

Mr. Cusins, the only purely orchestral pieces in the programme being Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and Mendelssohn's March from "Athalia." In every respect the Concert was a decided success, and reflected the highest credit upon the energy and artistic feeling of the beneficiaries.

MISS ZIMMERMANN'S CONCERTS.

THE second of these excellent entertainments took place at the Royal Academy Concert Room, on Tuesday, the 8th ult. The programme commenced with a Sonata in E flat, for piano and violin, by Mozart, one of four such works in that key, and numbered 380 in Köchel's Catalogue. Miss Emily Shinner was the violinist, and her finished, expressive playing deserved cordial recognition. Herr Joachim's Theme and Variations in E (Op. 10), for piano and violin, is a cleverly written piece in the Hungarian style, but not very effective as music. The viola part was taken by Herr Straus, who also joined Miss Zimmermann in Schubert's Fantasia in C (Op. 159), for piano and violin. The concert-giver selected three of Brahms's minor pieces as her solos, and she was represented as a composer by two pleasing songs, "Only a year ago" and "Crocus gathering," tastefully sung by Miss Carlotta Elliot. At the last Concert, on Thursday, the 24th ult., there was a crowded audience, the co-operation of Madame Norman Néruda being perhaps accountable for the increased attendance. The most interesting feature of the programme was Miss Zimmermann's second Sonata for piano and violin in A minor (Op. 21). The work is in four regularly developed movements, and bears throughout the impress of sound musicianship, if not of distinct individuality of utterance. The most pleasing section is a piquant Allegretto scherzando in D minor; but there is much expressive writing in the slow movement, Andante Cantabile, and the whole Sonata was warmly received. The encore which Miss Zimmermann received after playing Liszt's transcription of Bach's Organ Fantasia and Fugue in G minor might be taken as the expression of a desire to hear her in some more legitimate pianoforte music. The programme included Schumann's Sonata in D minor, for piano and violin; and Miss Santley introduced two charming little songs entitled "Angel hosts" and "A Contrast," by Dr. Hubert Parry.

SEÑOR SARASATE'S CONCERT.

THE third orchestral concert given at St. James's Hall, on Friday, the 4th ult., might be looked upon as a kind of formal leave-taking between the eminent Spanish violinist and the public which had throughout accorded him such unqualified tributes of admiration. Of course there was a great gathering, and enthusiasm characterised the proceedings from first to last. Señor Sarasate's interpretation of Beethoven's Concerto—the greatest test of a violinist's powers—is more remarkable for the player's sensuous beauty of tone than for genuine passion or intellectual vigour. Upon his reading of individual passages difference of opinion may justly prevail; but there could scarcely be any dispute as to the unsuitability of the long and laboured cadenza he introduced in the first movement, simply because it was out of character with the music. The virtuoso was also heard in Vieuxtemps's Fantasia Appassionata, Wieniawski's Airs Russes and a Spanish piece from his own pen. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, in which the Philharmonic orchestra, under Mr. Cusins, maintained its usual standard of merit.

M. DE PACHMANN'S RECITALS.

EMULOUS of Von Bülow, Rubinstein, Sophie Menter and other pianists of high rank, M. de Pachmann is now engaged upon a short series of Recitals, in which he alone suffices to maintain interest and give pleasure. The performances, so far, have been highly successful, a large audience attending on each occasion and applauding the Russian artist with great cordiality. At the first Recital (5th ult.) M. de Pachmann limited himself to the works of Chopin, whose music he plays with such remarkable taste, finish and distinction. It is understood that he does not care to be known as the interpreter of one master, but if by some happy combination of circumstances, a pianist is better fitted to render Chopin's music than any other, the public cannot be blamed for preferring to hear him in that capacity, and, after all, a performer par excellence of the Polish master's works holds a very enviable position. He must be a master of his instrument and a man endowed with subtle appreciation and the finest sensibility. The Chopin Recital was, of course, most successful. M. de Pachmann played a large number of favourite selections, which we need not specify, and held his audience not only in their seats, but attentive to the very end. His execution presented the usual charming qualities of exquisite finesse, delicate shading, and a comprehensive sympathy with the composer's varying moods.

The second Recital, given on the 22nd ult., was scarcely less well attended than the first, albeit M. de Pachmann's programme included very little of Chopin. That little, however, comprised the Sonata with the Funeral March and the well-known Valse in A flat, which the artist gave with special brilliancy, to the delight of all who heard him. Other selections were taken from Bach, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Moscheles, &c. In these M. de Pachmann fell short of the uniform success gained on the previous occasion, not that his skill was inadequate, but that his temperament was, perhaps, at variance with their spirit. The Russian pianist is by no means a cold, intellectual performer, like Von Bülow, who plays all masters equally well. He executes as he feels, and his sympathy, or the want of it, necessarily affects his execution. Nevertheless, it is always pleasurable and interesting to hear so gifted an artist play, and to this fact the audience abundantly testified.

MADAME SOPHIE MENTER.

A RECITAL given by this pianist in St. James's Hall, on the 19th ult., was largely attended by lovers of sensational performances. The programme could hardly have been more comprehensive and varied. It comprised a great number of pieces belonging to all schools, from the pure formalism of Bach to the rampant rhapsody of Liszt, and thus demanded from its sole interpreter a wonderful exercise of memory, physical power, and artistic feeling. We cannot say that Madame Menter met every requirement of the many she imposed upon herself: but she astonished her audience all the same, and drew from them applause as hearty as the most greedy could desire. We go with some of our contemporaries in their remarks upon the manner in which Madame Menter mixes up transcriptions and arrangements with worthier things. An occasional tour de force for its own sake may be pardoned; but when mere show-pieces are prominent, and the artist makes through them her strongest appeal, it is time to offer counsel. Madame Menter may know best where her strength lies; but if she aim at something above a mere display of "virtuosity," she must cease to interlard her programmes with the concoctions of Liszt and others. The lady is fitted for nobler work by the phenomenal command she has acquired over her instrument.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S CONCERTS.

THE principal saloon in Sir Coutts Lindsay's "Gallery" has again been chosen for the scene of Mr. Charles Hallé's summer Concerts of chamber music, and the opening performance of the present season took place on the 18th ult. There was a good attendance of amateurs, who were delighted to hear music ably played amid surroundings so thoroughly congenial. The programme contained nothing new, for the reason, perhaps, that novelty was deemed unnecessary by way of condiment for a dish made up of Schubert's Quintet in C, Gade's pianoforte Trio in F, Schumann's Fantasia-Stücke for piano and violin, and such-like works. The charm of these compositions does not, like the fragrance of a flower, soon depart. It endures, and makes always acceptable that which otherwise would weary by repetition. The executants were, with the exception of the two violoncellists, Mr. Robert Mendelssohn and Herr Franz Néruda, those whose worth has been demonstrated over and over again, and year after year, at the Popular Concerts. It is quite needless to state how the various pieces above named were played by M^{me}. Néruda, Mr. Hallé, Herr Ries, and Herr Straus.

MR. RICKARD'S PIANOFORTE RECITAL.

THE ambition which overleaps itself received an illustration at St. James's Hall, on Thursday, the 24th ult., when Mr. Richard Rickard gave a Recital consisting entirely of Chopin's music. It is in the nature of things that two hours' pianoforte playing must produce a feeling of monotony, even with an artist of the highest gifts at the keyboard, and this monotony becomes intensified when the music interpreted is cast in one mould and almost as full of mannerism as it is of beauty. Mr. Rickard is a performer of great merit; he has thoroughly mastered the technique of his instrument, his touch being pure and free from hardness, and his execution even and accurate. His style is entirely free from affectation, if indeed it does not err on the side of coldness, which of course is a disadvantage in music of a romantic character. Within his self-imposed limit his programme was as varied as possible, and included some items not often selected by pianists, such as the Brilliant Variations in B flat (Op. 12), the Concert Allegro in A (Op. 46), and the Fantaisie in F minor (Op. 49). We shall be glad of an opportunity of hearing Mr. Rickard in the works of other composers.

MISS HOLLAND'S CONCERTS.

It may be true that charity covers a multitude of sins; and sometimes the proverb has to be borne in mind when musical entertainments are given for charitable purposes. No forbearance of any kind is necessary, however, in dealing with the performances organised by Miss Holland, which took place at Steinway Hall, on the 2nd ult.; at Grosvenor House, on the 4th; and, we believe, once or twice elsewhere—the object being to raise funds for the Ladies' Association for the Rescue of Friendless Girls. In the pursuit of this aim, Miss Holland not only directed the Concerts, but drilled a choir of amateurs and composed a Cantata, the performance of which gave musical interest to the undertaking. The subject of woman's capacity for composition has recently been raised in our columns, and it was also discussed at some length at the last meeting of the Musical Association. Those who take a sanguine view of the matter may derive some encouragement for their opinions by an examination of Miss Holland's setting of Hood's humorous poem "Miss Kilmansegg and her Golden Leg." That the composer is a cultivated musician is obvious from the excellent construction of the choruses, some of which are elaborate, with a good deal of freedom in the part-writing. She also appears to have an exhaustless fund of tune at her command, while her melodies are frequently remarkable for a piquancy of style quite in keeping with the lines to which they are set. Parenthetically we may mention that the vocal score of the Cantata (Weekes & Co.) has a number of errors, such as accidentals omitted, crochets substituted for quavers, and the like. A qualified musician, however, would have no difficulty in making the necessary corrections, and "Miss Kilmansegg" may be warmly commended to the notice of small Choral Societies. The performance at Grosvenor House was thoroughly efficient, the composer presiding at the pianoforte, and the work was received with mingled laughter and applause by a distinguished audience.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

EVERY musical season is noteworthy for some predominant features which impress themselves at the time and recur to the memory whenever we cast our thoughts backward. Two years ago London was invaded by an army of pianists, with Anton Rubinstein at its head; last summer two German opera companies were in the field, and the claims of modern Teutonic art were discussed with fierceness; while, at the present time, English music and musicians are receiving far more attention than was ever before accorded to them. As it is more valorous to lead than to follow, it may be as well to state that the programme of English music given at the above Society's last Concert, on the 7th ult., was arranged months ago, before the attention of the public had been fully directed towards two of the composers represented. Until the production of "Colomba" and "Esmeralda," Mr. A. C. Mackenzie and Mr. Goring Thomas enjoyed recognition chiefly in the limited circle of musicians and earnest amateurs. Readers of this journal, however, will scarcely need to be reminded that Mr. Mackenzie's Cantata "The Bride" was produced at the Worcester festival in 1881, and that "The Sun-Worshippers," by Mr. Thomas, saw the light at the Norwich gathering in the same year. The music of "The Bride" is far from commonplace, and though a flavour of Schumann pervades it, there is no direct plagiarism. Consequently the work is winning popularity in spite of its sombre and incomprehensible libretto. "The Sun-Worshippers" is bright, melodious and effective throughout, and should be a favourite with Choral Societies. In the performance of both works, under Mr. Prout's direction, the band and chorus were highly satisfactory, and full justice was rendered to the solos by Miss Annie Marriott and Mr. W. Shakespeare. In the second part of the Concert were a number of lesser items, among them being a spirited chorus, "The Voice of Spring," by Dr. C. S. Heap, Mr. Harold Thomas's graceful and fanciful Overture, "Mountain, Lake and Moorland," Mr. Prout's Chorus, "Hail to the Chief," and Mr. Sullivan's Overture, "Di Ballo." The characteristic and effective air "There's a Bower of Roses," from Mr. Villiers Stanford's opera "The Veiled Prophet," capably sung by Miss Annie Marriott, was followed by a determined encore which, however, was successfully resisted, the conductor calling attention to the rule at the head of the programmes. During the past season the Hackney Choral Association has fully maintained the high standard set up six or seven years ago, both in the selection of its programmes and the manner of performance.

TUFNELL PARK CHORAL SOCIETY.

A PERFORMANCE of Gounod's "Redemption" was given by the Tufnell Park Choral Society, on the 11th ult., at the Athenæum, Camden Road, in aid of the fund for the Royal College of Music, with a success which must at once set at rest any question as to the effect of the work when rendered without an orchestra. It is true that the energetic Conductor of the Society, Mr. W. Henry Thomas, had so perfectly trained his choir as to present the choruses with all that decision and varied expression which they absolutely demand; and also that he was most ably assisted by Miss Amy Gill at the pianoforte, Mr. H. M. Higgs at the Mustel Organ, and Mr. John Cheshire at the harp; but apart from these artistic aids, the beauty of the music thoroughly made its way to the hearts of the audience, and the result was a triumph for all concerned. Miss Margaret Hoare and Miss Bayley were excellent in the soprano solos, the contralto part, especially the solo "While my watch I am keeping," was remarkably well sung by Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. A. Smith, Mr. Grylls, Mr. Partidge and Mr. Lewis Thomas were thoroughly efficient in the music allotted to them. The performance of so important a work in a manner thoroughly commensurate with its high claims reflects the utmost credit both upon the choir and its Conductor.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE third and last Concert of the present season of this Society was given in the Athenæum, Highbury New Park, on Monday evening, the 7th ult., under the conductorship of Dr. Bridge. The first portion of the programme consisted of J. F. Barnett's Cantata "The Ancient Mariner," the name-part of which was exceedingly well sung by Mr. Bridson, Mr. Edward Lloyd sustaining the tenor part with his wonted ability. The singing of the choir was commendable throughout, and the whole of the Cantata was rendered in a creditable manner, although the orchestra was at times, particularly in the solos, somewhat inclined to overpower the voices. At its conclusion the composer, who was present, bowed his acknowledgments from the platform.

The soprano and contralto solos were taken by Miss Carreras and Miss Marian McKenzie respectively. The second part of the programme opened with a first performance of a new Motett for soprano solo and chorus, composed by Dr. Bridge, and entitled "Hymn to the Creator," the words, a paraphrase of a portion of the Benedictus, being a translation of a Latin hymn by St. Francis of Assisi. The work is musically and interesting throughout, although the subject, being one uninterrupted expression of praise, does not afford any great scope for variety in treatment. The solo was excellently sung by Miss Thornthwaite, the chorus sang throughout con amore, and the composition was very warmly received. Other works, composed expressly for this Society, and performed for the first time, were an Andante for violin by Mr. F. C. Woods (a pupil of the Conductor), a part-song, "Tis twilight's holy hour" (J. Clippingdale), and a part-song, "I wish to tune my quivering lyre" (A. E. Dyer). Mention may also be made of a very pleasing part-song by Mr. David Davies (also a pupil of Dr. Bridge), "It was a lover and his lass," which elicited the most enthusiastic applause. Miss McKenzie and Mr. E. Lloyd also contributed solos.

THE GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

A SUCCESSFUL Concert was given on Saturday afternoon, the 5th ult., in the Egyptian Hall of the Mansion House, by the pupils of the Guildhall School of Music, under the direction of the principal, Mr. H. Weist Hill. The programme, which was chiefly vocal, and of as fairly interesting a character as a purely miscellaneous selection can well be, comprised Mendelssohn's 43rd Psalm, Gounod's "Noël," and four other part-songs, including Allen's humorous glee, "Dickory, dickory, dock," in all of which, and particularly in the latter, the choir was highly effective. Braga's "Serenata" and Spohr's "Rose, softly blooming" enabled Miss Edith Umpelby and Miss Clara Field respectively to exhibit both pleasing mezzo-soprano voices and good style; while a younger débütante, Miss Alice Heale, showed herself the possessor of a really fine contralto, which requires but increased study and culture. The programme was not, however, entirely devoid of instrumental music, and, particularly, the violin playing of two of the Corporation Exhibitioners, deserves notice. Of these two, Miss Cecile Eleison, a young lady of scarcely more than thirteen summers, showed, in a Romance and Gigue by Rüst, a really remarkable amount of technical skill, coupled with good phrasing, and gave promise of great things; while Miss Charlotte Wilkes, who led the slow movement from Haydn's Quartet, Op. 59 (the variations on the melody known as the "Hymn to the Emperor"), although having less opportunity for display, performed with a remarkably pure tone, and in a thoroughly musicianly manner. On the whole, although the Guildhall School has not been established more than two years in its present form, it may certainly look already with satisfaction upon its pupils.

FESTIVAL OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY.

THE annual Festival of the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy took place in St. Paul's Cathedral, on Wednesday, the 9th ult., under the conductorship of Dr. Stainer. As on one or two previous occasions, Sir Arthur Sullivan's fine Overture "In Memoriam" (written some years since in memory of the composer's father, and shortly to be published) preceded, or, we may perhaps say, formed the commencement of the service. An unfortunate difference of pitch between the wind of the orchestra and the organ, painfully noticeable in the opening bars, somewhat marred an otherwise excellent performance of a work noble in itself and eminently suited for such a Festival. Of Dr. Hiller's "Song of Victory" (written as a hymn of thanksgiving for the same occasion that also invoked in the opposite spirit the ever-charming "Gallia" of Gounod) it would indeed be difficult to speak too highly. The work is a chef-d'œuvre of a great master, and while we admire the courageous spirit which rendered its production possible on such an occasion, we very gladly chronicle the complete success which crowned the endeavours of all concerned in its performance. The rendering of the whole Cantata was excellent, both as regards band and choir; the treble solos, a prominent feature of the work, were divided between Masters Richardson and Birch, two choristers of the Cathedral, the solo portion of the last number, however, being (in deference to the peculiar acoustic properties of the Cathedral) taken with good effect by the whole of the thirty boys of the Cathedral choir. The Service used, Mr. Birket Foster's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A, is, although unpretentious in character and easy of performance, effective and likely to prove very useful to choirs. The choir was, on the present occasion, slightly augmented, numbering in all about 300 vocalists, who were at all times well under the conductor's beat. An excellent sermon was preached by the Rev. Prebendary Hole of Lincoln, after which, according to annual custom, the Hallelujah Chorus from "The Messiah" was sung. There was a large congregation.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE musical event of the month was, without doubt, the first production here, by the Philharmonic, of the much-debated "Odysseus" of Herr Max Bruch, which took place on the 7th ult. The favourable impression created by the first production of the composer's masterly setting of Schiller's "Lay of the Bell," at the Birmingham Festival of 1879, had excited a very general desire here to make acquaintance with some of Herr Bruch's earlier works, but other and more pressing engagements prevented any exploration in that direction until the Philharmonic this year took in hand his classic Cantata "Odysseus" which had already been heard in London, Manchester, Liverpool, and elsewhere. The experiment was a commendable one, but it is not likely to be soon repeated. With all its unquestionable ability and earnestness, the "Odysseus," composed in 1873, is anything but an attractive work, and long before the end had been reached, the bulk of the audience who were present on this occasion appeared to be heartily weary of it. Herr Bruch's music is never wanting in science or thoroughness, but his invention is apt to flag, and he appears to lack the dramatic faculty and feeling for contrast which are necessary to sustain the interest of a serious, lengthy and elaborately scored Cantata like "Odysseus." For this result the libretto of Herr Graff is, no doubt, in part responsible, but the composer must also bear his share of the blame. There were two ways in which he might have lifted his work out of the rut which the librettist had prepared for it. He might have invested it with a certain classical grandeur, by a studied and stately simplicity and reserve in the employment of chromatic means, or he might have adopted the modern romantic method, and vivified and humanised the personages of his librettist, after the manner of Weber and Schubert. Unfortunately he chose a middle course, in which the worst features of the two methods are combined without their advantages, and the placid, contemplative spirit of antique art is mocked and disturbed by the gorgeous and elaborate trappings of the modern orchestra, with its prevalence of wind and percussion, its formlessness and unrest. The result is necessarily incongruous and unsatisfactory, though the work is redeemed in parts by passages of great beauty and power, as in the scenes between Nausikaa and her maidens, the spirited fugal chorus of Phœcians, "Be welcome, stranger," the "Song of the Rhapsoodes," for male voices only, with harp obbligato, in unison with the strings pizzicato, and the delicious quartet and chorus "Nowhere abides such delight as in the homestead." All these numbers were effectively rendered by the Society's band and chorus, though in one or two instances the executive means were scarcely equal to the exigencies of the score, and the brass was occasionally obstreperous. Miss Giulia Warwick was artistic and pleasing in the principal soprano music, especially distinguishing herself in the music of Nausikaa. Frau Max Bruch, the wife of the composer, displayed a contralto voice of considerable range and power, allied to earnest dramatic feeling, in the music of Penelope, and Mr. Frederic King, as Odysseus, impressed the audience favourably in a somewhat trying and thankless part. Dr. Heap conducted with judgment and decision.

On the same evening as the above production, the lovers of operetta made acquaintance here for the first time with the "Naval Cadets" of Mr. R. Genée through the English version of Mr. H. B. Farnie. The company of Madame Soldene, who herself played Crisette, is not deficient in spirit or dramatic talent, but its musical qualifications are limited, and it would be hardly fair to judge of the work presented on this occasion by the effect produced. In Von Suppé's Operetta "Boccaccio," produced a few evenings later, the company were more at home, and the performance met with very general approval.

On the 17th Mr. D. F. Davis gave his so-called annual Harp Festival, one of the stock features of which is a band of two dozen harps played by lady amateurs, friends or pupils of the bénéficiaire. On this occasion the lovers of minstrelsy did not respond to the appeal with their wonted liberality, although—perhaps because—the attractions of the harp were largely supplemented by those of the voice, represented by the singing of Miss Emilie Lloyd, Mr. Vernon Rigby and two local ladies. The performance does not call for criticism. The pieces in general were well chosen for displaying the somewhat limited musical capabilities of the bardic instrument, and the results appeared to be much appreciated by the friends and relations of the fair performers, who constituted no mean proportion of the audience, but a sestet arrangement of Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, though fairly well played, was so injudicious and unsuitable for the work as to be quite ineffective. Miss Emilie Lloyd sang with good feeling and effect Watson's "A Winter Story," Behrend's "Auntie," and Moore's "Minstrel Boy," and Mr. Vernon Rigby delighted the audience in "Salve dimora," Schubert's serenade "Thro' the night," Schumann's "Devotion," Nelson's "Mary of Argyle," and by way of encore to the latter, the perennial "La donna è mobile" from "Rigoletto."

On the 22nd an interesting vocal and instrumental Concert was given in the new Lecture Theatre of the Midland Institute, for a local charity, the principal performers, who gave their services gratuitously, being Mr. and Miss Santley and Miss Agnes Miller (pianoforte). The programme comprised Spohr's Double String Quartet in D minor, Beethoven's Sonata Patetica for Miss Miller, Rubinstein's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in G major (Op. 13), charmingly played by Mr. F. Ward and Miss Miller, a couple of Salonstücke by the same composer, and an excerpt from Beethoven's Quintet Arrangement of the Septet in E flat. Mr. Santley, who was in fine voice, sang Gounod's Arab love-song "Medjé," Mendelssohn's "Shepherd's Lay," Hatton's "To Anthea," and Miss Maud V. White's "The Devout Lover" (the latter accompanied by the composer) in his most fervent and finished style, winning an encore for the last-mentioned song. Miss Santley's contributions comprised Molloy's "Children's prayers," Rubinstein's "Nicht mit Engeln," and Miss White's impassioned song "My soul is an enchanted boat." The playing of the Beethoven Sonata by Miss Miller was one of the features of the evening.

At the annual Orchestral Concert of the Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union, on the 25th, the chief features were Beethoven's Symphony in D, No. 2, and the Overtures to "Lodoiska" (Cherubini) and "Le Cheval de Bronze" (Auber).

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

"The last for the season" has been the key note of all the Concerts this month, and, with the exception of Organ Recitals, we shall have no more music from now to next October, when the Monday Popular Concerts recommence. The dearth of Popular Concerts this spring has been so much felt and regretted that we begin to hope the usual number may be given next season; indeed, we hear that there has been a talk of sending a petition to Mr. Riseley to that effect. But we doubt the suggestion being carried out. It would be too strong an action (musically speaking) for a town which, with about 200,000 inhabitants, has not yet succeeded in raising the modest £2,000 required for the Royal College of Music Scholarship, despite all the efforts of the Mayor and Corporation.

The Season of 1882-83 has not closed so brilliantly as that of 1881-82, at the last Concert of which we had Messrs. Villiers Stanford and Prout conducting their own works to an immense and enthusiastic audience, and Mr. Gompertz creating a sensation only to be described as a furor by his admirable violin-playing. In fact we have been in a state of stagnation since the New Year, and have only had one good Concert during May. This was Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy's fourth and last Classical Chamber Concert (sixth season), at which, as usual, Messrs. Henry Holmes, M. Rice, W. H. Hill and J. Pomeroy were the performers with Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy at the pianoforte. Mendelssohn's Sonata in D (Op. 58), for pianoforte and violoncello, was the feature of the evening, but Mrs. Pomeroy's playing was not equal to that of her husband, and there was apparently a want of sympathy between the executants in the first movement, which considerably detracted from the merit of the performance. The Allegretto and Adagio, however, went considerably better, and Mr. Pomeroy's playing throughout was refined and artistic. Mozart's Quartet in D major, No. 10, Spohr's Quartet in E flat (Op. 58) and the great Brahms Quintet in F minor (Op. 54) formed the remainder of the programme, the last being a novelty to many of the audience, which was a large one.

The People's Concert Society gave its last Concert (second season) on the 26th ult., Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" forming the first part of the programme.

Mr. Riseley continues his Saturday Organ Recitals at the Colston Hall, and Mr. Cedric Bucknall (Organist of All Saints', Clifton) has commenced a series of Recitals at the Victoria Rooms, Clifton, on Monday evenings. Admission may be obtained in each instance for sixpence, and the Recitals are fairly well supported.

MUSIC IN SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

THE events in this district during the season now closing have been distinguished by unusual vitality. At West Bromwich the Choral Society has at three Concerts performed Gade's "Crusaders," Smart's "Bride of Dunkerton," Mendelssohn's "As the hart pants," with miscellaneous selections at two of the Concerts. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Misses Samuëll, Jessie Royd and Helen D'Alton, Messrs. Maas, Piercy, Rigby, Lander, Sauvage and Hilton. The Walsall Philharmonic Union, under the conductorship of Dr. Swinnerton Heap, has also given three Concerts, the principal works being Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and "Hear my prayer," and Costa's "Eli," amongst the principal vocalists being Misses Annie Marriott, Eleanor Farnol, Alleby and Done, and Messrs. Dunkerton, Kenningham and Henry Blower. The Dudley Vocal Union, almost alone amongst the local Societies, has limited its efforts to the production of "The Messiah" and "The Creation," and is now contemplating a performance of "Judas Maccabæus." On the other hand, the Stourbridge Choral Society, a young but energetic Association, has, with commendable enterprise, given its supporters two of the productions of the last Birmingham Festival, Gade's "Psyche" and Gaul's "Holy City." At Wolverhampton the Festival Choral Society, a body now numbering some 250 members, has given four Concerts: "The Redemption," the performance of which in November—the first in the provinces after those of the Festivals of Birmingham, Bristol and Brighton—attracted and profoundly impressed a crowded audience; "The Messiah," at Christmas; an Orchestral Concert in January; and finally, in April, Macfarren's "St. John the Baptist" and Haydn's Imperial Mass. The list of artists engaged includes Misses Mary Davies, Anna Williams, Clara Samuëll, Orridge, Damian, D'Alton and Emilie Lloyd, Messrs. Maas, Rigby, Cummings, Henry Blower, King, and Signor Foli. The band has been largely augmented and well drilled, Dr. Swinnerton Heap being the Conductor. In Wolverhampton, too, the veteran violinist Mr. Henry Hayward has just completed his sixth series of Classical Concerts, assisted by his sons Charles (second violin) and Henry (viola), Messrs. Roberts (viola) and Owen (cello), Misses Hargreaves, Yonge and Cull (pianoforte). He has performed before a more numerous but still too small body of supporters, Spohr's Quintet for pianoforte and strings, and Duet for violin and viola, Beethoven's Quartet for strings (Op. 18) and "Waldstein" and "Moonlight" Sonatas (pianoforte); Mendelssohn's Quartet in C minor and Trio in C minor, both for pianoforte and strings; Mozart's Quartet (11th) and Quintet in C for strings; Gühr's Violin Concerto, &c., &c. Vocal selections were contributed at the different concerts by Misses Falkner, Guest, and Attwood.

Mr. Sims Reeves has just paid his farewell visit to Wolverhampton, accompanied by Mr. Santley, Misses Clements and Spencer Jones, Messrs. Herbert Reeves, Nicholson (flute) and Sidney Naylor (Conductor); and it goes without saying that the vast audience was fairly enraptured with his performance. Mr. Santley's efforts were equally successful.

The arrangements for the forthcoming Triennial Festival in Wolverhampton are in a forward state, and rehearsals twice a week are being vigorously proceeded with. Hitherto this Festival has been limited to a single day; but fresh vitality having been infused into the management, the movement has been placed on a broader and sounder basis, and it has been decided to give two performances on each of two successive days. The programme will include "Elijah," Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," Hummel's "Alma Virgo," Macfarren's "Lady of the Lake," and Mackenzie's "Jason," miscellaneous selections being included in the evening programmes. The artists engaged include Misses Davies, Williams and Emilie Lloyd, Madame Patey, Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Maas and King, and Signor Foli. Mr. Carrodus will lead a band of sixty performers, and Dr. Swinnerton Heap has been appointed conductor. No pains or expense are being spared to make the musical success thorough, and a highly satisfactory financial issue is already assured.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

MR. W. T. BEST, the well-known Organist of St. George's Hall, Liverpool, gave two Recitals in St. Andrew's Church, Bradford, on the 8th ult., the occasion being the opening of a new instrument built by Messrs. W. Hill and Son. It is superfluous to say that the performances were excellent, but justice would hardly be done were we not to make special allusion to the rendering of Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C major, in which Mr. Best quite excelled himself. Selections from Spohr's "Last Judgment," Widor's Symphony in B flat, Dr. Wesley's Andante cantabile in G and Smart's Festal March in D were also played.

The same evening was chosen by the Leeds Amateur Orchestral Society for their last Concert of the season. The orchestra was conducted by Mr. J. P. Bowling, and perhaps gave more satisfaction than on any previous occasion; but there is still need of much painstaking practice, individually and collectively, before the stage of efficiency is reached. Miss Hill and Mr. Coghlan contributed vocal solos, and Mr. Bowling gave further evidence of his undoubted abilities as a pianist.

The Headingley Vocal Society performed Mendelssohn's "Athalie" in the Leeds Church Institute, on the 21st ult., under the direction of Mr. James Broughton, the Conductor of the Society. Mr. Alfred Broughton played the accompaniments. The lyrics were not recited, as at a recent Concert in Bradford, to which we drew notice last month, and therefore some of the general effect of the work was lost; but the performance, as a whole, was very creditable.

A new work by the Rev. J. F. Downes, a musician of considerable local reputation, has just been privately performed in Leeds, before an influential gathering of amateurs, and seems destined to achieve a greater popularity than any of his previous compositions. The subject is the parable of "The Prodigal Son," and the music to which it is set is not only full of melody, but exhibits much technical skill. Further criticism is, of course, impossible, considering the nature of the first performance and the fact that the Cantata is not yet published; but we hope before long to hear that the work is to be given before a public audience, and that the music is no longer in manuscript. We are glad to see that another composer of the same town, Mr. A. E. Grimshaw, is obtaining some success as a writer of vocal music.

The Leeds Musical Festival will now engross attention here for the next few months. The practices are being regularly held under the superintendence of the chorus-master, Mr. James Broughton, and great progress has been made with Macfarren's "King David" and Beethoven's Mass in D. The famous Yorkshire chorus will be severely tried by the difficulties of the latter work, but no one who heard the performance of the Choral Symphony three years ago will hesitate to expect a splendid rendering of the Mass. Macfarren's new work, if we may judge from the choruses of the first part, will not be less popular than his other oratorios: there is much more melody throughout, and in one of the numbers we are inclined to think he shows more contrapuntal skill than in any previous work of the same nature. We are sorry to hear that Clay's promised Cantata "Sardanapalus" will not be performed, owing to the difficulties which the composer has had to contend with, but in lieu of it a composition by Alfred Cellier on the subject of Gray's "Elegy" has been offered to the Committee and accepted. Of the other new works we have as yet heard nothing, but Raff's Oratorio will doubtless be rehearsed as soon as it is published. As regards the chorus, it seems to be admitted that there is no falling-off from the excellence of previous Festivals, but, on the contrary, an improvement is perceived in many respects. The great organ in the Victoria Hall, which will be used for the Festival, is now undergoing thorough repair for this purpose, and in consequence the usual bi-weekly Recitals of Dr. Spark have been suspended for some time. It has already been announced that the Organists for the Festival will be Dr. Spark and Mr. Walter Parratt (who is a Yorkshireman), and that the Duke of Albany will preside at the performances, to which the gracious patronage of the Queen has been accorded.

The last item of general interest is an intimation to the effect that the Committee have found themselves unable to engage Madame Albani for the Festival in consequence of "the exorbitant increase in her terms." We understand that the Committee of the Gloucester Festival have come to the same determination, and for a similar reason.

MACKENZIE'S "COLOMBA."

MR. MACKENZIE'S new opera "Colomba" has been one of the chief features of Mr. Carl Rosa's successful season which has just terminated in Ireland. The Irish Times says:—

"The most important as well as the most interesting work of Mr. Carl Rosa's London season was that of 'Colomba,' an opera by Dr. Franz Hueffer and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, written specially for the Rosa company. The great and immediate success with which it was met was pleasantly significant for those who have faith in native talent, and hopes of a national opera on a scale larger and more elevated than any hitherto known. . . . There is ample employment of the leit-motif for Colomba, Savelli, &c. There is no overture, properly so-called, but a very striking and characteristic prelude, opening with a bold phrase, which we hear again frequently throughout the work. In this introduction the musician will at once recognise the hand of a master; grace, delicacy, and full command of orchestral resource, with a fine dramatic instinct. This remark may be extended to the entire opera, which exhibits a cultured imagination and refined scholarship, and is, besides, symmetrical in the sense that it does not wander outside the school which the composer adopts, though we have no doubt if he had chosen another style, French or Italian, for example, he would have worn the mantle of the country with great grace. Briefly to summarise the general features of this opera, we may say that the dramatic writing is very powerful and impressive, the choral arrangements admirable, and the orchestration remarkable for tact, scholarship and ingenuity. An unaccompanied quintet in the second act is finely written. For the rest, we may indicate as specially worthy of notice the opening chorus, the colour and variety of which are very cleverly shown; the Vocero, sung by Chilina and afterwards by the heroine; Savelli's song, Colomba's scena at the commencement of the second act, Orso's song 'Will she come from the hill,' Chilina's plaintive song (for which Miss Perry won a merited encore), and the duets in the fourth act."

The Freeman's Journal in the course of a long notice says:—

"Last night Mr. Rosa favoured a crowded audience with the second new opera of the present season. Such a thing is naturally an event in the musical world of Dublin, and the unequivocal success which signalled the production of 'Esmeralda' last week gave a further interest to the first performance amongst us of 'Colomba.' A success was evidently anticipated last night, for there did not appear to be an inch of space in the entire house, and we may here add that if looks mean anything, many and frequent were the longings for a theatre which is capable of comfortably accommodating a not by any means enormous gathering. But few, we venture to say, did not feel themselves compensated by last night's opera for any physical inconveniences they may have suffered. 'Colomba' was a brilliant, a magnificent success, and although it is sometimes dangerous to pronounce a decided opinion upon a new work of the kind, there can be no second notion as to its inevitable popularity. . . . Mr. Mackenzie is young at his work. If we except his 'Jason,' composed for the Bristol Festival last year, we are not sure that he has ventured before upon anything like a sustained operatic effort, but assuredly in 'Colomba' there is no evidence of a 'prentice hand, or of the hesitation or nervous advances of a musical neophyte. It is the production of a mature and self-conscious strength. Of a decidedly Wagnerian turn—that is, Wagnerian as we know it in 'Lohengrin'—he displays the rare and gifted capacity of expressing in the melody of the various parts the theme that pervades the mind of the artist. We catch from the music the eloquent interpretation of the true nature of Colomba, especially in the Vocero at the beginning of the first act; of the contending passions of Orso, and of the superior type of mind of the lawyer Giuseppe, who must not be confounded with the ordinary stage villain. To have achieved such a feat as this is, we consider, the highest effort of real genius. Mr. Mackenzie's melody is full of original purity and sweetness."

The Belfast News Letter after some general remarks says:—

"The masterly orchestration of the work cannot be denied. Every scene is illustrated with unerring art, and with a power that is thoroughly dramatic, without ever being stagey or common-place. . . . Having already told in these columns the story of 'Colomba,' it is unnecessary to repeat it at this time. It need only be said that the composer has succeeded in attracting a certain amount of sympathy toward the woman who is exciting her brother to an act of vengeance, by showing her as one who regards revenge as a sacred duty. The Vendetta, as a matter of fact, is regarded as a religious rite to be done on behalf of the dead. There is something magnificent and solemn in the frenzy of the woman as illustrated by the composer of the opera. In the first act the story of the death of Colomba's father and of the girl's oath to be avenged upon his murderer is told. The people are gradually worked up in interest as a native maiden sings the song which is the signal for the exercise of the Vendetta. This number is the one in which the Vendetta motif is introduced. It is a fine composition, and sounds like one agonising human wail. Its accompaniments are weird and very Wagnerian in style."

The last performance took place on the 26th ult., at Cork, when Madame Marie Roze undertook the part of Colomba for the first time, and in which she made a great success.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The following has been sent to us for publication:—

Annual Report of the Committee of Management to the Directors of the Royal Academy of Music, for the year 1883.

Your Committee are happy to report the continued fiscal and technical prosperity of the Royal and National Institution you commit to their management.

The financial welfare of the Academy is evinced in the fact that there is a surplus over the expenses of the year 1882, which is recorded in the Balance Sheet. This is largely consequent on the increased number of Students, which at the close of July last was greater than at any other period. Some of the then Pupils have since left the Academy, but have been to a great extent replaced by the entrance of seventy-three strangers in the Michaelmas Term, besides the new comers of the present Term, who are not yet counted. Some profit accrued from the Local Examinations of Musical Students throughout the country, in the spring of 1882, which was entered by 1,245 Candidates, of whom 143 obtained Honours and 698 passed in various branches of music. The Metropolitan Examination of Artists and Teachers, held in January, 1882, yielded also a small amount to the Academy Funds. Of the sixty-eight Candidates who submitted to this ordeal, fourteen were approved by the Examiners, and were consequently created Licentiates of the Royal Academy of Music.

The tokens of the musical success of the Institution are—

- 1.—The public reception of young artists who have recently completed their training here;
- 2.—The welcome to several singers, instrumentalists, and even composers, at important performances, who are still pursuing their studies;
- 3.—More than one application from establishments in good esteem for the services of the Operatic Class;
- 4.—The warm encouragement experienced by the solo performers, the band, and the chorus, at the Academy Concerts in St. James's Hall, and in the Academy Room; and
- 5.—The conscientious opinion of the professors and friends of music, who witness the talent displayed at the Fortnightly Meetings which are held throughout the year.

Your Committee are happy to record the munificence of Lady Goldsmid, who has again presented a Free Scholarship to be competed for in April by Female Pianists who have been studying for two years in the Academy, this being designed to facilitate to the most deserving the continued pursuit of excellence.

Prizes of Ten Guineas each were given last year, and are promised for this by Dr. Llewellyn Thomas to a Female Student for Declamatory English Singing; by Mr. Henry Evill to a Male Student for the same; by Mr. Heathcote Long to a Male Student for Pianoforte-Playing; by Mr. Charles Santley to Students of either sex for Accompaniment; and by Mr. Bonamy Dobree to a Student for Violoncello-Playing.

There are several individuals who pay the entire fees of one or more Students, but withhold their names from public announcement.

The Potter Exhibition, which is the oldest endowment at present on the books, the Westmorland, the Sterndale Bennett, the Parepa-Rosa, the Sir John Goss, the Balfé and the Thalberg Scholarships, are permanently secured.

It is to be regretted that no additions have been made to the Reserve Fund for reducing the fees of deserving and necessitous Students, and the amount as yet collected is insufficient for investment.

It has been found desirable to appoint a Finance Committee to have special charge of the monetary arrangements, and Messrs. J. Lamborn Cock, J. F. H. Read and Chas. E. Sparrow have been kind enough to accept the onerous and troublesome duties of this office.

The Examinations for the Memorial Prizes have been conducted by Musicians not teaching in the Academy, and those gentlemen have always given their gratuitous services.

It will be necessary during the summer vacation to enter upon heavy expenditure for the re-decoration of the Concert Room, which will seriously intrench on the funds at the disposal of your Committee.

An application was made in the autumn to Sir Henry Ponsonby, asking whether her Majesty might probably accept a request, were it proffered by the body of Directors, to allow a Concert to be performed by Academy Pupils in the presence of the Queen. Such a boon was granted by King George IV., who received the Pupils in Carlton Palace; such again was granted by King William IV. and Queen Adelaide, who visited the King's Theatre to witness the Pupils' Performance; it was therefore supposed a hope might not be groundless that a like grace might be accorded by the present Sovereign. The reply of Sir Henry was, however, to the effect that her Majesty was too much engaged to entertain the proposal were it to be officially made.

Your Committee regret the letter, which will be read to you, from Mr. George Wood, resigning his twofold office of Director and Member of the Committee, and which will, according to the Charter, necessitate his ceasing to act as Auditor. This resignation, on your acceptance, will cause a vacancy in each of the positions held by Mr. Wood, and the Committee beg to nominate the present Director, Mr. J. F. H. Read, for the places in the Committee and the Auditorship, and Mr. P. Sainton for the place on the Direction—who have both stated their willingness to serve if you appoint them.

Your Committee have to state that the communication to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, embodying the resolution passed at your adjourned Meeting on March 25, 1882, has been acknowledged by the Secretary of his Royal Highness without comment. This communication included a transcript of your reply to the invitation of the Lords of the Privy Council for remarks on the petition of his Royal Highness for a Charter for a Royal College of Music, in June, 1880, stating the elasticity of the Charter of this Institution, and offering to modify the working of the Academy in any way, according to this Charter, that might meet the views of the Prince of Wales.

In conclusion, your Committee wish openly and strenuously to declare that this Academy, honoured as it is by the patronage of the entire Royal Family, and strengthened by the confidence of the Musical Profession and the British Public, is capable of everything that is desirable for the furtherance of its grand national and educational object, so far as its pecuniary means extend.

JOHN GILL, Secretary.

March 17, 1883.

THE Dedication Festival was observed at St. John's, Red Lion Square, on the 6th ult. For the Communion, the music was Stainer in A, and "It came even to pass" (Ouseley) was the Anthem. At a special Musical Service on the 9th ult., a selection from Dr. Armes's Oratorio "St. John the Evangelist" was given. The solo "These are they" was well rendered by Master H. Tebbutt, Mr. H. Knott singing with much expression the music allotted to St. John. Mozart's motett "O God, when Thou appearest" and Woodward's Evening Anthem "The radiant morn" were also sung. During the collection, which was for the new organ, Bennett's Barcarole from his Fourth Concerto, arranged for organ and orchestra, was played. The Allegro from Handel's Fourth Concerto concluded the service. Mr. C. J. Viner conducted the musical arrangements.

The members of the St. Jude's Choral Society, East Brixton, gave their first Concert at the Brixton Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 1st ult. The programme consisted of a well-arranged selection of sacred and secular music. The choruses were sung with spirit, correctness and good expression, the latter feature being especially noticeable in Mozart's "Ave Verum" and "The Rose, Shamrock and Thistle," effectively arranged by the Conductor, Mr. Arthur Jarratt. The solo vocalists were Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke, whose fine voice and artistic singing were greatly admired; Madame Lita Jarratt, who also met with a hearty reception, and Mr. Arthur Weston, who displayed an excellent voice and good style.

At Dudley House, Park Lane, was given, on Saturday afternoon, the 5th ult., a Concert in aid of the General Lying-in Hospital, York Road, Lambeth. The ancient Hospital, established in 1765, is fortunate in having upon its staff Dr. F. H. Champneys, who is not only Doctor of Medicine but also learned in music, and has under his command an excellent amateur choir of ladies and gentlemen. The Concert opened with a Psalm (127th) for quartet and chorus, "Nisi Dominus ordificaverit domum," one of three composed by Handel during his Italian journey in 1707. The quartet was sung by Miss Hardy, Miss Annie Williams, Mr. H. E. Wooldridge and the Hon. Spencer G. Lyttelton. The choir in this work was at times somewhat unsteady; but the next item, an unpublished Motett, "Tu es Petrus," composed by Leonardo Leo in the severe style of Palestrina for a six-part chorus without accompaniment, was rendered in a manner which reflected great credit upon the members of the choir and their able Conductor, Dr. Champneys. This Motett was followed by a work of larger design and great beauty, Astorga's "Stabat Mater," composed for chorus, solo voices and orchestra, but accompanied on this occasion by the pianoforte. The solo music in this work was given by Miss Robertson, Miss A. Williams, Mr. H. E. Wooldridge, the Hon. Spencer G. Lyttelton and Mr. Wooldridge, who sang in place of Mr. Lionel Benson, absent from indisposition. Miss Robertson was heard to great advantage in the soprano solo "Sancta Mater." The second part of the programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection of secular music, commencing with the Madrigal by John Wilbye "Flora gave me fairest flowers," which was followed by an excellent choral composition from the pen of Dr. Champneys called "Lalage" (the words by S. T. Coleridge), which may be most aptly described as a madrigalian part-song, for much of the music has a true madrigalian flavour, while other portions introduce the more modern progressions and style of a part-song. The selection also included Wilbye's Madrigal "Sweet honey-sucking bees," Benet's "Thyrsis, sleepest thou?" Danby's glea "Awake, Æolian Lyre," sung by the choir; various solos, well rendered by Mrs. Lynedoch Moncrieff (who contributed a composition of her own), Miss Robertson, Miss Colthurst, Miss Annie Williams, Mr. Wilfrid Ward, Mr. Walker Warnock and Signor Parisetti; and Handel's Violin Sonata in A, performed by Herr Röver. The pianoforte accompaniments were played by Signor Roudi. The attendance was so numerous as to warrant the hope that the funds of the hospital have materially benefited by the Concert.

THE members of the St. John's Choral Society gave the final Concert of their sixth season at the Parochial Schools, East Dulwich, on Thursday, the 17th ult., the compositions performed being Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen." The rendering of the first work was particularly good throughout, and the choruses of the "May Queen" were sung with great precision. Miss Emily Gilloch presided at the piano, Mr. Charles Hancock (Mus. Bac., Oxon.) at the harmonium, and Mr. Charles Lawrence (Mus. Bac., Oxon.) conducted. At the conclusion of the concert, Mr. Lawrence, who has been Organist and Choirmaster at St. John's Church for upwards of nine years, was, on his retirement, presented by the Vicar, the Rev. Dr. Warburton, on behalf of the congregation, with a valuable gold watch and chain, and an illuminated address on vellum, in token of their esteem and in recognition of the efficient services rendered by him during that period.

A FINAL meeting of the old Sacred Harmonic Society, founded in 1832, took place on Tuesday, the 22nd ult., at the Society of Arts Rooms in John Street, Adelphi, when the distribution to the members of their shares of the assets took place, in accordance with the original rules of the Association. One of the members has already handed over his cheque to the new Society, incorporated last year, a prominent characteristic of which is that it is established exclusively for art purposes; and in the event of dissolution the assets must be given to some kindred institution. It is to be hoped that this good example will be imitated by other members of the old Society and those interested in the superior rendering of first-class sacred music.

THE sixth triennial Festival of the Handel and Haydn Society opened at Boston, U.S., on Tuesday the 1st ult., with a performance of Handel's "Ode to St. Cecilia's Day," and Rubinstein's sacred Opera "The Tower of Babel." The solo vocalists were Miss Emma Thursby, Mr. William J. Winch, Mr. C. R. Adams, Mr. J. F. Winch and Mr. M. W. Whitney. The Angel choruses were sung by a choir of boys, under the direction of Mr. S. B. Whitney. On the second day the programme consisted of "The Nativity," composed expressly for the Festival by Professor Paine, and Cherubini's Mass in D minor. These works were splendidly rendered, Professor Paine's Cantata producing a marked effect. The solo vocalists in the "Nativity" were Miss Thursby, Miss M. Phillips, Messrs. G. W. Want and M. W. Whitney; and in the Mass Mrs. Osgood, Miss Winant, Mr. Toedt and Mr. Henschel; Mrs. F. P. Whitney and Mr. A. Pennell joining in the sestet. On the third day a miscellaneous programme was performed in the afternoon, the evening Concert being devoted to Gounod's "Redemption." The performance of this fine work was one of general excellence, Miss Thursby, Miss Winant, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. Henschel being highly successful in their solos, and the choruses being given both with decision and appropriate expressiveness throughout. Max Bruch's secular Oratorio "Arminius" was the work selected for the fourth day, the soloists being Miss Winant, Mr. Adams and Mr. Henschel, who was the original singer of the title rôle. The Oratorio was conducted by the composer, and received with great applause. On the fifth day a miscellaneous programme was provided; and the Festival closed on the sixth day with a performance of "The Messiah." The works had been excellently rehearsed by Mr. Zerrahn.

M^DLLE. ALICE ROSELLI gave a Concert at Steinway Hall, on the 1st ult., under distinguished patronage, and before a numerous audience. The bénéficiaire was assisted in the vocal department by Miss Helen Meason, Madame Enriquez, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Signor Villa and Mr. Santley, and the solo instrumentalists were Mr. Kuhe, Miss Kathleen O'Reilly and Miss Harriett Sasse (pianoforte), Herr Poznanski (violin) and Mr. Churchill Sibley (organ). The concert-giver was heard to much advantage in Cowen's "Last dream," Louisa Gray's "Dermot and I," Gounod's "Noël" (with violin and organ obbligati), Herr Poznanski and Mr. Sibley) and a new song composed by Mr. Sibley, in all of which she received warm and well-deserved applause. Amongst the other vocal items in the programme may be mentioned an effective new song by Desmond L. Ryan, "Hail and farewell" (well sung by Madame Enriquez), Gounod's "When in the early morn" (for the excellent rendering of which Mr. Cummings was enthusiastically recalled) and the same composer's "Le Nom de Marie," so well sung by Mr. Santley that he was compelled to return to the platform, when, instead of repeating the song, he gave "There is a green hill far away." The instrumental solos were also highly successful. Messrs. Wilhelm Ganz, William Carter and Lindsay Sloper were the accompanists.

"YE LONDON GLEE MEN" gave their first Smoking Concert at the Guildhall Tavern, Gresham-street, on Thursday evening, the 10th ult., under the direction of Mr. Richard Mackway. The programme comprised glees, madrigals, songs, &c., and ranged in date from John Benet's madrigal "Flow, O my tears" (1599), to Wagner's chorus of Norwegian sailors from the "Flying Dutchman." It also included "Strike it up, neighbour," Weelkes (1608), and Dr. Cooke's laughably pedantic glee "Amo, amas"; while modern writers were represented by Hatton's "Warrior's Song"; "Crown'd with clusters of the vine," from Alfred Mellon's Opera of "Victorie"; Franz Abt's "Vineta"; "I gave my harp to sorrow's hand," by Bishop; and Mendelssohn's "Love and Wine." Vocal solos were contributed by Mr. Frank Ward, Mr. E. Etherington and Mr. Richard Mackway. Pianoforte selections were also given by Messrs. Walter Mackway and William Horsey. The Concert was brought to a close by the singing of "Auld Lang Syne," arranged as a song with vocal accompaniment by Mr. Richard Mackway, and sung by Mr. A. J. Kestin.

On the 1st ult., the Praed Street Chapel Choir gave a very successful Concert, in aid of the New Organ Fund. In the first part, which consisted of sacred music, the choir sang the choruses "Then round about the stary throne," "How lovely are the messengers" and "O Father, whose almighty power" with good effect, and solos by Mrs. Roe, Miss Easterbrook, Mr. E. A. Baker and Mr. J. Baker were well rendered. Mr. F. R. Kinkee performed an organ solo in the first part, and a pianoforte solo in the second, which was miscellaneous. The part-songs "Sweet and low," "A Wife's Song" (Barbny), Pinsuti's "Good night, beloved," Mercadante's "Sweet is the hour of rest," and several popular songs by Sullivan, Loder, and others were efficiently rendered. Mr. F. R. Kinkee presided at the organ, and was associated with Mr. W. J. Green as accompanist to the songs. The choir-leader, Mr. H. Sampson, conducted.

For the first time at Cardiff, a performance of Gounod's "Redemption" was recently given at the Drill Hall, by the Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. D. C. Davies, assisted by professional instrumentalists from London, Birmingham and other places. The choruses were well balanced and rendered with good effect, but the expression, in several instances, was not so fine or careful as might have been desired. The instrumental portions were played remarkably well, and highly appreciated by a large and cultivated audience. On the whole, it may be said the Society acquitted itself in a very creditable manner. The few faults which were noticeable will, no doubt, be corrected in the next rendering of this difficult but exceedingly impressive Oratorio. The principal vocalists were Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Montague Worlock, Miss Mary Davies, Miss Gertrude Lewis and Miss Jenny Lewis.

The first Concert of the South Hampstead Musical Society was given at the Hampstead Vestry Hall, on the 22nd ult., before a large audience. The choir, under the able direction of Mr. Arthur J. Greenish, sang with the utmost steadiness and certainty of intonation in Cowen's Cantata "The Rose Maiden," which formed the first part of the programme, the solo parts in this work being effectively rendered by M^dme. Worrell, Miss Frances Hipwell, Mr. Alfred Kenningham and Mr. H. Horscroft. In the miscellaneous part which followed, a conspicuous feature was a new song by Mr. Greenish, "Sweethearts still," well sung by Mr. Kenningham, which elicited a warm and well-deserved encore. Some part-songs, too, were admirably given by the choir, and Mr. Frank Arnold contributed a violin solo with much success. Mr. Corke and Mr. Dovaston presided at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively with much skill and judgment.

THE members of the Catford Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Frederick Stevenson, gave a performance of Hofmann's "Melusina" in the Lecture Room, Lewisham, on Tuesday, the 1st ult. Miss Sheldon, Miss Heywood, Mr. E. R. Tasman and Mr. Wm. Webster, jun., were the soloists, and there was an excellent band, led by Mr. Carrington. The choir sang exceedingly well. Part II. included Schubert's Overture to "Rosamunde" and Mendelssohn's Rondo brillante for pianoforte and orchestra, the solo part of which was played by Miss Bella James in a brilliant and finished manner. Mr. E. C. Silverthorne in Mr. Stevenson's song "Many years ago" and Mr. Webster in Ricci's "Sulla poppa del mio brik" (with orchestra) met with enthusiastic recalls. The Concert closed with Romberg's Symphony for Strings and Toy Instruments, the latter of which were played by ladies. Mr. Edward Trotter was the accompanist.

THE Crouch End Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," at Christ Church Schoolroom, on Tuesday, April 24. The principals engaged were Miss Hilda Coward, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Alfred Kenningham and Mr. Frank Ward, assisted in the quartets by the Misses A. Scott and Long and Messrs. Jones and Richardson. The accompaniments were played by a professional string quintet, with Mr. C. W. Lovejoy at the piano, and Mr. J. G. Callcott at the harmonium. The chorus, which was well balanced, numbered nearly 100 voices. Mr. Alfred J. Dye conducted.

THE Brixton Choral and Orchestral Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" on the 7th ult., at Gresham Hall. The soloists—Madame Worrell, Mdlle. Raymond, Mr. H. Yates and Mr. Lewis Thomas—gained considerable applause for their singing of the well-known music, Madame Worrell and Mr. Thomas being especially successful. The choruses were generally well rendered. The accompaniments were played by a small band led by Mr. F. Decker, the organist was Mr. W. E. Stark, and Mr. W. Lemare conducted, as usual. The Society has performed during the past season Handel's "Jephtha," Gadsby's "Lord of the Isles," Prout's "Alfred," and Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." A complimentary benefit Concert for Mr. Lemare was announced for the 31st ult., at which Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and a miscellaneous selection were to be performed.

THE 172nd Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Piccolo Rooms, on the 4th ult. The programme was a well-chosen miscellaneous one, and gave great satisfaction. The artists were Miss Edith Phillips, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Master Frank Charlton, Mr. Arthur Thompson and Mr. Chaplin Henry, all of whom met with a cordial reception. The part-singing by the choir included "Now tramp" (Bishop), "The Nightingale" (Mendelssohn), "Now is the month of Maying" (Morley) and "The Song of the Vikings" (Eaton Fanning), the latter being encored. The Cantata "May Day" (Macfarren) was the principal item in the second part of the programme, the soprano solos being taken by Miss Phillips. The pianoforte and harmonium accompaniments were played by Miss Edith Mahon and Mr. F. R. Kinke. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

A Choral Festival was held at the Church of St. Augustine and St. Faith, Watling Street, E.C., on Friday evening last, the 25th ult., being the eve of the Festival of one of the patron saints (St. Augustine) of the church. The service was preceded by an anthem, Mendelssohn's three-part treble motett "Ye sons of Israel, thank the Lord," well rendered by some of the boys of the St. Paul's Cathedral Choir; Dr. Stainer's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in B flat were used, and "Now we are ambassadors," followed by "How lovely are the messengers" (from "St. Paul") constituted the anthem. At the conclusion of the service, Hiller's Cantata "A Song of Victory" was given in its entirety, in which, as indeed throughout the service, the Cathedral contingent rendered decidedly valuable assistance. Mr. C. F. South presided at the organ.

THE New Shakespeare Society gave a Musical Evening at the University College, Gower-street, on the 11th ult., under the direction of Mr. J. Greenhill, who wrote a pamphlet for the occasion containing biographical sketches of, and much valuable information respecting, the various composers. The programme was devoted to a selection of the vocal music of Shakespeare, which, being arranged in chronological order, illustrated in a most interesting manner the gradual progress of vocal music from the Elizabethan era to the present time. Specimens were given in their respective periods of madrigals, glees, choruses, part-songs and solos, in all twenty-five composers being represented. The solos were well rendered by Misses Jessie Royd, Alice Crang, Helena Rich, Minna Addeley; Messrs. Sheard, Tennyson Cole, Thurlay Beale and J. Greenhill. Signor Dinelli accompanied.

A CONCERT in aid of the funds of the Royal College of Music was given at the new Examination Schools, Oxford, on the 1st ult. Two attractive items in the programme were Miss Emily Shinner's violin solos and the performance of some pianoforte pieces by Madame Helen Hopekirk. Vocal solos were also contributed with much success by Miss Wakefield, Mrs. Dyke, the Rev. J. E. Sheppard and Mr. Thorndike; and special mention must be made of the excellent rendering of a duet for two pianofortes by Messrs. Parratt and Taylor. After the Concert a Conversazione took place in the class-rooms, when an interesting collection of musical instruments, autographs and works on the history and theory of music was exhibited. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was present both at the Concert and the Conversazione.

THE Sydenham Amateur Choral Society gave a very successful Concert, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, at the Sydenham Lecture Hall, on Tuesday, the 8th ult., when the following works were performed: Gounod's "De profundis" and "Ave Maria"; Mozart's motett "Glory, honour, praise and power"; and Spohr's "Hymn to St. Cecilia," with part-songs by Macfarren, Pinsuti, Bennett and Gastoldi. The solos were rendered by Misses Randell, Bentley and Tweedie, and Messrs. Calver, J. McD. Joy and the Rev. J. G. Hooton. Herr Bernhardt, in the absence of Herr Jung, played a violin solo by F. David in a most finished style, and Mr. Docker contributed a pianoforte solo. Miss Pottinger (pianoforte) and Mr. G. E. Croager (organ) rendered valuable service as accompanists.

HERR KOCH gave his third annual Pianoforte Recital at the Northfield Hall, Highgate, on Thursday evening, the 17th ult. The programme included Bach's Fantasia in C minor, Beethoven's Andante (Op. 35), Mendelssohn's Andante con moto and Presto, one of Mendelssohn's Songs without Words, Chopin's Scherzo in B minor (Op. 20) and Polonaise No. 5, Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 12, and an original galop, "Bucephale." Vocal solos were contributed by Mdlme. Bonner and Mr. Fulkerson, the most notable being "Far greater in his lowly state" (Gounod), "Adelaide" (Beethoven), and "O swallow, swallow" (Moncrief). A very effective rendering of the duet "Una notte a Venezia" elicited a well-deserved encore.

THE Senate of the Royal University of Ireland has appointed Sir Robert Stewart and Dr. Joseph Smith joint Professors of Music in that Institution. Sir Robert Stewart has for many years held the corresponding post in the University of Dublin. Dr. Smith, though a much younger man, has already proved himself worthy of the honour now conferred upon him. In 1880 he was awarded the two prizes offered by the London Sunday School Choir for the composition of a part-song and of an anthem, and in the same year he obtained the Welsh Eisteddfod Prize of Fifteen Guineas and a Gold Medal for a setting of the 67th Psalm. He has also held, for the past two years, the post of Examiner in Music under the Board of Intermediate Education for Ireland.

THE members of the Blackheath Society performed Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron," in the Rink Hall, on Friday, the 4th ult. Miss Ambler sang the title-rolé music most charmingly, and, as Dunkerron, Mr. Ernest Caris showed a most sympathetic voice and finished vocalisation. The singing of the choir was admirable throughout Smart's work and in the part-songs. The orchestra was led by Mr. Carl Jung. The more successful numbers of the second part were Sydenham's "Maiden of the Fleur-de-Lys," in which the choir gave a perfect specimen of its part-singing; Gounod's "Jewel Song" ("Faust"), by Miss Ambler; and the Conductor's Orchestral Gavotte in F major. The hall was crowded to excess. Mr. Edward Trotter presided at the piano, and Mr. Stevenson conducted.

THE Dinner in aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund, which is announced to take place at Willis's Rooms on the 21st inst., promises to be very successful. The chair will be taken by the Right Hon. G. Cavendish Bentinck, M.P., P.C., and the list of patrons includes many of the most distinguished musicians and amateurs, besides numerous high dignitaries of the Church. The music to be performed during the evening will be made specially interesting by the rendering of a selection which will include several of the finest specimens of madrigal writing. A large professional choir, representing various Cathedrals, her Majesty's Chapels Royal, &c., will give their services on the occasion.

We understand that, for the present, the Service at Westminster Abbey every Wednesday afternoon is to be sung by men's voices only. This arrangement, which has been in contemplation for some time, has only been possible since the addition of six assistant lay vicars, and will have the advantage of relieving the choirboys of their duties one afternoon a week.

On the 8th ult. a Concert was given at Myddelton Hall by the Islington Presbyterian Church Choral Society, the programme consisting of Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," Macfarren's "May Day," and a miscellaneous selection. The choruses were very creditably rendered, and praise is due to the Conductor, Mr. J. C. Keynes, for the careful training the members of the Society have evidently received at his hands. The soloists were Miss Ellen Atkins, Mrs. Startup, Mr. Dalgety Henderson and Mr. W. G. Forington. Mr. Tait, at the harmonium, accompanied most judiciously, and Mr. Fountain Meen rendered valuable service as pianist, his solos being much appreciated and warmly applauded.

An excellent Concert took place at the Victoria Coffee Hall, Waterloo Road, on the 3rd ult., by the Royal Victoria Choir, when a selection of Irish and Scotch part-songs and choruses were given. The band of the Scots Guards (under the direction of Mr. J. P. Clarke) played "Reminiscences of Ireland and Scotland," and Jullien's "British Army Quadrilles," assisted by the pipers of the regiment under Pipe-Major Barron, and a five-and-drum band under Mr. Davis. The solo vocalists were Miss Annette Bourn, Miss T. Goodhew, Miss Melville, Mr. S. Kessell, Mr. Sanderson and Mr. R. W. Heney, all of whom sang Irish ballads and songs. The accompanist was Miss Annie Daymond, and the Conductor Mr. William Sexton.

The second Concert of the Upton Choral Society was given on the 1st ult., at the Stratford Town Hall, before a crowded audience. This choir obtained the first prize at the late Musical Festival held in the vicinity. The programme comprised Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," Macfarren's "May Day," songs and part-songs; the soloists being Miss Mary Davies and Mr. A. Kenningham. The choir sang with great effect "Now the grass with dew is wet"; and a pianoforte duet, played by Messrs. F. C. Kitson and G. B. Gilbert, was much appreciated. Mr. J. Proudman conducted, and Mr. F. C. Kitson accompanied throughout.

The Victoria Glee Club, numbering thirty-five male voices, gave a Concert in aid of a Pianoforte Fund, at the Horns Assembly Rooms, Kennington Park, on the 8th ult., when several glees were sung with excellent effect, some being aided by orchestral accompaniments. Handel's "Occasional" Overture was played by the band at the commencement of the Concert. The principal vocalists were Miss Matilda Roby, Miss Annette Bourn, Mr. Chas. White, Mr. Egbert Roberts, Mr. W. Sexton and Mr. R. W. Heney. Pianoforte accompanists Miss Annie Daymond, Mr. A. Cox and Mr. J. Halle; Conductor, Mr. W. Sexton.

The Misses Larkcom and Myers gave a very successful Concert before a large audience on the 23rd ult., at 19, Harley Street, by kind permission of Mrs. Morell Mackenzie. Both ladies pleased greatly in their songs, and they were well supported by Miss Carlotta Elliot, Miss Margaret Hancock, Miss Adelina Dinelli, Miss Randegger, Messrs. Redfern Hollins, Bernard Lane, Bridson, Bicknell, Young and Signor Foli. Madame Antoinette Sterling was prevented from singing by a severe cold, though she appeared in the concert room. In her stead a young lady, Miss Kate Drew, sang the Swallows' song from Thomas's "Esmeralda."

A SPECIAL Musical Service was held in St. John's Wood Presbyterian Church, Marlborough Place, on Wednesday evening, April 25, when Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was sung as the Anthem, in addition to well-known hymns. The choruses were well rendered by the recently formed Choral Society in connection with the church. Mr. F. N. Abernethy, F.C.O. (Organist of St. Saviour's, Southwark), played the organ accompaniments in a masterly manner, and Mr. F. G. Edwards (Organist of the church) conducted.

The Kyrie Choirs, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave a performance of "Elijah" on the 2nd ult., in St. Saviour's Church, Poplar. The principal soloists were Miss Agnes Allen, Miss Minna Vivian, Mr. John F. Probert and Mr. Ap-Herbert. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ.

Mr. JOHN FAUX BOARDMAN, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Saviour's, Herne Hill Road, gave his first benefit Concert at Gresham Hall, Brixton, on Thursday evening, the 10th ult., before a numerous audience. Under the conductorship of the beneficiare, part-music was very commendably rendered by members of the voluntary church-choir, which was augmented for the occasion. The principle soloists were Miss Ada Tolkien, Miss Annie Ganland, Messrs. J. W. Hanson, Henry Pyatt and J. F. Boardman, minor parts being supported by Miss Patten and Mr. E. J. Corbett. Mr. J. Harrison presided at the pianoforte.

A CONCERT was given at the Stratford Town Hall, on Thursday, the 3rd ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Sidney Vernon. The vocalists were: Miss Clara Dowle (Corporation Exhibitioner, Guildhall School of Music), Miss Minnie Hyman, Miss James, Miss Foot, Miss Bloom, Mr. Walters and Mr. Westlake. Miss Marie Schumann (De Keyser Exhibitioner, Guildhall School of Music), violin; Miss Emily Fehr (Royal College of Music) and Miss Adela Duckham (Corporation Exhibitioner, Guildhall School of Music), pianoforte. The Concert was highly successful.

On Tuesday, the 15th ult., at Mr. John Dawson's, Oakleigh New Park Road, Clapham Park, Mr. Charles Dowdeswell gave the second of a series of Lectures on "Richard Wagner and his Works." The Lecture, which was deeply interesting, displayed a complete mastery of the subject, and was marked by earnest enthusiasm and poetical feeling. "Lohengrin" and "Tristan und Isolde" were the special subjects of the Lecture, and selections from these works were well rendered by Miss Plummer, Miss Johnson, Messrs. W. B. Smith and Walter Dowdeswell. Mr. W. C. Ward, as accompanist, gave valuable assistance.

A VERY successful performance of Farmer's Oratorio "Christ and His Soldiers" was given on the 9th ult., in Wycliffe Chapel, Philpot Street, Commercial Road, under the direction of the Choirmaster, Mr. Geo. Merritt. The solo vocalists were Mrs. J. Chappell, Miss Howard, Mr. Edwin Leslie and Mr. A. S. Lupton. The choruses were excellently sung by the Wycliffe Chapel Choir, accompanied by a full band, under the direction of Mr. E. H. Brock. Mr. G. E. Hedges ably presided at the organ, and Miss M. Bonalack at the pianoforte.

The third Concert of the season of the Cecilian Musical Society took place at the Hackney Town Hall, on Tuesday, the 8th ult., the proceeds being devoted to the Hackney Benevolent Pension Society. The programme was miscellaneous, including several part-songs and operatic selections. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Fitch, Miss Oxenham, Miss Howard, Messrs. MacDonnell, C. Jones, Scowen, Baxter, Fearn, Glynn and Haswell. Miss L. M. Glynn and Mr. Arthur C. Tattersall also contributed pianoforte solos. Signor A. de Baraty was conductor.

We understand that the organ at Westminster Abbey is at present undergoing entire reconstruction at the hands of the eminent builders Messrs. Hill. When completed it will contain between fifty and sixty speaking stops, and will be fitted with all the modern improvements. It will be blown by means of a gas engine. It is hoped that the instrument will be ready for use in the autumn. Two cases, of elaborate finish, have been designed by the Abbey architect, Mr. Pearson, the organ being divided as hitherto, but being placed at a much greater elevation.

On Whit Sunday afternoon the second part of Gounod's "Redemption," and on Trinity Sunday the second and third parts of the same work, were given at St. Stephen's, South Kensington. The orchestra consisted of strings, harp, two trumpets and tympani, the other parts being filled in on the organ. The solos were taken by Mr. Bernard Lane, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Grime, and Mr. Stedman's choirboys. Mr. Thomas Pettit presided at the organ and, the whole performance, which was very effective, was under the direction of Mr. Stedman.

On Thursday, the 17th ult., the Oxford Choral Society, under the baton of Mr. C. Harford Lloyd, gave a performance of "The Redemption" in the Sheldonian Theatre. The principals were Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Cravino, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. King.

At the Gloucester Musical Festival, which, as we have already stated, will commence on September 4, the following works will be performed: "Elijah," "Redemption," "Lobgesang," "Messiah," Mass in C (Beethoven), "Waldpurgis Night," and Symphony in G minor (Mozart). In addition to the above the following have, we believe, been specially composed for the Festival: "St. Mary Magdalen" (Dr. Stainer), "Sennacherib" (Dr. Arnold), "Elegiac Symphony" (C. Villiers Stanford), a short Choral Work (Dr. Hubert Parry), and an Anthem (C. Harford Lloyd). The vocalists engaged are Miss A. Williams, Miss Mary Davies, Miss Avigliana, Madame Patey, Miss H. Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Newth, Mr. F. King, Mr. Brereton, and Mr. Santley.

A VERY successful Concert was given by Miss Annie Matthews at Brixton Hall, on Thursday evening, the 3rd ult., assisted by Madame Adeline Paget, Miss Lizzie Evans, Miss Edith Daniel, Miss Marian McKenzie; Messrs. Arthur Thompson, Wakefield Reed, Franklin Clive, James Budd, and R. Odell. Miss Matthews sang with much ability, gaining a cordial reception for each of her contributions; and a flute solo was excellently given by Mr. Collard. Mr. Turlie Lee accompanied.

THE second annual Concert of the Choir of St. Augustine's, Highbury, took place on the 17th ult. The first part consisted of Smart's Cantata, "The Bride of Dunkerron," the solo parts being sustained by Madame Worrell, Mr. A. L. Fryer and Mr. Frank Ward; Miss Boxell at the pianoforte. The second part was miscellaneous, and comprised songs, a duet and pianoforte solo, and organ solos. Miss Lomas was an efficient accompanist. Mr. Charles Strong conducted.

MR. FRANK BRADLEY, Professor of the Organ, Trinity College, London, &c., has been engaged to give Organ Recitals on Mondays and Wednesdays, at the Fisheries International Exhibition during the season. Programmes of the Recitals are issued in the building, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to Messrs. Lewis, and Henry Jones and Sons respectively in the Japan and West Gallery sections of the Exhibition, where the organs are situated.

WE regret to hear that Mr. Frederick Clay has been compelled to abandon his intention of finishing his new secular Cantata "Sardanapalus" for the Leeds Musical Festival, owing to a variety of adverse circumstances, not the least important of which is the illness of Mr. W. G. Wills, the librettist. Mr. Clay has offered to take the subject, and commence another Cantata de novo; but the Festival Committee has declined to accede to this proposition, in consequence of the risk it would involve.

THE Festival of the London Gregorian Choral Association, which was to have been held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday evening, the 10th ult., has, we learn, been indefinitely postponed, and it is scarcely probable that it will be held at all this year. The morning portion of the Festival, consisting of choral celebration of the Holy Eucharist, took place in St. Thomas's Church, Regent Street, as announced, on the 10th ult.

"ANTIGONE," with Mendelssohn's music, is to be performed in the Tyne Theatre, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the 13th and 14th inst., with Mrs. Scott-Siddons in the principal character. A great deal of care has been bestowed upon the arrangements. New scenery, by a local artist, is to be painted, and the whole of the actors, including the chorus of sixty performers, will be correctly dressed.

AN evening Concert, under the direction of Mr. Stedman, took place at the Birkbeck Institution, on the 16th ult. The artists were Signora Angelina del Santo, Miss Jessie Griffin, Miss Damian, Miss J. Russell, Mr. Stedman, Mr. Hutchinson and Mr. Stedman's choirboys, M. Buziau (violin), Miss Nina Buziau (pianoforte) and Mr. Jeffreys (accompanist). The programme was miscellaneous, and was much appreciated by the audience.

MR. ARTHUR MATTHISON, whose death took place during last month, was known both as an author and an actor in singing parts. Amongst other works he wrote the libretto of Mr. Barnby's Cantata "Rebekah."

MESSRS. HELE AND Co., of Plymouth, have just completed a very handsome organ for the saloon at Membland Hall, the residence of Mr. E. C. Baring. The instrument, which has been built in a costly manner, is remarkable not only for its excellent tone, but for the disposition of its various parts, and it is claimed that there are few organs in the West of England which can in any way compare with it in these respects.

ONE of Mr. Baillie Hamilton's new instruments, the "Vocalion," has recently been erected in the north-west chapel of St. Paul's Cathedral, and is used for the hymn at the 1:15 p.m. daily service. The tone is somewhat rounder than, but very similar to, that of the harmonium for which it has been substituted.

ORGAN Recitals have been given at St. John's, Waterloo Road, by Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, on the 1st ult., assisted by Miss Linda Rivers and Mr. Henry Blaikie as vocalists; and by Mr. A. A. Yeatman, Organist of the Parish Church, Finchley, on the 17th ult., on which occasion Mr. Joseph Wilson was the vocalist. The fortnightly series of Recitals will be resumed in September.

A NEW Organ has been erected in St. Peter's Church, Hoxton Square, by Mr. Speechly. Recitals were given on the occasion of the opening thereof by Mr. G. C. Martin, Mus. Bac. (Sub-organist of St. Paul's Cathedral), Mr. F. Meen (Organist of Dr. Allon's Chapel, Islington), Mr. E. Webb (Organist of St. Peter's) and Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac. (Organist of St. Stephen's, Lewisham).

THE fourth General Triennial Festival of Choirs in the Archdeaconry of Worcester is announced to be held in Worcester Cathedral on the 7th inst. The services will be at 11.30 a.m. and 4.30 p.m., and the sermon in the morning will be preached by the Rev. F. G. Holland, Canon of Canterbury. Sixty-four choirs will take part in the Festival, numbering about 1,700 voices.

A CONCERT was given on Thursday evening, the 24th ult., at Brixton Hall, by Mr. J. Stuart Crook, who was assisted by Miss José Sherrington, Miss Marian McKenzie, Miss Ellen Marchant and Mlle. P. Brûé; Messrs. Egbert Roberts and A. B. Ridley. Recitations were given by Miss Alexes Leighton and Mr. Alfred M. Willis. Mr. J. Elliott and Signor Odoardo Barri presided at the pianoforte.

AN excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and Spohr's "Last Judgment" was given in the Congregational Church, South Norwood, on the 9th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss Evelyn Bawtree, Madame Jennie Bawtree, Mr. Arthur Wilmot and Mr. Alfred Calk. Herr E. Eberwein led the band, and Mr. Josiah Bawtree conducted.

ON Ascension Day there was a Special Choral Service held at St. Mary Abchurch, Cannon Street, at 7.30 p.m. The choir of the church performed a selection from "The Messiah" and Stainer's Festival Service in B flat. Mr. Albert E. Bishop, the Organist of the church, presided at the organ and the music was under his direction. There was a large congregation.

THE competition for the Visetti Scholarship at the Watford School of Music took place at the Public Library, on Thursday, the 10th ult. The examiner was Mr. W. H. Cummings, and the Scholarship, which entitles the holder to one-year's gratuitous instruction in singing, under Mr. Visetti, was awarded to Miss C. S. Grindley.

THE Chevalier Guido Papini, the well-known violinist, had the honour of being recently received by his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh in private audience, and presenting a copy of his "Method for Violin," of which his Royal Highness has accepted the dedication.

UNDER the direction of Miss Edith Daniel, a Concert in aid of the Sunday schools connected with Loughborough Park Chapel, was given in the Schoolroom on Tuesday evening, the 8th ult. Miss Daniel was assisted by Miss Annie Matthews, Miss Alice Seymour and Mr. Joseph Hay.

MR. A. RAMSDEN, a Leeds music-seller, has undertaken to subscribe £60 per year for five years for the maintenance of Mr. Barton, of Leeds, who recently secured a scholarship at the Royal College of Music.

The Dean and Chapter of Salisbury have arranged for a Festival, on a large scale, of Diocesan Choirs, to take place in the Cathedral a year hence—namely, on May 29, 1884. It is said that 4,000 voices or more are expected to take part in the Service, and that Dr. Stainer has promised to compose an anthem for the occasion.

A BALLOON Garden Party and Promenade Concert by the London Conservatoire of Music took place on Saturday, the 5th ult., at Lillie Bridge Grounds, West Brompton, when a lengthy programme was successfully executed. The Conductors were Mr. F. A. Jewson, Mr. W. W. Meadows and Mr. Lansdowne Cottell.

On Tuesday evening, the 1st ult., a good performance of "May Day" (Macfarren) was given by the Bethnal Green Choral Society, the soprano solo being effectively sung by Madame Clara West. The choruses were also well rendered. Accompanist, Mr. W. West; Conductor, Mr. R. A. Slater.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of "The Growth and Cultivation of the Voice in Singing," by Madame St. Germaine, Professor of Singing at the Crystal Palace School of Art and at the Guildhall School of Music.

THE Festival of the Army Guild of the Holy Standard will take place in St. Paul's Cathedral, on Tuesday, the 5th inst., at 7 p.m. The music is undertaken by a portion of the choir of the Gregorian Association, which will be assisted by a military band.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave a performance of "Elijah" in St. Barnabas' Church, King Square, on the 16th ult. The soloists were Miss Fusselle, Mrs. Oram, Mr. W. E. Glaziers and Mr. Albert Orme. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ.

MR. HUMPHREY J. STARK writes to say that his name should have been included in the list of performers upon Messrs. Maley, Young and Oldknow's new organ, noticed in our last number, as he gave a Recital upon the instrument on April 3.

MR. SINCLAIR DUNN was, on the 21st ult., presented with a purse of sovereigns from the members of the Marylebone Presbyterian choir, on the occasion of his retiring from the Choirmastership of the Church.

MR. GORING THOMAS'S Opera "Esmeralda," produced by Mr. Carl Rosa at Drury Lane during his recent season, has been accepted by Mr. Julius Hofmann for the Stadt-Theater, Cologne, where it will be given next autumn.

A "SIR JULIUS BENEDICT Pianoforte Exhibition" and a "Sims Reeves Vocal Exhibition" have just been added to the prizes previously established in connection with Trinity College, London.

WE are informed that Mr. C. B. Jefferys has purchased the pianoforte business lately carried on by Messrs. Scotcher and Son, of Birmingham, and that he will continue the business in the same premises.

THE performance of "The Redemption," which was to have taken place at Ipswich this month, is postponed until the winter.

THE Organistship of York Minster has been rendered vacant by the retirement of Dr. E. G. Monk, who has held it for upwards of twenty-four years.

MR. FREDERICK A. JEWSON has been unanimously elected by the trustees, Organist and Director of the Music to the Wesleyan Chapel, Great Queen Street.

DR. HUBERT PARRY is writing music to the "Birds" of Aristophanes, which is to be produced at Cambridge in next October term.

THE Organ Recitals at St. John's, Waterloo Road, will be discontinued during the present and following summer months.

THE whole of the copyrights of Messrs. Ewald and Co., of Argyll Street, have been purchased by Mr. C. Jefferys, of Berners Street.

A STUDENTS' Concert, the first of the present term, was given at Trinity College, London, on the 15th ult.

THE Melbourne Philharmonic Society has announced "The Redemption" for performance in the autumn.

THE next Concert of the Auckland Choral Society (New Zealand) will comprise Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri."

REVIEWS.

La Gioconda: An Opera in Four Acts. The libretto by Tobia Gorrio, the music by A. Ponchielli. English adaptation by Henry Hersee. [Ricordi].

If the reader turn to page 395 of THE MUSICAL TIMES for 1880, he will see a notice in some detail of the above Opera, à propos to its first performance at Florence. We need not, therefore, set in array here all the facts connected with the work, but the more important may be stated at the risk of a "vain repetition." The libretto is an adaptation, by Arrigo Boito—over whose identity the name "Tobia Gorrio" throws but a thin veil—from Victor Hugo's gloomy though powerful drama "Angelo." It was written some years ago for Ponchielli, who first produced the Opera at Milan, April 8, 1876, subsequently making important changes in it and scoring a success at Genoa in 1879. Since then "La Gioconda" has had a career of increasing good fortune, the best measure of which, perhaps, is the fact that the directors of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, have included the work in the scheme of the present season. Let us see, as far as may be from study of a pianoforte score only, in what respects, if any, "La Gioconda" merits so distinguished a position.

Against the story of the Opera no charge of wanting intensity can be made. It would have pleased Verdi in his "Trovatore" and "Rigoletto" days, so highly is it flavoured with crime and passion. Indeed, but for the continued popularity of lyric dramas in which the various characters are continually driving a coach-and-four through the decalogue, we should be inclined to think "La Gioconda" more than a little too strong for refined and cultured tastes. As matters go, we entertain no such idea. An operatic public never objects to the accumulation of horrors upon horrors' head; the reason being perhaps not so much that these things are loved for their own sake as that they often inspire the composer to do his best—witness the "Miserere" in "Il Trovatore" and the closing quartet in "Rigoletto." Whether Ponchielli is capable of such inspiration remains to be seen, but the provocation is here unquestionable. Writing of the libretto the author of the notice above referred to said: "The substance of this tissue of intrigue is that Gioconda the doomed heroine has the misfortune to be loved by a villain whilst she loves a man who in his turn is in love with the wife of another. Passion, plotting and poison are the three principal agents at play in the story which . . . is in truth not very moral but none the less intensely Italian." It must be admitted here that Boito has skillfully striven to afford contrast. He has wreathed the head of sin with flowers, and he makes mirth and jollity around the form of death. He never, it is true, conceals the character of either by such means, but art demands that even the gloomiest of pictures shall not be all black. The question of course arises whether any good purpose is served by a display of the worst passions of humanity, and, were it pressed, we should be driven to answer that "La Gioconda," if it conveys any lesson at all, teaches that a blind and cruel chance presides over the fortunes of men. But the matter need not be discussed. We modern English are not ancient Greeks and do not require our dramatists to sanctify by a lofty end the means they employ.

It would serve little purpose, and take up much space, to show in what respects the book of "La Gioconda" differs from Hugo's "Angelo." The points of variation are many; points of agreement being confined to certain leading motives and incidents. In fact, Boito's work may be regarded as standing apart from that of the great Frenchman, to be judged entirely per se. So, at any rate, we prefer to look upon it.

The first act, entitled "The Lion's Mouth," opens in the great court of the Doge's Palace at Venice, and is preceded by an orchestral introduction (Andante) almost entirely founded upon two themes, one representative of a person, the other of a thing. We shall meet with these again, and may pass them now, simply remarking that they suggest respectively the good and evil influences of the drama, and are ingeniously combined on this, their first appearance.

Otherwise the Introduction has no special significance. When the curtain rises we see a motley and animated crowd, amongst them a man carrying a guitar, who watches the throng. This is Barnaba, spy of the Inquisition, a variation on the mysterious Homodet, agent of the Council of Ten, so quickly mischievous and so quickly murdered in Hugo's play. The usual chorus is at once sung à propos to sports and pastimes which do not now concern us. This number (Allegro risoluto, 6-8) is quite Italian, not only in the life and grace of its themes, but in the simplicity of their treatment. Ponchielli starts with almost ostentatious homage to tonic and dominant. Having had their chorus, the people go away to witness a regatta, leaving Barnaba alone. That worthy at once expresses some highly unpleasant sentiments, such as might become a voracious spider on the completion of its web. Here the Spy motive comes in—one of those employed in the Prelude:—

This is Barnaba's musical shadow, and follows him everywhere, sometimes going before him, as shadows will. We soon gather from his monologue—a mixture of pure and quasi-recitative—that he loves Gioconda, who at that moment enters leading her blind mother (La Cieca) to the neighbouring church. As Barnaba hides himself, the old woman (contralto) begins a solo expressive of gratitude to the dutiful child who supports her by street-singing while she prays before the altars of the saints. Presently Barnaba utters apart his sensual admiration of Gioconda's beauty, the maiden following with words of love for her afflicted parent. Musically, this trio is interesting and important by reason of an effective contrast. The two women have gently flowing themes, such as—

while the Spy, chiefly uses variations upon his own particular subject:—

In this form of musical characterisation the main significance of the number lies. Gioconda now takes leave of her mother to seek after Enzo, one whom she professes to love tenderly and truly. As she goes, leaving La Cieca busy with her rosary, Barnaba comes from his hiding-place and forces upon her protestations of love. He is treated very brusquely—told, in fact, to “go to the devil” with his guitar. On being seized by the Spy, Gioconda shrieks and rushes off, thus alarming her blind mother, who calls aloud her name in anxiety, and mingles “Aves” with the revelation by Barnaba of a vengeful design he is not slow to execute. The music of this energetic little episode has no very distinguishing feature, but is never inappropriate or without interest. The crowd now returns, bearing aloft the winner of the regatta, whose triumph they celebrate in an animated chorus, occasionally chafing the losers, of whom one, Zuane, stands apart, much cast down. This number, like the opening concerted piece, is purely Italian, wanting even the smallest trace of foreign influence. As the victor is borne up the stage, Barnaba persuades Zuane that he has lost the prize through a spell cast upon him by the witch La Cieca. This is the beginning of a prolonged and exciting scene, made so by every available dramatic artifice. For example, Barnaba's poisonous words are interrupted now and then by the shouts and laughter of the gambling crowd, or by the prayers of the blind woman, who still tells her beads near the church, all unconscious of mischief brewing. The music, sufficiently expressive in itself, is here helped by studied and artful contrast. In the next stage, when one and another of the crowd catch Barnaba's words, the composer calls to his aid a more formal design, and makes a central thought of the subjoined passage:—

This, with expansions that need not be quoted, occurs again and again—whenver, in fact, a clamour is raised for the blood of the alleged sorceress. The choral superstructure soon becomes massive, but never elaborate either in its part-writing or dramatic characterisation. Ponchielli here, as elsewhere, aims to express with force and vigour the predominant feeling; declining to fritter away strength upon minor points of variation certain to pass unnoticed amid the stress of greater things. The tumult is at its height when Enzo appears, dressed as a Dalmatian sailor, and accompanied by La Gioconda. He at once goes to the help of the old woman, reproaching the mob for their folly and cowardice in some fine declamatory passages, written for the voice with true Italian skill. The people answer in a passage first given out by the basses and treated briefly, though somewhat elaborately, in imitation:—

The struggle grows fiercer, and Enzo has already called his Dalmatian comrades to help, when Alvise, one of the chiefs of the Inquisition, descends the Giants' Staircase, accompanied by his wife, Laura, who is masked. In his presence there is silence, till the people are haughtily bidden to explain their conduct. They do this readily enough, with the cry “She's a sorceress”; and here the composer begins to show himself at his best. Charmingly does he mark the change from the crowd's fierce passion to the tender feeling of Gioconda and Laura for the object of unreasonable hate. One of the best passages in the work is the appeal of the street-singer to Alvise on behalf of her mother. Pure melody and sweet natural harmony combine to make it irresistible. In the end, Alvise is moved by the representations of his wife and Gioconda, despite the sinister promptings of Barnaba. He orders the release of the harmless old woman, who at once expresses her gratitude in an air marked by great, though simple, beauty. Here is the first phrase:—

La Cieca further expresses her gratitude for Laura's intercession by presenting the Inquisitor's wife with her rosary. As she does so, the second of the two themes in the prelude reappears. Here it is, without the harmonies, which are of the most obvious character:—

The presentation of the rosary, with its accompanying theme, should not be passed as an ordinary incident. Like the crucifix in Hugo's "Angelo," the string of beads plays a most important part, at a critical moment, later on. After the blind woman's solo, the scene quickly closes, but not before Enzo, returning with his Dalmatian sailors, has been recognised by Laura as the proscribed Prince of Santafior, once betrothed to her and still beloved. Enzo, on his part, has not seen Laura's face. He has, however, been strangely moved by her voice, and stands musing when all have entered the church save Barnaba. The Spy approaches the disguised Prince, and at once a new scene begins.

Barnaba does not beat about the bush, but makes Enzo know not only that his disguise is penetrated, but that his still existing love for Laura remains no secret. Furthermore, he holds out the prospect of a secret interview with the Inquisitor's wife. Enzo responds with rapture, and the whole scene makes up a powerful musical number. The first part of the duet is mostly declamatory, but there are excellent passages of cantilena, in true Italian fashion; these giving a vocal charm which more than makes amends for any irregularity of form. At the close, the two men separate, each hating the other, but each, for his own purposes, desiring the interview between Enzo and Laura, soon to take place on board the Dalmatian ship. No sooner has Enzo gone than Barnaba causes a letter to be written to the Inquisitor, informing him of the arrangement just made. To this, happily, there is a witness in the person of La Gioconda, who, as Barnaba dictates to the public letter-writer, learns that her Enzo loves another. The girl rushes in despair into the church, leaving Barnaba to moralise at some length and quite superfluously upon Venice as a whited sepulchre; to which he contributes no little in the way of "dead men's bones and corruption." Dramatically, this solo is a mistake. Nobody wishes for moral or philosophical reflections from such a double-dyed scoundrel as the Spy, and it is hard to endure them with patience—the more because the music set to them has no particular merit. When they end, the finale to the act begins. The finale is short, and arranged with a view to the conventional effects of old-fashioned opera, rather than in obedience to demands from the drama itself. A crowd of Carnival revellers fill the stage and, after a short chorus, dance the Furlana. Then an organ is heard from within the church, where also the "Angelus" is sung, while the people kneel. All this was long ago worn threadbare, but we accept it here because Gioconda, leading her blind mother, passes through the worshipping throng singing, as the "Angelus" goes on, a passionate strain of sorrow and despair. The music is in Ponchielli's happiest vein. No more inspiring theme than that of the Furlana could dancers desire, while the sacred piece is solidly written, combining rich and varied harmony with dignified melody. Against this, the intense emotion of Gioconda's solo stands out well. Here is its most distinctive passage:—

No. 8. espress.

Ah! . . my heart, gone is thy glad - ness, Thy her - it - tage is sad - ness, My doom was fram'd by pow'r's a - bove, my doom was fram'd by pow'r's a - bove To die, . . to die . . if rob'd of love.

At the close of the first act we see clearly that those who claim Ponchielli as a "reformer" do so on very slight grounds. He pays ordinary attention to dramatic requirements—no more; he is but moderately free in his harmonic method, and in all other respects is essentially an Italian composer, with the national love of melody as the dominating principle in music, and the national fondness for simplicity combined with breadth of effect.

Act II., entitled "The Rosary," opens on the shore of an island in one of the lagoons. Enzo's vessel is seen close in to land; it is night, and the sailors are lounging about, each, for some inscrutable nautical reason, armed with a speaking trumpet, through which he presently sings. A sea-chorus ("Marinesca") at once begins, the sailors on deck shouting "Look well to the rudder," also demanding "Where are the rowers?" The rowers answer from down in the hold "Here are we . . where angry winds in fury howling shriek while rending sails to tatters." Then the midshipmen and boys up aloft cry "La, la, la, we are the squirrels of the sea," &c., &c. All this, of course, is sheer nonsense, but the composer has written to it some pretty fantastic music of the Boito pattern, and having more merit than that usually sung by operatic sailors. The effect of the boys' voices rapidly chattering in two and three parts, like the little angels of "Mefistofele," must be very good. Presently we hear Barnaba behind, trolling forth a barcarole, and serious interest begins. The Spy has come with Isèpo, the letter-writer, to take stock of Enzo's ship, and as he sings the unsuspecting crew chant in chorus to his ditty, which, by the way, is quite of a formal, not to say conventional, pattern:—

No. 9.

Fish - er - man thy bait now low - er, May the waves to . . her prove faith - ful,

At the close of the Barcarole, Enzo appears on deck, and issues orders to make ready for sea. Hereupon, of course, we have the "Marinesca" all over again. Equally, of course, when Enzo has dismissed his men to their berths, and paces the deck alone, he sings a Romance, expressive of his love for Laura. This number, one of the most beautiful in the work, is in strict form, with two verses and a coda. Its melody is instinct with feeling, and the accompaniment richly varied and coloured, without ever setting itself up as a rival to the vocal theme. This romance, in fact, affords another proof that if the set song is to be abolished in opera, nothing higher than blind prejudice or unreasoning love of change will stir a finger to bring the result about. A boat now draws near the ship and Laura soon steps on deck, escorted by Barnaba, who cynically wishes the lovers good luck and departs, attended by his characteristic theme. Laura expresses a vague dread of the man, but Enzo, reassuring her, begins an extended duet of the most vehement Italian character, and as familiar in style and treatment as haters of novelty can desire. The composer, however, shows more regard for his text than for the ordinary laws of climax, and the duet ends very quietly with a tender Andante, as the lovers dwell on the happiness in store for them. Here another transparent operatic device comes in. Left alone on the deck for awhile, Laura sees a lamp burning: "That light! Ah, 'tis a Madonna!" whereupon, of course, she sings a prayer—a very simple, melodious and expressive strain. She has need to pray, for jealous Gioconda, having come stealthily on board, is watching her. A duet for the women ensues, and once more in opera we find two of the gentler sex quarrelling for the love of a man. The duet is vigorously written, as, indeed, it should be since the ladies exchange compliments like "blasphemer" and "liar." It is not wanting in relief, however, nor in such musical interest as is necessary to give it value and importance. Well sung, the number cannot fail to make its mark. At its close, Gioconda is about to poniard her rival, when a boat is seen approaching with Alvise and Barnaba on board. On this she holds her hand, leaving the husband to do vengeance; while Laura lifts the Rosary, given her by La Cieca, in prayer to the Virgin. Seeing it, La Gioconda turns from enemy to friend; hurries the peccant wife into her own boat, and watches her safely away before the Inquisitor and the Spy approach. The musical effect of this rapid episode is not obtrusive, nearly everything being left to recitative and action. Finding the bird flown, the husband goes in pursuit, and now the act nears a sensational end. There is a stormy scene between Enzo and Gioconda, full of mutual reproach; and the Venetian galley are seen preparing to capture the Dalmatian ship; to which Enzo, refusing to fly, presently sets fire; the curtain descending upon a spectacle of surpassing excitement. In writing music to this Finale, Ponchielli hardly rose to the occasion. We observe unflagging energy, and a good deal of noise and bustle, but higher qualities are less apparent. Nevertheless, the effect in representation may be sufficient.

The third act, called "The House of Gold," is laid in the building so designated. The time is night, the place a dimly lighted room, and the person present the Inquisitor, who expresses a stern resolve that his wife shall die by poison, while the revelry of a fête goes on under the same roof. Alvise's soliloquy is a long one, and not, we fear, of proportionate musical value, if, indeed, Ponchielli was not quite missed a fine opportunity. The number, as it lies before us, seems to embody no more than a superficial and inadequate expression. Laura enters at its close, the situation now reminding us of a famous scene in Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera." A long and dramatically painful duet follows. Here, too, we must speak in doubtful tones regarding the music. A finer situation no composer could desire, but Ponchielli has treated it in a manner which we judge to be weak, with the well-known Italian weakness. There are plenty of well-balanced phrases, but the sentiment is skin-deep. The dramatic situation soon becomes more intense. Alvise, dragging his wife to the door of an adjoining chamber, shows her a funeral bier, while at the same moment a gay song, with choral accompaniment, is heard in the distance, sung by the Inquisitor's approaching guests. It comes nearer and nearer, mingling more and more powerfully with the stern tones of the vengeful husband as he bids his wife drink of the poison-cup and leaves her to be her own executioner. The lively strain is still more prominent when Gioconda enters bearing a sleeping-draught, which she substitutes for the death-drink, enjoining Laura to take it. Nearer still comes the chorus as Alvise again appears, sees the empty flask on the table, goes behind the curtains to look at the supposed dead body of his wife, and then prepares to welcome his guests. In all this the musician is greatly helped by the ingenuity of the librettist, who has provided so tragic an incident, associated with so glaring a contrast, that the worst music could damage effect but little. But Ponchielli's music is not the worst. True, that connected with the serious business does not impress, rather strengthening our doubt whether Ponchielli is equal to a great strain upon the highest qualities of a dramatic musician. Per contra, the Revellers' Song is as bright, lively, and attractive as need be. When Alvise has retired from the execution chamber, Gioconda comes out of hiding, and, in a short but passionate solo, declares that she has only stifled the voice of her love for the sake of the blind mother whom Laura befriended. This is accompanied in the orchestra by the theme of her despairing song as she emerged from the church at the end of Act I. The Rosary motive brings the situation to an end. Next comes the fête scene, held in a room adjoining the funeral chamber. Upon this we need not dwell. Alvise receives his guests with well-turned compliments, they appropriately respond, and then a series of dances begins, representative of various HOURS. The music is, for the most part, bright and charming enough to show that the power to compose dance themes has not departed from the land of the Tarantella. The festivity is at its height when Barnaba enters dragging La Cieca, whom he has found in the "forbidden chambers," intent upon some malice, according to him, but praying for one just dead, according to her. At that moment, the passing-bell tolls, and Enzo, who has entered unperceived, learns from the Spy that Laura has met her fate. Immediately his love flames forth. Before all the guests he avows his identity and his passion. The guests turn against him, of course; Alvise threatens him with vengeance, and the entire situation leads up to an ensemble as elaborate in its way as that which follows the appearance of Edgar at Lucia's wedding. Ponchielli has here a great variety of emotions to express, but he is faithful to Italian traditions, and avoids weakening complications. He goes with the majority, never attempting to obscure the prominence due to a prevailing sentiment of anger against the audacious lover. No doubt this, the most imposing piece in the entire Opera, comes out well. In design it is clear and in expression powerful, although the so-called "symphonic" element may be entirely wanting. The act ends as Enzo, hearing Alvise declare that he has taken Laura's life, makes a vain attempt to enforce the lex talionis upon that stern husband.

"The Orfanò Canal" is the name by which we are to know the fourth and last act. On rising, the curtain reveals the vestibule of a ruined palace, where Gioconda has her home. The maiden herself is there, gloomily thoughtful; by her side are a lighted lantern, a flask of poison and a dagger, while the orchestra makes heard the theme of her despair-song in Act I. Presently two street-singers enter, bearing the sleeping Laura, whom they place on the bed, and then depart. Left again alone, save for her unconscious rival, Gioconda contemplates the instruments of death before her. She has formed a desperate resolve consequent upon a deed of self-sacrifice nobly performed during the Finale of the previous act, when, seeing Enzo's danger, she promised Barnaba to become his provided he secured the young man's safety. La Gioconda will keep to the letter of her agreement. Barnaba may have her body, but it shall be without life—this is the sentiment she now expresses in a soliloquy written with real power and depth of feeling. Here the composer had a hard task, for his heroine has to struggle much against the promptings of her own passion. She is tempted to take Laura's life rather than her own, but resists and finally conquers at the cost of absolute despair. With these changeful and conflicting emotions Ponchielli deals in a satisfactory manner. Enzo now appears, Barnaba having fulfilled his share of the treaty. He, too, is in despair, thinking Laura dead, and another strongly passionate scene takes place; Enzo will not believe that Laura still lives, but treats Gioconda's assurance of the fact as part of her deadly machinations. Finally, he is about to stab the girl when the awakened Laura's voice calls his name and the revulsion becomes complete as the restored woman recognises in Gioconda her saviour from death. At that moment the gay revellers' song once more comes up from the canal, sung by boatmen waiting to convey the lovers to a place of safety. The parting of Laura and Enzo with Gioconda is one of the most pathetic and, musically speaking, beautiful scenes in the Opera, the farewell trio being in the highest measure worthy of a master, all the more because effect is gained without sacrificing the purely vocal character of the music. The last scene now comes. In "Angelo" Gioconda is really killed by the man she loves a moment before Laura awakes, but here it was necessary to preserve her for the meeting with the Spy, who presently enters as she prays to the Virgin for strength to fly. Barnaba intercepts her at the door and demands his reward. There is a moment of intense despair, but the girl quickly recovers. Her resolve is made, and, half hysterically, she begins to adorn herself for the man who claims her. The duet sung while this goes on is painful almost to ghastliness, the forced gaiety of the woman contrasting with the sensual rapture of the man, while over all hangs, perceptible to us, the shadow of instant death. At last Gioconda is ready for the sacrifice, and at that moment she stabs herself to the heart. Barnaba utters a wild cry, then, ever malignant, shouts in the ear of the corpse, "Last night thy mother offended me: I have strangled her," rushes out in a fury, and the curtain falls.

We need add little to what has been said, and for a precise estimate of the value of "La Gioconda" must await its representation. But some facts are evident already. The drama, for all the points of light in it, is gloomy and decidedly unpleasant. At the same time, it is powerful and holds us as the terrible story of the Ancient Mariner held the Wedding Guest. It shocks, but does not repel. On its part the music is often beautiful, and at other times strong, but, under certain circumstances, apparently inadequate. Always, however, it is melodious and vocal, while the musical structure is never unduly complicated by devices which strive to give to it a multitude of arbitrary significances. On the whole, we hope much for "La Gioconda" as a permanent addition to genuine Italian opera.

The Morning and Evening Service, together with the Office for the Holy Communion. Set to Music in the Key of G. By J. Baptiste Calkin. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE publication of a new service by Mr. Calkin is an event of some moment to Church musicians, especially as the one under notice is of the important kind which used to be dignified by the name of "Cathedral Service." Times are changed, however, and works of this sort are frequently heard, remarkably well performed, in ordinary churches. Mr. Calkin's Service in B flat has been very successful, and is known to every one interested in this branch of musical composition. In style, the points of similarity between this new service and its popular predecessor are not very numerous, but one which strikes us most is the feeling of "go" or onward motion which characterises all this composer's service music. This is occasioned partly by the fact that there is little or no repetition of words, and also by the almost entire absence of cadences of the "final close" nature. No doubt this is a merit of much importance, for it is the trial which this form of composition suffers most from. The words of the Te Deum, for instance, are so varied in sentiment, and the transitions are so rapid, that to fit these fleeting phases to suitable music, without frequent repetition of the text, is a task of no mean order. This Mr. Calkin has most successfully accomplished. The Service in B flat and this one in G may be said to be important landmarks in the history of Church music. No doubt the earlier work fully represented the advanced ideas of the time at which it was written, and the present one must certainly be accepted as illustrating, in a very decided manner, the advanced notions of the present day. The chief feature lies in the elaboration and general orchestral character of the organ accompaniment, which throughout is interesting and not very difficult. The reason for this development need not now be discussed, but foremost amongst the causes is the improvement in capabilities both of organs and organists. Mr. Calkin's ideas are always beautiful, though at times they strike us as being rather secular in character. For instance, in the Te Deum and Benedictus (which are written in very quick 3-4 time), at the words "The glorious company of the Apostles" and "That we, being delivered out of the hands of our enemies," phrases occur of undoubted beauty, but of secular tendency. In the Credo, at the words "Who for us men," we have a short passage singularly charming and appropriate. We would gladly notice the other numbers of the Communion Service had we space at our disposal. We see in a foot-note that the music for the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis was composed for a festival at St. Paul's Cathedral, and that the accompaniments are scored for an orchestra. These Canticles, as they are here set, are, we should say, admirably suited to such a purpose. We heartily congratulate Mr. Calkin, and we trust that we may have a Cantata or orchestral work from his pen before very long.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE twentieth Annual Meeting of the German Tonkünstler took place at Leipzig, on the 3rd, 4th, 5th and 6th ult. These meetings have always been of more than usual interest from the fact of a great number of works by living composers being heard for the first time on these occasions. The feature in the programmes has always been the prominent place given to compositions of the so-called new German school, but it is now a curious fact that in a great many cases this school is represented, not by Germans, but by Slavish (and particularly Russian) composers, and sometimes by Norwegians, Dutchmen and even Frenchmen. But, apart from these considerations, these meetings are of the utmost importance to the young German composer as well as to aspiring foreigners. The opening Concert was given by the celebrated Riedel Gesangverein in honour of the meeting, and consisted of a work by Giovanni Gabrieli, "Sonata pian e forte," Heinrich Schütz's Oratorio "The Seven Last Words," several organ pieces, and, as the principal item in the programme, a Requiem for solo, quartet, chorus and orchestra, by Felix Draeske, which proved to be a highly interesting composition, and achieved a marked success. A few hours after this Concert, which took place at St. Thomas's Church, the first chamber-music performance of the Festival began at the Gewandhaus. The most noteworthy works given were a Suite for two violins, viola and violoncello, in D minor, by Eduard de Hartog, and a Piano-forte Quintet in A, by Friedrich Kiel. The pianist, Herr Reisenauer, played Transcriptions by Liszt, and fourteen vocal solos formed the remainder of the programme. The third Concert, on the following morning, brought another programme of chamber-music, the particular features of which were a String Quartet by Rimsky Korsakoff, Theme and Variations for two pianos by Heinrich von Herzogenberg, String Quartet in G minor by Volkmann, and three vocal quartets with piano-forte duet by Hans Huber. The same evening the first grand Orchestral Concert took place, the most interesting novelty being A. Borodin's Symphony in E flat; this was followed by Brahms's Violin Concerto, played by Herr A. Brodsky, two choruses for male voices by Peter Cornelius and Liszt's E flat Piano-forte Concerto, played by our countryman Eugene D'Albert. This talented artist created unbounded enthusiasm by his excellent performance of this most difficult Concerto, and was compelled to play one of Rubinstein's Etudes as an encore. The second part of the Concert was devoted to the memory of Richard Wagner, and consisted of his Eine Faust Overture, an Epilogue by Adolf Stern, and Prelude and Finale to the first act of "Parsifal." After this exceptionally interesting Concert, it was difficult to bestow sufficient attention on the organ performance, which took place next morning at St. Nicholas's Church. The church was, however, well filled, and the programme was very interesting, although it did not contain any striking novelty. The last Concert of the Festival took place at the Leipzig Crystal Palace, and proved a worthy finish to these interesting proceedings. The first number was a brilliantly orchestrated March from the unpublished Opera "King Hiarne," by Ingeborg von Bronsart. This was followed by several solos for violoncello, &c. The next important items were Eine Faust Fantasia for orchestra, by Mihalovich, and Brahms's new Cantata "Gesang der Parzen." The second part of the programme contained Liszt's grandiose Symphonic Poem, with chorus, "Prometheus Unbound," several vocal and instrumental solos, and Wagner's Kaisermarsch with chorus. This latter produced such an effect that at the final Hymn to the Emperor the whole audience rose and applauded with an enthusiasm seldom witnessed.

The sixtieth annual Festival of the Lower Rhine took place at Cologne on the 13th, 14th and 15th ult., under the conductorship of the veteran Dr. Ferdinand von Hiller. The official programme published for the occasion contains an interesting summary of the history of these celebrated Festivals. They were begun at Dusseldorf in the year 1818 and have been given annually (with very few exceptions) at that town and at Elberfeld, Aachen and Cologne. Amongst the Conductors we find the famous names of Ries, Mendelssohn, Spohr, Kreutzer, Rietz, Schumann, Liszt, Otto Goldschmidt, Rubinstein, Joachim, Hiller and many others, while the soloists who have interpreted the works produced have been selected from the most celebrated artists. The list of works performed contains almost every important composition from Bach's B minor Mass to those of the most modern writers. The programme of this year's Festival, and the artists engaged, fully sustained the reputation of these gatherings. On the first day Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Haydn's "Creation" were given. The second day proved to be the most interesting, comprising as it did Bach's Cantata "God's time is the best," Handel's Concerto Grosso for the orchestra, Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm, Hiller's Cantata "Richard Cœur de Lion," the second Piano-forte Concerto of Brahms (played by himself), Bruch's "Fair Ellen," and Beethoven's Overture to "Leonora." The programme for the third day consisted chiefly of solo pieces but contained also Brahms's second Symphony in D (conducted by himself), Wagner's Eine Faust Overture and the Overture to "Manfred," by Schumann. M. Wilhelm, who was announced to play several violin solos, did not appear, but in his stead Fräulein Soldat, of Berlin, performed Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and Hungarian dances by Brahms.

In a long report on musical events in London, the Leipzig Musikalisches Centralblatt says: "It will astonish our readers to hear that the musically sterile England has produced two new Operas by native composers in less than ten days. 'Esmeralda' by Griffin (!) Thomas, as well as Mackenzie's great work 'Colomba,' have both been received with enthusiasm, the former by the singers and those theatre-goers who usually frequent the Italian Opera, the latter by musicians in general and the better educated classes of society. With this definition we have already indicated the peculiarities of both composers. While Thomas studied at Paris and takes his inspirations from Gounod, Mackenzie is a disciple of the new German school and might be ranked between Brahms and Raff, if such classification were allowed. The libretto of 'Colomba' is founded on the well-known novel by Prosper Mérimée. The noble tale has been dramatised with rare ability by the Times critic, Dr. Francis Hueffer, and the usual complaints about unsatisfactory librettos which hinder the composer rather than assist him in unfolding the wings of his genius are here out of place. As in Mackenzie a new talent has appeared on the destitute field of English opera, in the same way the author of the libretto deserves great praise for the talent and knowledge of stage effect shown in constructing a powerful drama from a simple novel. 'Colomba' will surely find a home on the German stage, because, although composed to English words, it proves in every bar the composer's admiration for the great masters of the 'Fatherland,' as Germany is usually called in England."

Anton Rubinstein, on being asked by Herr B. Senff the publisher of the Signale, to edit a new edition of the classical works of Beethoven, Mozart, &c., has written a most interesting letter in reply. After acknowledging the good intentions of many an editor and publisher, who have given to the world most carefully prepared and splendidly executed editions of the musical classics, he maintains that it is impossible for one man to revise and for one publisher to bring out an edition which would be accepted as the standard edition for the future. He proposes, instead, that all the principal publishers should join in inviting all competent musicians to an annual meeting, at which doubtful questions might be discussed and decided by the opinion of the majority. By these means he thinks that a standard edition of classical works could be prepared, which would be an authority and a help equally to the poorest country teacher and the Professor of a Conservatoire.

The well-known German dramatist, Willbrandt, has written a new drama, with incidental music and choruses, entitled "Das Märchen vom Untersberg." For the overture and choruses, Schubert's celebrated music to "Rosamunde" is to be used, while all the other incidental music has been arranged from motifs from the same composer's works.

An Opera by H. Hugo Pierson, which was performed in 1872 in Hamburg under the title of "Colomba," has been given lately at Dessau (having been renamed "Fenice"), with such marked success that it has been accepted for the Court Theatre at Dresden.

Marburg, one of the smallest University towns of Germany, has lately had the honour of a visit from Franz Liszt. At a festival given to celebrate the sixth centenary of the Church of St. Elizabeth in that town his Oratorio "The Legend of the Holy Elizabeth" was performed and most enthusiastically received.

Herr Bille, the famous conductor of Berlin, has commenced an artistic tour through Germany with his entire orchestra. From the 1st of July till the middle of August he is engaged for the Exhibition at Amsterdam.

The Société des Compositeurs de Musique, Paris, has conferred an honorary diploma of membership on Herr Rheinberger, in recognition of his dramatic legend "Christophorus."

"La Jolie Pille de Perth," a youthful work by the late Georges Bizet, was performed at Vienna on the 5th ult. Neither at Paris in 1867 nor shortly afterwards at Weimar did this work meet with any great success, and for the latest revival no more than a succès d'estime can be claimed. Although the score shows many traces of Bizet's refined hand, particularly in the instrumentation, the music is said to show lack of invention and to be wanting in original melodies; the libretto, also, is not nearly so interesting as that of "Carmen."

Herr Hans Richter has been unanimously elected conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts in Vienna and has accepted the post.

M. Peter Benoit, one of the foremost Belgian composers, has written an Oratorio, "Lucifer," which was performed in Paris, at the Trocadéro, on the 7th ult., by a large body of executants, and created unusual interest in the French capital. Although "Lucifer" has been pronounced by a numerous and influential party in Belgium to be the starting point of a new national musical art, and Benoit was hailed by his compatriots as a sort of Flemish Wagner, it contains no novel features, nor does Benoit strike out any new path. "Lucifer" consists of three parts. The first part opens with a chorus descriptive of chaos, followed by a dramatic and effective movement and by the evocation of the three elements—earth, water and fire. The second part is very short, and consists only of an air for bass, an air for tenor and a duet for female voices. The third part, portraying the rebellion of the evil spirit against heaven, is the most remarkable portion of the work. Abandoned by the allies whom he has conjured up to assist him, Lucifer is driven back by the celestial forces and hides himself in hell, trying to draw the mortals with him in his fall, but man frees himself and ascends to heaven. The Oratorio proved remarkably successful, the Hall being occupied by a very large audience.

Madame Marcella Sembrich, the well known prima donna of Covent Garden, made a short stay in Paris on her way to London, and appeared for the first time in that capital at an evening Concert. She introduced herself not only as a vocalist but also as a pianist, playing with much effect several compositions by Liszt and Chopin.

At a Concert recently given by M. Padeloup at the Eden Theatre in Paris, a performance of Beethoven's celebrated Kreutzer Sonata was given, M. Théodore Ritter being the pianist and all the first violins of the orchestra playing the violin part. We cannot imagine a more shocking misrepresentation of one of the greatest works of the great master. Poor Beethoven!

M. Alexandre Guilmant's Organ Recitals with Orchestra continue to attract crowds to the Trocadéro in Paris. The programmes of the third and fourth Concerts contained, amongst numerous examples by ancient and modern composers, Handel's Largo, for organ, orchestra and six harps, and Gounod's Wedding March, for organ and three trombones.

The last of a series of Concerts of Chamber-music for wind instruments which have been given in Paris took place on April 26. F. Lachner's Octet, Schubert's Variations for flute and piano, and Mozart's Serenade in B flat were in the programme. Gounod was present on the occasion and complimented the members on their success.

M. Déléibes's new opera "Lakmé" is stated to be an almost unprecedented success in a pecuniary sense. At the fifth performance of the work, at which tout le grand Paris was present, the receipts reached the considerable figure of 9,638 francs.

After many delays, Félicien David's "La Perle du Brésil" has been produced in Paris, and the papers are full of praise for the beauties of the score—its wealth of graceful melody and its rich instrumentation.

M. Julien Tiersot has been appointed sub-librarian of the Paris Conservatoire in lieu of M. Octave Foucque, whose death we recently announced.

The whole of the rare collection of instruments left by the late violinist Henri Vieuxtemps has passed into the hands of the Duke of Campo Selice, an excellent amateur, who already has in his possession, amongst other fine instruments by the most celebrated makers, an entire string-quartet (two violins, viola and violoncello) made by the king of violin-makers, Stradivarius.

Herr Jules de Swert, the esteemed violoncello virtuoso and composer, will shortly publish his second grand Opera, entitled "Die Grafen von Hammerstein."

A Festival on a large scale will be held at Copenhagen, during next August, at which the works performed will be chiefly by northern composers, special prominence being given to those of the Danish school. Gade has composed a Cantata entitled "Eine Sundfahrt" especially for this occasion.

Herr Angelo Neumann obtained a decided success with his performances of Wagner's Nibelungen Ring at Venice. "Götterdämmerung" seemed to be appreciated above all the other parts, and was received with great enthusiasm. From Venice Herr Neumann will take his travelling Richard Wagner Theatre to Bologna, Rome and Milan.

Heinrich Wohlfahrt, the composer, whose pianoforte method has acquired a world-wide fame and is well known in England by Mr. Arthur O'Leary's translation, died at Leipzig, on the 7th ult., at the age of eighty-six.

Another composer, Herr E. D. Wagner, who was the author of numerous instruction-books for the pianoforte, died a few days before in Berlin.

W. Teschner, one of the best professors of singing in Germany and author of several favourite exercises for the voice, died at Dresden, on the 7th ult., aged eighty-three.

We have also to record the death in Paris, at the age of eighty-three, of M. Louis Viardot, husband of the celebrated singer M^{me}. Viardot Garcia. M. Viardot, besides being widely known in literary circles, was also for a time manager of the Théâtre Italien in Paris. Amongst his more important works are translations of "Don Quixote," for Gustave Doré's illustrated edition, and of Turgeneff's Russian novels.

CORRESPONDENCE.

RESTRICTIONS ON MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—At a recent entertainment in Aylesbury, a young lady sang an old favourite song, "Who's that tapping at the garden gate?" Shortly afterwards a Mr. Harry Wall, of London, made a demand for £10—£4 from the young lady who sang, £2 from the young lady who played the accompaniment, and £4 from the gentleman who presided for permitting it to be sung; Mr. Wall professing to hold the exclusive right of public performance of the same—a privilege which he appears to endeavour to retail at 5s. each song sung, or other prices according to his customers. You, Mr. Editor, will confer a great favour upon amateur vocalists and others if you will kindly explain in your next issue if such demand is legal, and whether it is the practice of musical composers to dispose of the right of printing and publishing their compositions to one individual or partly. If so, is it possible to ascertain what compositions are subject to this iniquitous restriction, or must amateurs confine their talents to their own fireside? It appears monstrously ridiculous that songs should be published and sold, and yet not allowed to be sung in public. I should consider it would materially increase the sale of a good song for it to be well sung in public. I am perfectly aware of the justice of restricting the multiplication of copies of authors' works, but I fail to see the wisdom of hindering their performance. My hatter might, with equal good sense, forbid me wearing the hat he sells me in public without the payment of a fee in addition to the purchase-money.—Faithfully yours,

W. J. ROADKNIGHT.

[We have so often drawn attention to this subject in the columns of THE MUSICAL TIMES that we are surprised our correspondent should write as if he had heard of Mr. Harry Wall for the first time. Undoubtedly he has the right to demand payment for the performance of works over which he has control; and, although we do not defend his method of exercising this right, as the law is on his side, it behoves all amateurs to protect themselves from penalties by obtaining a list of those compositions which are thus protected. The titles of the most important of these will be found in No. 460 of THE MUSICAL TIMES. In No. 473 will also be found an account of the new law on the subject.—Ed. M.T.]

MUSIC IN ITS RELATION TO OTHER ARTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Will the following extracts from "Brewer" help to corroborate the statements, or rather strengthen the interesting theory, brought forward by your correspondent A. E. G., in your April issue, relative to the chromatic scale and the rainbow colours?

Dr. Brewer says: "Thin tight cords produce sharp shrill sounds, and thin laminae produce blue and violet colours. Thick loose cords produce deep bass sounds, and thick laminae red colours. A violet is blue because the undulations of ether which touch its surface are thrown back with the utmost rapidity; as the undulations of sound from a very thin tight cord of an Æolian harp. Blue, or rather purple, is the high treble vibration of light, like the upper C in music. In order to produce violet colour, the undulations of ether must be 699 millions of millions per second; and in order to make high C in music, a cord must vibrate 516 times per second. To produce red, the ether must be jerked off the surface of the body at the rate of 477 millions of millions vibrations in a second; and in order to make low C in music, the air must vibrate only 258 times in a second. A primrose is yellow, because yellow is made by the medium vibrations, as the middle C in music."—I remain, Sir, yours truly,

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

W. A. S.—We do not know of any complete edition.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND.—The members of the Choral Society gave a performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater and Gade's Erl King's Daughter at the second Concert of the season, on Tuesday evening, March 7. The choruses in both works were well rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Bleazard, Mrs. Judson, Miss Kemphorne, Mr. Edwards and Mr. Rhodes. Mr. Hepus led the band, and Herr Carl Schmitt conducted.

BELFAST.—A Concert was given in the Ulster Hall, on the 11th ult., by the members of the Choral Association, as a graceful tribute to Mr. W. J. Kempton, their Conductor during the past four seasons. Features of the programme were the selections given on the organ by Mr. W. H. Jude of Liverpool. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Shearman, Miss S. Agnew, Messrs. Porter, Pietro and Stewart. Miss Laing contributed a pianoforte solo, and Mr. C. H. Moss conducted.

BLACKBURN.—The members of the Vocal Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Robinson, brought their eighth season to a successful conclusion on the 1st ult. The programme consisted of Gade's Cantata The Erl King's Daughter, and Anderton's Wreck of the Hesperus, which were given with orchestral accompaniments.

BURNLEY.—The first of a series of Concerts was given by the members of the Vocal Union on Tuesday, the 8th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's As the hart pants, The Lord is a man of war (Handel) and Spohr's Cantata God, Thou art great. The second part was miscellaneous, and commenced with the Overture to Zanetta (Auber), excellently played on the piano and harmonium by Messrs. Bridge and Higson. The part-songs were brilliantly executed, the most successful being Cruickshank's "O summer wind" and "Evening," and Smart's "Good night, thou glorious sun." The solo vocalists were Miss Ida Ford and Miss Nuttall. Miss S. Sutcliffe's solos on the pianoforte were well received. The Concert was of the highest excellence and reflected great credit upon the organiser and Conductor, Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank.

BUXTON.—The second Popular Concert of the season was given in the Buxton Gardens, on Saturday evening, the 5th ult., under the direction of Mr. Carl Meyer. The band played very effectively the Overtures to Maritana and William Tell, the March from Athalie, &c. The vocalist was Miss Clara Wollaston, whose excellent rendering of some well-known songs elicited warm applause and several encores.

CHILTERN.—The members of the Musical Society gave their second Concert at the Corn Exchange, on the 16th ult. The work performed was Handel's Messiah, which was very successfully rendered. A small orchestra of twenty performers lent valuable aid to the chorus of seventy voices. The soloists were Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Eliza Thomas, Mr. A. Kenningham and Mr. T. Kempton, vocalists; trumpet, Mr. McGrath. Mr. F. R. Frye, F.C.O., Organist of the Parish Church, conducted.

COVENTRY.—On April 30 the Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Haydn's Creation (Parts 1 and 2) and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, under the able conductorship of Mr. Arthur Trickett. The principal vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkom, Mr. Harper Kearton and Mr. W. H. Ward, who replaced Mr. Henry Cook, absent through indisposition. The work was rendered with much effect, both the solos and the choruses being extremely well given. In the Hymn of Praise, Miss Larkom's singing was greatly admired, and Mr. Kearton's solo, "The sorrows of death," elicited well-deserved applause. The duet, "I waited for the Lord," by Miss Larkom and Miss F. E. Hill, was also an attractive feature in the performance.

COUPAR FIFE.—A Concert was given by the Dundee Ladies' Orchestra on the 8th ult., in the Corn Exchange Hall, on the occasion of the Hall being re-opened after repairs. Songs were contributed by Miss A. C. Haden and Miss Jane Lindsay; and violin solos by Miss Annie Pearson and Mr. A. C. Haden.

DEMERARA.—The first of the second series of Amateur Concerts, under the able direction of Mrs. Anderson, was given in the Philharmonic Hall, on March 20. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Pitman, Mrs. Arnold, Mrs. Collins, Miss White, Mr. J. F. Williams and Mr. J. G. Gilman, who, all with equal success, were engaged in the selection. The flute playing of Mr. Saunier; and favourable mention must also be made of the violoncello performance of Mr. Percy Hemery, and the rendering of a duet for violin and pianoforte by Mr. Miller and Mrs. Anderson. The orchestral pieces and the choral portions of the programme elicited warm and well deserved applause.

ENNIISKILLEN.—A successful performance of Robin Hood was given here on the evenings of the 17th, 18th, and 21st ult., before crowded houses. The characters were taken by Miss Russell (Maid Marian), Mr. C. Trime (Robin Hood), Mr. Thomas (Little John), Mr. MacLaren (Friar Tuck), Mr. S. Gunning (The Sheriff), Mr. T. A. Mercer (Will Scarlett), Mr. R. McKenney (Holy Palmer). The chorus of maidens and foresters was supplied by members of Mr. Arnold's excellent choir. The orchestra included the principal members of the band of the Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers. Mr. Arnold conducted, and the scenery included picturesque local views painted by Mr. Wakeman.

FARNWORTH.—The Farnworth and district Amateur Choral Society gave its second, and concluding Open Meeting of the present session on Tuesday evening, the 1st ult., in the Moor Hall. Sterndale Bennett's May Queen formed the first part of the programme. The Cantata was excellently rendered throughout. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. The accompaniments were admirably rendered by Mr. Alfred Moorhouse, who also contributed two pianoforte solos. The Concert was under the able direction of the hon. Conductor, the Rev. J. A. Winstanley, B.A.

FARNHAM.—On Monday, April 30, the Dundee Ladies' Orchestra, conducted by Mr. A. C. Haden, gave a Concert in the Reid Hall, which was received with great favour. Songs were given by Mrs. A. C. Haden and members of the orchestra, and the programme included some remarkable violin solos by Miss Annie Pearson, a young lady aged nine years.

GOOLE.—A series of Pianoforte Recitals, arranged by Mr. Cattanaach, were given in the North-Eastern Hall during Whit-week. Mr. J. Greaves was the pianist, and vocal solos were contributed by Messrs. Courtney, Hilton, Windsor, Maclean, Vesgre, and Mrs. Greaves.

HAWICK.—The members of the Choral Society gave their Annual Concert in the Exchange Hall, on Monday evening, April 30, before a large and appreciative audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Mackenzie, Mr. T. E. Gledhill and Mr. Bryce, who were all highly successful. The choruses were efficiently rendered, under the direction of Mr. T. E. Gledhill. In the second part songs, &c., were given by the principals, and also a violoncello solo by Mr. Carl Hamilton, who had the direction of the band.

HINDLEY, NEAR WIGAN.—The eighth monthly Organ Recital was given in St. Peter's Church, on Sunday afternoon, the 6th ult., when an excellent programme was well rendered by Mr. Charles D. Mortimer, the Organist.

HURSTPOINT.—The Choral Society gave its final Concert for the season in the Music Room, on April 25. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous, and the second part consisted of Rogers's humorous Cantata Beauty and the Beast. Most of the numbers were exceedingly well rendered. The soprano and contralto solos were well sung by Mrs. Campion and Miss Florence Rose. Mr. H. C. Young, B.A., Organist of the Parish Church, conducted.

ILKSTON.—H.M.S. Pinafore was performed in the Town Hall, on the 7th, 8th and 9th ult., under the direction of Mr. C. B. Palmer, Esq., of Stanton Hall, and accompanied by the band of the Ilkston Harmonic Society. With the exception of "Josephine" (who was represented by a young lady) all the characters were taken by boys belonging to the Church Choirs of Stanton-by-Dale and of Hallam Field. The opera was exceedingly well performed, some of the boys displaying talents rarely found in a village choir. The parts were sung in harmony—contributing to the use of Chorus and Chorus. The scenes were specially arranged by Mr. Palmer, who also painted the scenery and superintended the entire performance. There was a large and appreciative audience on each night.

KETERING.—On the 7th ult., the Choral Society gave its last Concert of the season in the Corn Exchange, the work performed being Elijah. The principal vocalists were Miss Eliza Walton, Miss Jeanie Kosse, Mr. Darby Jones and Mr. William Winn, all of whom were well received, Mr. Winn's rendering of the music allotted to Elijah being highly appreciated. The band (strengthened for the occasion) gave unqualified satisfaction, the accompaniments being played with feeling and discretion. Mr. T. L. Selby performed the violoncello obbligato to "It is enough." The choruses were rendered with vigour, and careful attention to light and shade. A public Rehearsal, without professional assistance, was given by the members on the 5th ult. Both Concerts were directed by Mr. H. G. Gotch, the Society's honorary Conductor.

KIDDERMINSTER.—The members of the Choral Society gave an excellent performance of The Messiah in the Town Hall, on the 8th ult., the solo vocalists being Misses Letti Wade, Edith Parry and Mr. Everist, Messrs. E. Kemp and George Harris, all of whom were highly efficient. The choruses were, on the whole, well rendered. Mr. Fitzgerald was an able Conductor.

KIRBY MISPERTON, PICKERING.—On Ascension Day the choir of this remote little Yorkshire village sang as the anthem the chorus "Unfold, ye portals everlasting" from The Redemption, and on Whit Sunday the following number, "Lovely appear." Last Christmas Day the same choir gave the concluding number, "The Word is Flesh become," as their anthem. It is believed that this is the first country choir which has attempted music from The Redemption in church.

LEAMINGTON.—The Musical Society gave a successful miscellaneous Concert before a large audience, at the Pavilion, on Tuesday evening, the 8th ult.; Conductor, Mr. Frank Spinney. The solo vocalists were Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Emily Buxton and Mr. Ernest Laris. The Rev. T. H. Spinney gave two pianoforte solos, and Mr. T. E. Pountney a clarinet solo. Several Old English glees and madrigals were well sung by the members of the Society.

LEEDS.—Dr. Spark, the Leeds Borough Organist, brought a very successful season to a close on Saturday night, the 5th ult., when a large audience assembled in the Town Hall to listen to a Recital on the grand organ of selections from the works of Jewish composers. It may be remembered that the Town Council agreed to expend £750 in repairing the organ, which has now been in use for twenty-four years. The work will occupy some months, so that there may be few opportunities of again hearing the fine instrument of which Leeds is so proud to possess. Dr. Spark first gave three selections from Meyerbeer's Operas of The Prophet, The Huguenots, and Robert le Diable. These were followed by two of Benedict's compositions—the Grand March "Malcolm" and the song "By the sad sea waves," from The Brides of Venice. Braham's recitative and song "The Death of Nelson" was next given. The specimens of synagogue music—one an ancient Hebrew melody and the other a Mosaic—were well followed, and the programme was brought to a close by the performance of selections from Costa's Oratorio Eli, including the March of the Israelites. A pleasing feature of the entertainment was the presentation of an illuminated address to Dr. Spark from some of the members of the Great Synagogue, Leeds, in recognition of his services on the occasion of Hospital Sunday, a compliment which was acknowledged by the recipient in a brief but appropriate speech.

LEICESTER.—The annual Invitation Concert of the Amateur Vocal Society, assisted by the Orchestral Society, was given at the Temperance Hall on Tuesday evening, the 1st ult. The first part of the programme was devoted to Mendelssohn's Athalie, the connective passages being read by the Rev. Jos. Wood. The second work was Mr. E. Prout's Cantata Alfred. The solo vocalists were Miss Sturgess and Messrs. Carter, Gamble, Goward and Biggs. The choruses in both compositions were given with great effect. The pianoforte and Miss Deacon presided at the pianoforte. The annual Invitation Concert of the Orchestral Union took place at the Temperance Hall, on the 8th ult., before a numerous audience. The principal pieces for the band—Beethoven's Symphony in C minor and the Overtures Ruy Blas (Mendelssohn) and "Poet and Peasant" (Suppe)—were well played, and the able direction of Mr. Ellis. Songs were contributed with much success by Miss Annie Thomas and the violin solos of Mr. F. Ward, and the performance of Weber's Concertstück by Mr. Ellis were interesting items in the selection. The songs were effectively accompanied by Mr. Hancock.

LEWES.—On Wednesday evening, the 23rd ult., Miss Annie Tate, R.A.M., gave a Pupils' Concert, assisted by Mr. Edward Harper, vocalist, Miss Crockett, solo harp, and others. The Concert was most successful.

LOW FELL.—The Spring Concert of the Gateshead Fell Amateur Vocal Society took place on the 2nd ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Edwin J. Rowley. The first part of the programme consisted of Spohr's Christian's Prayer, the soloists being Misses Mary and Vincymomb, Mr. Mace, Mrs. Rowley and Mr. R. Armstrong, the two latter local amateurs of considerable musical culture. The fine choruses of the work were effectively sung by the choir. The second portion of the programme consisted of part-songs, songs from each of the solo vocalists, a trio of Haydn's, and two quartets for strings, by Schubert and Mozart respectively, performed with great taste by gentlemen amateurs of the neighbourhood. At a previous Concert, the services of Mr. Rowley as Conductor, extending over a period of five years, were acknowledged by the presentation of a handsome gold watch, subscribed for by the members and their friends.

MADLEY, SHROPSHIRE.—On Tuesday evening, the 8th ult., the Choral Society gave a Concert in the Institute. The first part of the programme comprised the Creation; and the second Stainer's Daughter of Jairus. The solo vocalists were Miss H. Johnson, Mr. Wm. Antistice and Mr. Tuke. Musically the Concert was very successful, the accompaniments being given with great precision and vigour. The accompaniments were played on the pianoforte and Mustel organ. Mr. Smart (Newport) conducted.

NATAL.—The first Concert of the Philharmonic Society for the present season was given at the Theatre Royal, on April 13, when Gounod's Cantata Gallia was excellently rendered. This composition, written during the Franco-German war, was designed to represent the then desolate and forlorn condition of France, and contains many of those fine orchestral effects which reached their highest development in the composer's Redemption, a work unfortunately not yet known in the colony. The soprano part in the Cantata was well sung by Miss J. Stuart, and the choruses—especially the concluding one, which was encored—were given with much precision and effect. The second portion of the Concert was miscellaneous, and included some well-arranged orchestral selections, glees, and part-songs, a harp solo by Mrs. Hope, and vocal pieces by Miss Hodge, Miss Kate Hoffman, Messrs. Bentley, Siedle and Brown. The Cantata was ably conducted by Mr. MacColl, Mrs. MacColl was an excellent pianoforte accompanist, and Mr. Brown rendered efficient aid at the harmonium.

NEWCASTLE.—Mr. Alderson gave his seventh Invitation Concert in the Town Hall, the 1st ult. The programme consisted of Mr. Gaul's sacred Cantata The Holy City, and Eudora, a dramatic idyll composed by Dr. Creser, Organist of Leeds Parish Church. Both works were excellently rendered, the singing of the choir showing marked improvement. Eudora was conducted by the composer, and the accompanists were Mr. Vincent and Mr. Alderson.

NORWICH.—The twenty-fourth Concert of the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Union was given at St. Andrew's Hall, on the 6th ult, with much success. The principal item in the programme was Weber's Opern Fancies, the melodious and bright music in which was fully appreciated by the audience. The illustrative verses (translated from the German by the Rev. J. Troutbeck) were recited by Mr. Bosworth Harcourt with excellent effect; and Miss Agnes Larkom elicited warm applause for her rendering of the soprano music, especially the charming song "Lonely am I now no longer" (with flute obligato by Mr. Edwards). The choruses, too, were well sung, and the work was ably conducted by Dr. Burnett. In the second part of the programme, which was miscellaneous, the pianoforte-playing of Miss S. M. Morse (a pupil of the Conductor) was much admired.

OLDBURY, WORCESTERSHIRE.—On the 13th ult., Professor Ridgway, of the Institute, Ladywood, Birmingham, opened the new organ, built by Messrs. Hewins, Stratford-on-Avon, at the Independent Chapel, Langley Green, by a Recital of selections from Oratorios, which were excellently rendered.—On the 20th ult., Mr. W. T. Belcher, Mus. Doc., Queen's College, Oxford, gave a recital of the greatest music, selected from the works of the great masters. The qualities of the instrument were well exhibited on both occasions.

PLYMOUTH.—The third Subscription Concert of the Vocal Association, under the able conductorship of Mr. F. N. Löhr, was given at the Guildhall, on the 8th ult., with much success. Barnett's Cantata The Ancient Mariner occupied the first part of the programme, the principal vocalists being Miss Agnes Larkom, Miss Annie Dwyer, Mr. Abercrombie and Mr. Barrington Foote. The work was excellently performed, both Miss Larkom and Mr. Dwyer sang with much precision and effect. The second part was miscellaneous, an irresistible encore being obtained by Miss Larkom for her singing of "Lo! here the gentle lark," with flute obligato by Mr. H. Thomas. At the opening Concert of the Society next season, Gounod's Redemption will be given for the first time in the West of England; and it is announced that no exceptions or claims will be spared to present the work according to the intention of its composer.

READING.—The members of King's Road Choral Society, assisted by a few friends, gave an excellent performance of Handel's Oratorio Judas Maccabæus in the large schoolroom of the Chapel, on the 8th ult. The band and chorus numbered about 100 performers, the principal vocalists being Mrs. Withnall, Miss Colebrook, Miss Nye, Miss Long and Miss Stokes; Messrs. Hawley, Eades, Millar, Lawler, Chenoweth and Sacret. Mr. Collier was an able Conductor.

REDHILL.—An excellent performance of Gounod's Redemption took place on April 24, at the Market Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Adela Vernon, Miss Emily Dodd, Mr. Harcourt, and Mr. W. T. Belcher. The work made a deep impression upon the audience, the salient points being most effectively brought out under the able conductorship of Mr. Henry T. Pringuer.

SALISBURY.—The Sarum Choral Society gave its first Concert of the season at the Assembly Rooms, on Wednesday, April 25, when Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise and a miscellaneous selection (including Haydn's No. 17 Symphony, &c.) were performed. The principal vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkom, Mr. Hanson and Mr. Crick. There was a full band and choir of upwards of a hundred performers; Mr. A. Burnett, Conductor, Mr. W. P. Aylward. The Concert was most successful.—The third of Miss Aylward's Chamber Concerts took place on the 22nd ult. As on former occasions, the concert-giver was assisted by Messrs. Burnett, Moberly, Hill and Whitehouse; and Spohr's Quartet in G minor, Rubinstein's Sonata in G and Schumann's Quintet in E flat were performed and appreciated by the audience. The Concerts will be resumed in September.

SARATOGA, U.S.—The "May Festival," conducted by Professor Richardson, of Temple Grove Seminary, commenced on the 1st ult., and continued during the week. The programmes, which were miscellaneous, had been excellently selected from the works of the best composers. The singing of the choir was extremely good, the Te Deum in G (Hopkins) and "Unfold, ye portals," from Gounod's Redemption, being especially grand and impressive. The principal solo vocalists were Mrs. L. A. Sharp, Miss Carrie Carr, Miss E. C. Cromwell, Mr. C. F. Vebber, of Boston, and Mr. W. H. Sherwood. Other features of the Festival Concerts were the pianoforte solos by Mr. W. H. Sherwood, the violoncello playing of Herr Wilhelm Mueller, violoncellist to the Emperor of Germany, and Dr. W. H. Schultz's violin solos. The accompanists were Miss Lyker and Mr. Ben. Merrill. The Concerts were held at the Congress Hall, with the exception of the closing one, which was given in the Presbyterian Church. The programme consisted almost exclusively of German music. Mr. Gerrit Smith, of Albany, presiding at the organ with much efficiency. The Festival was throughout highly successful.

SWANSEA.—The Glee and Madrigal Society held its second Invitation Concert at the Albert Minor Hall, on the 4th ult. The instrumentalists were Messrs. J. Squire and W. Dowle Jones (violin), and Mr. T. H. Jones (violinello); Miss Aubrey presiding at the pianoforte.

The solo vocalists were Miss Robinson, Messrs. S. P. Wills and D. W. Evans. A selection of part-music was rendered, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Matthews, Organist of St. James's Church, including a setting of Southern's ballad "The Well of St. Keyne," composed by the Conductor of the Society.

TAUNTON.—The members of the Philharmonic Association gave their first Concert of the season at the London Hotel Assembly Rooms, on Thursday, the 10th ult., when Haydn's Creation was performed. The soloists were Madame Catherine Penna, Mr. George Cox and Mr. Robert Hilton, who were all highly efficient. The choruses were well rendered, the Association being ably assisted by a contingent from the Wellington Harmonic Society. The band, numbering forty-six performers, was led by Mr. Michael Rice; Mr. A. W. Waite, principal violoncello. Mr. Thomas J. Dudeney conducted with his well-known ability.

TIMBSBURY.—On Tuesday, April 24, a Concert was given in the Temperance Hall by the recently formed Musical Society. The programme was well selected, and consisted of part-songs, glees, &c., creditably rendered by the members of the Society, the songs and instrumental pieces being sustained by Mrs. Gieve, Mr. G. H. North and Mr. Asquith (Wells Cathedral). Miss Florence M. Fear presided at the piano, Mr. W. Gould was violinist and Mr. C. S. Oxley conducted.

TISBURY, WILTS.—A Vocal and Instrumental Concert was given in the Schoolroom, on the 24th ult., under the patronage of H. K. H. the Prince of Wales, in aid of the funds of the Royal College of Music. The vocalists were Signor Franco Novara, Mr. Acott (Salisbury Cathedral), Mr. Uriah Coombes, Mr. Wade, Mrs. Wells and Miss Frost; instrumentalists, Miss Harding (piano), Miss Nellie Harding (violin) and Mr. Augustus Aylward (violinello). The Concert, which was highly successful, was arranged by Mr. Uriah Coombes.

TOTTENHAM.—The members of the Musical Society gave their last Concert of the season on Thursday evening, the 3rd ult., in the Schoolroom adjoining the High Cross Congregational Church. The programme, which was miscellaneous, opened with an orchestral selection, well played and highly appreciated. The choruses were given with admirable precision and expression, and a clarinet solo, contributed by Mr. A. C. Brooks, was a feature in the programme. A number of songs and duets were excellently rendered. Mr. Fred S. Oram conducted.

WATFORD.—The third and last of the Saturday Popular Concerts was given in the Large Hall of the Public Library on April 21. Miss Alice Brooks's singing was the feature of the evening, all her solos being warmly applauded and several encored. She also joined Mr. W. J. Brooker, who met success in Spizels' duet "Friendship." The other vocalists were Mr. T. Oakley and Mr. Henry Graham, who elicited marked applause in their songs. The Hon. Reginald Capel, at the conclusion of the Concert, paid a well-merited compliment to Miss Brooks, by whose exertions, he said, the performances have been so successfully carried on.

WEDNESBURY.—Dr. Belcher, of Handsworth, gave a Recital on Sunday afternoon, the 6th ult., on the new organ erected in St. James's Church by Messrs. Nicholson and Ward, of Walsall. The programme was excellently rendered, and Dr. Belcher displayed the fine qualities of the instrument. Vocal solos were contributed by Mr. A. Smith, Choirmaster of Tidvale Church, and Mr. S. J. Bishop. Mr. R. W. Smith, Organist of the Church, accompanied.

WELLINGTON, N.Z.—The Orchestral Society gave its second Concert on Friday, March 16, under the direction of Mr. Robert Parker. The programme fully maintained the high standard inaugurated by the first Concert of the Society, its principal feature being Beethoven's Symphony in D (No. 2), which was played in its entirety for the first time in Wellington. It was attentively listened to, and most enthusiastically received by a crowded audience. The other orchestral items were Mozart's Don Juan Overture, Weber's Oberon and Schubert's Entr'acte (in B flat) from Rosamunde, all of which were finely rendered. Mendelssohn's Quintet for strings (Op. 87) was also admirably played, and four of the same composer's part-songs were sung by a choir of amateurs. Handel's song "O ruddier than the cherry" and Barnby's recitative and air "The soft southern breeze" (Rebekah) completed the programme of a very interesting and most successful Concert.

WEM, SALOP.—The members of the Choral Society gave their Annual Concert, on the 10th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Prendergast. The choral and orchestral pieces were well rendered. Madame Oakley was the chief soloist, and her performance was highly appreciated.—Mr. Prendergast, Organist of the Parish Church, gave his monthly Organ Recital on Sunday, the 6th ult., after the evening service. The programme was selected from the works of Mendelssohn, Haydn, Handel, Wagner, &c.

WHITBY.—On Wednesday, the 16th ult., the members of the Choral Society presented their Conductor, Mr. Henry Halgate, with a copy of Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" and a silver-mounted ivory bâton, as a token of their respect and appreciation of his successful efforts.

WILTON.—Mr. Spinney, the retiring Organist of the Parish Church, has been presented with a testimonial consisting of a silver tea-service, in recognition of his past services, which have extended over a period of eighteen years. The presentation was made at the rectory, when nearly all the subscribers were present. Mr. Spinney, in reply to a few words from the rector, who presented the testimonial, alluded in suitable terms to the pleasure he had always taken in his work and the regret he felt at having to vacate a post he had held so long.

WINDSOR.—The Windsor and Eton Choral Society gave a performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea, followed by a selection which included Macfarren's Cantata May Day, on the 4th ult., in the large hall of the Albert Institute. The artists were Miss Hilda Coward, Mr. Dalzell, Mr. Orlando Christian and Mr. A. Joll. Mr. Samuel Smith conducted, Mr. G. Morsch led the band, and Mr. H. R. Coudrey presided at the harmonium.

WOODHOUSE EAVES.—The Choral Society brought its third season to a close on the 4th ult. with an excellent performance of Sterndale Bennett's May Queen. The principal vocalists were Miss Lillingstone-Johnson, Mrs. Heygate, Mr. A. L. Fryer (of St. Paul's Cathedral) and Rev. H. Sayers (of Tenbury); pianoforte, Miss Heygate; harmonium, Mr. Callis. The solos were well rendered, Mr. Fryer's singing being much admired. The second portion of the Concert was miscellaneous, the principal feature of which was Caldicott's glee "Hopsey Dumpty" (sung by Mrs. Heygate, Mrs. Flint, Mr. Fryer and Rev. H. Sayers). Mr. J. Flint conducted.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Percy J. Vincent, to the Temporary Iron Church, Rue des Bassins, Paris.—Mr. J. Jackson, to St. Austin's Church, Stafford.—Mr. O. A. TO the MUSICAL PROFESSION.—An exceptional opportunity presents itself for the ESTABLISHMENT of a HIGH-CLASS CONNECTION for MUSICAL TUITION, or of extending one already in existence either as a Residential College or for Private Study. A substantial house, containing eleven rooms, built and appointed in a superior manner; the interior is artistically decorated and of an unconventional ornate character, situate in the heart of the metropolis. There has been a good business done in "Practices" alone during the past eleven years, which is capable of almost unlimited extension by a qualified instructor. The three-manual organ of 18 stops, by HUNTER, pronounced by competent judges to be unique and most complete; this is fitted with duplicate blowing arrangements, and has during the past ten years been exclusively blown by hydraulic power, controlled by a draw stop at the keyboard. A magnificent 7-octave Pianoforte by R&S, which obtained the gold medal from the Exhibition of 1862, was purchased therefrom for 100 guineas and fitted by Hunter with thirty independent pedals for practice. A sweet-toned Harmonium by GILMORE (optional), with hand and foot blower and twenty independent pedal notes; burden on separate pan; the pedals of either Piano or Harmonium can be removed in a moment, and each has a suitable set; these, together with an extensive collection of music and a lease of the desirable premises, can be acquired on fair business terms, to include Goodwill and all the exceptional conveniences already enumerated. Bona fide principals can have all particulars by letter or appointment from J. F. Blennerhasset, 1A, Vernon Street, Pentonville, London, W.C.

EPPS'S COCOA.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by the careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has prepared our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage, which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette. BY HER MAJESTY'S ROYAL LETTERS PATENT.

Members of the Musical Profession and Trade are requested to apply to the Inventor and Patentee for Drawings, full and explicit Explanation, also prices of this, the only,

PATENT ACTION

FOR ATTACHING

Organ Pedals to Pianofortes.

J. AINSWORTH

Inventor and Patentee of the above, also Sole Proprietor, begs to draw the attention of the musical profession and trade to the fact that (having access to the finest and most improved machinery of the present day) the workmanship of Pedals and Action supplied by him is that which is sure to command favour.

PRICES OF PATENT ACTION AND ORGAN PEDALS:

A.O. Set of Straight Pedals and Patent Action,
£6 15s. 0d.

B.O. Set of Radiating Pedals and Patent Action,
£7 15s. 0d.

C.O. Set of Straight Concave Pedals and Patent Action, as recommended at the Organ Conference,
£7 15s. 0d.

D.O. Patent Action only,
£4 4s. 0d.

EXTRA for IMPROVEMENT, on above prices, whereby the Organ Pedals can be Disconnected, Removed, and Replaced Instantly,
15s. 0d.

THE ABOVE PEDALS ARE MADE FROM BIRCH.

Pedals supplied made from Mahogany, at £1 10s. extra.

At the termination of Six Months the last number sent out of this, the only Patent Action, was 2,506. Since the addition of my improvement as above (a month ago), the number has risen from 2,670 to 3,503; thus it will be seen that the increase as above will average over 9,990 per annum.

The great success which has attended the above invention is due to its UNIQUE PERFECTNESS, and the fact that it fully supplies a want long felt by Organists and Organ Students—viz.,

A PLEASANT AUXILIARY ABSOLUTELY FREE FROM ANNOYANCES.

This Action may be seen in almost every town in England. Where it can not be seen it will be SENT ON APPROVAL (if desired).

Pedals attached to Harmoniums and American Organs.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED.

THE TRADE & PROFESSION LIBERALLY DEALT WITH.

TESTIMONIALS.

W. HUTT, Organist, Winchester College, says: "I have carefully examined Mr. Ainsworth's Patent Action for Attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte and consider it a great improvement on all other Actions I have seen. Organists and Organ Students will find it invaluable."

CH. H. MOSS, Organist, Belfast, says: "I have now tested your Action with improvement and find it very satisfactory, quite equal to all you say. I consider the improvement very desirable and shall be pleased to recommend your Action."

WM. BAMFORD, Organist, Rochdale, says: "I have completed the Attachment of the Patent Action you were good enough to supply me with on approval, and must say that it surpasses my expectations. Such an Invention claims the attention of the Musical Profession and Trade, and I may say that I should be pleased to act as one of your Agents."

ENGLISH MECHANIC, says: "After a thorough examination of Ainsworth's Patent Action, it is a pleasure to state that it is constructed on the most reliable principles and manufactured from the most durable material."

CAUTION.

"Her Majesty's Royal Letters Patent have been granted only to the Lever principle for Attaching Organ Pedals to a pianoforte, of which J. Ainsworth is the Sole Proprietor." Members of the Musical Profession and Trade should note that Ainsworth's is the only Patent Pedal Action. A reward will be given to every person who has purchased an Action other than the above which is stated as being a Patent Action, on full name and address being sent to the above Patentee.

"Will she come from the hill, will she come from the valley."

"Another delicious page is the Corsican Love-Song."—Sunday Times.

"A smooth flowing love-song, admirably in harmony with the situation."—Daily Chronicle.

"Orso's love-song is flowing and graceful."—Weekly Dispatch.

"One of the most perfect pieces of melody in the opera."—Society.

OLD CORSICAN BALLAD,

"So he thought of his love."

"So full of character as well as beauty."—Daily Telegraph.

"The song itself is simply lovely, and Mr. Mackenzie has caught the ideal spirit of Schubert's pathetic and lovely lieder."—Standard.

"We like, even more than this, the old ballad which Chilina sings in the same act."—Sunday Times.

"An air that will probably become almost as popular as the oft-heard Vocero."—Daily Chronicle.

"Chilina's Old Corsican Ballad is deliciously fresh and piquant."—Weekly Dispatch.

HERE OFTEN HAVE I SAT

(Tenor Song).

"The beautiful tenor song, 'Here often have I sat,' has all the elements of popularity in its ring."—Echo.

AH, WELL I CALL TO MIND

(Duet for Soprano and Tenor).

"An effective movement, in which the suave vocal writing is enhanced by the varied orchestral accompaniments."—Daily News.

Miss Kilmansegg & her Golden Leg

GRAND OLD-FASHIONED CANTATA

BY

CAROLINE HOLLAND

Words by THOMAS HOOD.

Price 3s.

"In the music Miss Holland has written to Hood's poem, she shows herself to be possessed of real talent for dramatic writing, combined with a thoroughly English vein of melody."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Miss Kilmansegg" is not only a very musical composition as far as the mere details of the labour and construction are concerned, but it is also full of those subtle touches of art which can 'raise or quell' the feelings of the listeners. . . . Is at times tender as well as comic, and never is wanting in the element of refinement."—Morning Post.

"Miss Holland's music is extremely tuneful and pleasing, and it overflows with fun. Her setting of the more comic passages of Hood's poem is an example of admirable feeling. . . . The work was extremely well rendered. . . . the whole chorus entered heartily into the spirit of the fun. The Cantata may be cordially recommended to small Choral Societies in search of light music."—Athenaeum.

"From among the numerous Concerts recently given, a couple may be selected at which work of an unusually interesting character was done. One of these took place on the 4th of May, when a large audience gathered to hear the performance, by Miss Holland's choir, of that lady's Cantata 'Miss Kilmansegg and her Golden Leg.' This has now been given four times this season. . . . The music is bright and pretty, and more than one number is likely to become popular. It was capably performed by the choir."—Musical Review.

PHILIPPI

A SACRED CANTATA OR CHURCH ORATORIO

THE WORDS BY THE

REV. J. POWELL METCALFE

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

F. E. GLADSTONE

Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Octavo, Paper cover, price 2s. 6d.

"Dr. Gladstone having intended his work for church use, we expect to find the music solid in character, sober in expression, and liberally contrapuntal. In this we are not disappointed. . . . Firmness and trick effect would be out of harmony with the spirit of English church music, and Dr. Gladstone has avoided both with indisputable success. . . . There is abundance of talent in the work."—Daily Telegraph.

"Dr. Gladstone's music to the words is learned and clever without being abstruse or unvoiced; on the contrary, the several numbers are so written as to bring their own interest both to the singers and to the hearers. . . . With a view to enlisting the sympathies of those who listen to music for the immediate effect it produces, or for its apt association with words, Dr. Gladstone has contrived his design most ably. It may, therefore, be recommended to the consideration of church choirs and choral societies with every confidence."—Morning Post.

"The composer expresses his thoughts in a clear and pleasing manner. The voice parts are soberly and effectively written."—Academy.

"The purely religious style of Dr. Gladstone is admirably suited for the subject he has chosen: for although throughout the Cantata he has most sympathetically coloured the incidents of the narrative, in no part has he been betrayed into an ultra-dramatic setting of the events which would in the slightest degree unfit the work for the sacred locality which should be its natural home. . . . We heartily welcome so excellent a specimen of church oratorio as the one now under notice."—Musical Times.

THE HOLY CITY

A SACRED CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.
"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The 'Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

NEW PART-SONG. PRICE 3D.

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

This Part-Song, written for, and dedicated to, the Kyrie Society, is laid out in Mr. Gaul's very best manner, and while recalling, for its beautiful effects, his elegant Part-Song, "The Silent Land," the resemblance begins and ends there. Mr. Gaul knows to the very letter the capabilities of the voices he writes for, and one is perfectly safe, even after a single experience only, in predicting a widespread popularity to "The Children's Hour."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

COLOMBA

A Lyrical Drama in Four Acts, founded on Prosper Mérimée's Tale by

FRANCIS HUEFFER

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

A. C. MACKENZIE

Price, in Paper Cover, 5s.; Scarlet Cloth, 7s. 6d.

"Wherever Mr. Mackenzie may have acquired his experience, the fact that he has a firm grasp of the form and spirit of dramatic music cannot be denied by any one who has ears to hear and eyes to study a score. Neither is there a trace of the beginner's uncertainty in the purely musical part of this work. Mr. Mackenzie has a style of his own; he owes allegiance to no other composer, although he has evidently studied the recent developments of music with care and intelligence. . . . The manner in which the gentle theme of the Vocero is worked up to the passionate cry of vendetta is a real stroke of genius."—The Times,

"Colomba" is without doubt the most powerful English opera of modern times."—Daily Telegraph.

"It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that no event of higher importance than the production of 'Colomba' has for years stirred the world of English music. . . . It may be said, without hesitation, that the new opera is an acquisition and an ornament to English art. . . . Any composer might have been proud of such grace, spontaneity, tunefulness, and character as are here apparent. . . . The ballet music almost deserves a separate notice, so bright, piquant and diversified are the melodies. . . . The saltarello, too, would be enough to make Mendelssohn jealous, were he alive, and allowing him a jealous disposition, contrary to his nature."—Standard.

"To sum up our impression of Mr. Mackenzie's work—it may be characterised as the production of earnest endeavour and considerable artistic acquirements, manifesting much aptitude for the realisation of dramatic effects, especially in concerted music, and a practised command of orchestral combinations and varieties."—Daily News.

"The music has a great amount of that individual character which, for want of a more perfect term, is called genius. The scoring is masterly throughout, and as the voices are treated tenderly and considerately, the pleasure of the hearer is proportionately great."—The Morning Post.

"A success at once pronounced and decisive last night awaited Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's opera 'Colomba.' From the striking orchestral Prelude (encored) to the magnificent Finale there was no diminution in the interest of an audience comprising a large number of musical professors."—Daily Chronicle.

"With regard to the music to which Mr. Mackenzie has set this interesting and picturesque story, it may be said at once that it far exceeds anything else that has been heard from his pen, both in melody and dramatic force. Hitherto there has been no English work in Mr. Rosa's répertoire which would bear comparison with the operatic productions of contemporary France or Germany; but in 'Colomba' Mr. Mackenzie has produced a work which can hold its own beside any opera of the past decade."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Colomba" is a most valuable addition to the repertory of English opera, and justifies highest anticipations of its composer's future."—Globe.

"A work of which Wagner, in his best 'Flying Dutchman' time, might have been justly proud. . . . The Overture is charming. There is not a dull scene (musically) in the whole opera, of which, as far as melody goes, the gem is certainly the 'Corsican Ballad' in the third act, prettily sung by Miss Perry as Chilina, to whom, though hers is comparatively a small part, fall the two airs to which the opera will owe its popularity, and through which it will become widely known to the concert-going and outside public."—Punch.

"Colomba" is throughout full of charming tunes, some of them of a nature to haunt the ear but invariably refined, and even when most lively free from the slightest tinge of vulgarity. . . . We cordially congratulate Mr. Rosa on having added to his répertoire an opera which is an honour to English art, and we believe is likely to keep the stage, and we no less heartily compliment Mr. Mackenzie on having made another step upward on the ladder of fame, and surpassed in 'Colomba' all that he had before achieved."—Athenæum.

"It is past a doubt that Mr. Mackenzie has written the best English opera; but he has done more. He is on the road to European fame; and he possesses sufficient individuality, energy, and, at the same time, becoming modesty to enable him to press forward without precipitancy, and (health and strength permitting) to reach the goal. The success of 'Colomba' is an encouragement to English musical art; and, as time unfolds the secrets of the future, we may find that the seed now sown will 'shoot out great branches.'"—Academy.

"The Vocero is treated so as to be a lovely thing in itself; and it gives rise to a theme which is afterwards employed in the most skillful, appropriate and effective manner. From this alone it might be judged that Mr. Mackenzie had a musical sense of poetry as well as a remarkable command of orchestration."—Saturday Review.

"As to 'Colomba,' its success is altogether beyond the most sanguine expectations. On Friday evening hundreds of people were turned away from the theatre, and I was informed that the demand for seats was unprecedented in Mr. Rosa's experience as a manager."—Weekly Dispatch.

"In 'Colomba' melody, and melody of a very fascinating kind, reigns supreme. . . . In short the opera is musically no less than dramatically interesting from the opening Prelude to the final bar."—Sunday Times.

D.O. Patent Action only, £4 4s. 0d.

EXTRA for IMPROVEMENT, on above prices, whereby the Organ Pedals can be Disconnected, Removed, and Replaced Instantly, 15s. 0d.

SPECIAL C.O.

Special C.O. A Set of Straight Concave Pedals and Patent Action with all accessories complete, price £72. Those who desire a really SPLENDID SET OF C.O. PEDALS should procure the Special C.O. They are made from solid Mahogany throughout, highly French polished, of superior finish, and altogether give a most pleasing and desirable appearance in a good room. The Unparalleled Success which has attended Ainsworth's "The only Patent Pedal Action" is due to its superiority and the fact that it fully supplies a long felt want—viz.,

A PLEASANT AUXILIARY FOR ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS ABSOLUTELY FREE FROM ANNOYANCES.

Ainsworth's Patent Pedal Action and Organ Pedals should be recommended by every member of the Musical Trade and Profession who desires to recommend a Perfect Action and first-class Organ Pedals of superior finish. Unlike other actions it is perfectly Noiseless in working, has convenient and thoroughly reliable adjustments, Brass adjusting Pins, Brass Screw Eyes, Sliding Mahogany Levers, Bushed Mahogany Guides throughout, Noiseless Cushions, Mahogany combination Nuts and Brass Screw Eyes for Backfalls and Levers, Instantaneous adjustment for Backfalls, allows the pedals to be drawn away and replaced at pleasure. Pedals can also be disconnected instantly. Ainsworth's Organ Pedals are sure to find favour amongst those who desire a first-class set. They are well made and of neat construction. Special attention is also given to the touch, the Springs being adjusted to an equality by a new process which ensures an accuracy hitherto unattained.

TESTIMONIAL.

"Mr. Ainsworth,

"Dear Sir,

"I was exceedingly pleased with the inspection of Pedals and action you kindly invited me to at your establishment previous to purchasing a set for one of my pupils at Bursley. I am now glad to say my pupil is highly pleased with them, and I must confess that the Pedals are much less noiseless in working than any I have seen. The Patent Action I consider a model of perfection, and I feel sure it will establish itself as the Perfect Pedal Action for Pianofortes. Several organists have made inspection and express themselves thoroughly satisfied. The disconnecting movement is most simple and useful, and the removal of pedals being instantaneous is a very desirable accomplishment.

"I remain, yours truly,
"JAMES HACKING,

"Organist, Parish Church, Padiham."

INVENTOR AND PATENTEE,

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

To show the popularity gained by this invention, and the way it is making in the houses of organists and students, the last Patent Action sent out previous to March 1 was numbered 2,024; thus it will be seen that the turn-out for six months as above will give a total of over 4,000 per annum.

Agents for Birmingham, where it may be seen, Messrs. ROGERS and PRIESTLY, Colmore Row.

Agents for Glasgow, where it may be seen, Mr. ALEXANDER BIGGAR, 102, Sauchiehall Street.

Agents for Dundee and Perth, Messrs. PATERSON, SONS and CO., 130, Nethergate, Dundee, and Princes Street, Perth.

Agent for Halifax and West Vale, where it may be inspected, Mr. SQUIRE HAIGH, Victoria Street, West Vale.

Agents are required in every Town. Apply to the Inventor and Patentee as above.

CAUTION.—This being the latest Patent Pedal Action, intending purchasers should note that it is the most perfect and reliable, as it contains every improvement; and being manufactured solely of well-seasoned mahogany, carefully bushed with red cloth, will continue to give the very best Pedal practice to Organists and Students.

Kindly read the testimonial above.

Before purchasing send to the Inventor for the drawings and prices of this the most recent Patent Pedal Action.

Organists should recommend these Pedals and Patent Action to their Pupils.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

JULY 1, 1883.

GLUCK'S INTRODUCTION TO PARIS.

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

EVERY reader of musical history is aware that Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice," the work in which he first asserted himself as an operatic reformer, was brought out at Vienna in October, 1762, but perhaps few know under what circumstances it served as an introduction of the composer to Paris. The story is worth telling, and I propose relating it here, for the most part as found in a chapter of M. Adolphe Jullien's interesting book "La Cour et l'Opéra sous Louis XVI."

In the year above named a certain Count Durazzo was director of his Imperial and Royal Majesty's Theatre in the Kaiserstadt, while in Paris lived and laboured at his vocation of dramatist the famous Favart. Between these two widely sundered men—Vienna was a long way from the French capital in 1762—very intimate business relations existed. As a matter of fact, Favart played the part of Durazzo's theatrical man-of-all-work at the recognised headquarters of drama. His duties were to watch all new pieces in Paris and the provinces; to give his opinion upon artists as they arose; to keep the Count well-informed about the course of artistic events, great and small, and even to concern himself with dancers, scenery, and stage appointments. This being in addition to his regular engagement as arranger and adapter of pieces for the Vienna theatre, it is easy to suppose that Favart had his hands full, and desired no addition to his labours. The Count, however, was ready to exact further service at the point of time with which we are now concerned. "Orfeo ed Euridice" had made so great a success in Vienna that Durazzo determined to have the score engraved, and as that could best be done in Paris, the question arose of an agent to manage the transaction on the spot. Naturally, the director thought of Favart, and at once wrote to him on the subject. Favart, on his part, was fully entitled to decline a charge lying quite outside the range of his functions, but it happened that the dramatist believed himself to be under some sort of obligation to Gluck. In 1759 the German master had written new music to his opéra-comique "Cythère Assiégée," and thereby contributed largely to the success of its production in Vienna. Hence Durazzo found Favart quite willing to undertake the business of passing "Orfeo" through the hands of engraver and printer, and the manuscript score was sent off to Paris towards the close of the year 1762.

At this point comes in a letter from the dramatist to the director, dated January 28, 1763. Favart begins by saying that the MS. has not reached him, but, on inquiry he has discovered that M. Blandel, the person charged to deliver it, had lent it to the Baron D'Olbac, and then to the Baron Vossuitten, who, first copying some of the airs, returned it to Blandel. He then continues:—

"I cannot tell your Excellency what the engraving will cost, not knowing the number of plates, but we generally pay three livres, sometimes four, for each plate in folio. If your Excellency charges me to get this opera engraved, you may be sure that it will cost you much less than if you had addressed yourself directly to the tradesmen, as a reduction is made to authors and musicians. When I receive the score of 'Orfeo' I will give your Excellency an approximate idea of the outlay not only for engraving but printing and binding a certain number of copies."

Within a few days from the date of this letter, Favart received the MS. and on February 6 we find him writing to Durazzo as follows:—

"I was greatly disquieted on the subject of the opera 'Orfeo ed Euridice.' I feared that it had reached my house and been stolen, but M. François relieved me by sending it on February 2, after a delay of three months. I at once communicated with engravers and printers, who estimated that the work would cost at least 800 livres. I am not their dupe, but this might well be, and so thinks M. Mondonville, who has had experience. Let me here say in parenthesis, that Mondonville, in running through 'Orfeo,' was charmed by the talent of M. Gluck and, with all respect to the Italian composers, I believe that his opinion is worth something."

The Mondonville here referred to was, of course, the then famous composer and champion of the national style in the artistic contest known as the "Guerre des Bouffons." Let him enjoy all the credit due to the Frenchman who first appreciated Gluck's new departure.

Favart soon discovered that he had charged himself with a troublesome responsibility. In the first place, the engravers wanted money in advance, and demanded payment almost plate by plate. Favart had no cash to spare for such a purpose. In the next place, no musician could be got to see the work through the press. Some said that the MS. was full of mistakes, and at least one, Duni, avowed that certain passages shocked him by their violence. In this emergency what could poor Favart do but write to Durazzo, seeking from him counsel and aid. Here is a portion of his letter, dated April 5, 1763:—

"We await the order of your Excellency to begin engraving 'Orfeo.' They demand advances which I am not able to supply, and the Comte de Starenberg, whom I have consulted, advises me to make known to you my entire powerlessness. I flatter myself you know that self-interest does not influence me, and that the honour of being your agent ought to suffice, but you do not intend that I should suffer."

Favart then details a long list of petty expenses to which he is put on the Count's behalf, and continues:—

"These minute particulars are not worthy of your Excellency: I dare to think that they are not worthy of me. Your Excellency will act as it pleases you in the matter, and with whatever you do I shall be satisfied."

The letter contained also a proposal that the arrival of Gluck in Paris should be waited for, as then the opera would go to press under its composer's own eye. Durazzo took this advice, and forthwith sent a letter to his Paris agent, in which he said:—

"I have received your letter, my dear Favart, and am sorry to hear that the copy of 'Orfeo' sent by me is so full of mistakes that no one will undertake the editing. You should, therefore, as you say, wait for M. Gluck's arrival in Paris, where he will be towards the end of May. Before then you will have received the letter (preface), which must go at the head of the work, and if, meanwhile, you want money for printing it, M. Piller will supply you."

Under these circumstances, most men would have put the troublesome business aside till Gluck should come and look after it himself; but Favart was deeply interested in the success of his agency, and did not give up hope of persuading some musician to act as editor of "Orfeo." At last, in a lucky moment, he went to Philidor, the famous chess-player, who was then not less eminent as a composer, and whose "Tom Jones" makes him interesting to the compatriots of Fielding. I will let Favart himself tell how he succeeded with this master. Writing to his principal on April 19, 1763, he said:—

"Duni* has made the score of 'Orfeo ed Euridice' appear to me a monster: he says that he would not undertake to correct the copyist's faults for 500 livres. I have shown it to Philidor, who is not by a great deal so difficult, and offers to correct the false notes gratis, and to look after the engraving. For this he asks of your Excellency only a single copy. He has attentively examined the opera, and finds that the copyist's errors are really but a small number. He is enchanted with the beauty of the work, and has shed tears of pleasure over it. He has always had the greatest esteem for Chevalier Gluck's talents, but that feeling, since knowing 'Orfeo,' has changed to veneration. Now, therefore, we can at once set about engraving without being obliged to wait M. Gluck's arrival. On this subject I expect your Excellency's orders, and also the design for the frontispiece which it is necessary to execute. I shall employ only able artists and honest men. You may be sure, monseigneur, that there will be no surreptitious copies, and that not one will appear without your Excellency's permission."

The Count very sensibly approved the proposed arrangement, and Philidor set about his task so earnestly, that on May 4, Favart was able to write:—

"Thanks to Philidor, we have begun the engraving of 'Orfeo.' I have signified to your Excellency that this famous musician, who is an admirer of Gluck's talent, has declared himself friendly to the work, and aspires to the honour of being its godfather."

Soon the time drew near when Gluck was expected to arrive in Paris. It seems that he had undertaken to open the new theatre at Boulogne, and intended to visit the capital on his way. Durazzo wrote again to Favart, informing him of all this, and adding:—

"I recommend him (Gluck) to your friendship. He will have a memorandum of what is needful to be done for the service of the Court next year, and I beg you to make a note of it in case I should not have time to send you a duplicate. My first order to him was to explain to you the prevailing taste here, and to communicate all that you say. I will send you a letter that I desire to preface the edition of 'Orfeo,' which it will be necessary to correct as soon as Gluck has arrived. I beg you to press this upon him, for he is naturally indolent, and very indifferent about his own works."

Concerning this feature in Gluck's character there is uniform testimony, and we have reason to believe that his laziness and carelessness were extreme. One authority says of him that he would not take the pains of a copyist with regard to his best compositions, and Berlioz, in "A travers Chants," declares that to avoid writing the viola part in "Orfeo" he put the words "Col basso," heedless of the fact that at times the violas, two octaves above the basses, were above the violins also; consecutive octaves thus appearing between the extreme parts.

Favart was charmed by the prospect of seeing Gluck in Paris, and offered him the hospitality of his house in the Rue Mauconseil, even going so far as to announce and make preparations for a grand fête whereby to honour the musician's arrival. The worthy playwright's letter of invitation is worth reading, alike for the sake of writer and recipient. It runs as follows:—

"Monsieur,—Mgr. le Comte de Durazzo has signified to me that you will reach Paris in the course of this month. No amateur of talent can be ignorant of your reputation. I have not the honour to know you personally, but I have always desired that advantage. May I flatter myself that you will respond to this feeling? Yes, I venture to hope it, by the regard I have always had for your merit; by that reason I count that you will lodge nowhere save at my house. I have a furnished apartment to offer you; you will find there a good clavecin and other instruments, a small garden and every liberty—that is to say, you will be as in your own home. Although in the noisiest part of Paris, our house, between court and garden, is a kind of solitude, where work can be done as tranquilly as in the country. If I am happy enough, monsieur, to have my offer accepted by you, I beg you to let me know beforehand the day of your arrival. My address is Rue Mauconseil, near the Comédie-Italienne, opposite the grand entrance to Saint Jacques de l'Hôpital. I have the honour to be, with all the respect due to your talents, monsieur," &c., &c.

Meanwhile Favart and Philidor pushed on the engraving of "Orfeo," having received from Durazzo the sum of 1,500 livres. In acknowledging this sum he said, on May 21, 1763:—

"We are going ahead with 'Orfeo,' Philidor supervising the work; and I reckon that when M. Gluck arrives he will find it completed. I await him with impatience. . . . To give me an opportunity of honouring men of merit is to do me a real service. My house will be that of M. Gluck, if he choose to accept it."

Poor Favart was disappointed after all, and his hospitable preparations went for nothing. May passed, and June followed it without bringing Gluck, Favart and his wife meanwhile looking from day to day for the master's arrival. At last the worthy man could wait no longer without speaking, and, under cover of business, he sent a letter of inquiry to Durazzo, dated July 18, 1763:—

"Your Excellency, by letter dated May 9, intimated that M. Gluck would arrive at Paris from Boulogne bearing a memorandum putting me au fait with the requirements of the Court for next year. The first order your Excellency gave him (these are the terms of the letter) was to explain to me the taste of the Vienna theatre. As M. Gluck has not arrived, and I have not received the instructions announced, it was very natural that I should wait. Hence my silence."

Favart had hardly sent this off, when he received a letter from a Viennese friend, which settled the matter of Gluck's visit:—

"You will not see the Chevalier Gluck. He has returned here. He was just starting from Boulogne for Paris when the Count recalled him to Vienna, because, the Opera House (in Paris) having been destroyed by fire, a journey to the capital seemed useless."

Though sorely disappointed with regard to the composer, Favart lost no chance of furthering the interests of his work. He went about in society showing bits of the music, inflaming curiosity to the utmost, and succeeding so well in enlisting the sympathies of musicians that he was able to write: "All our best connoisseurs to whom I have shown 'Orfeo' think, with justice, that it is an epoch-making work, which will descend to posterity." In December, 1763, the opera was nearly ready for publication, and it became necessary to write to Count Durazzo on matters of business connected therewith. Here is an extract from Favart's letter, dated January 2, 1764:—

* A well-known composer of the period, who had set to music Favart's "Ninette à la Cour."

"The total (cost) will be about 2,000 livres; the copies will be sold at fifteen livres. . . . When your Excellency has been supplied, I will advertise the edition in the public papers and foreign journals, and I only ask, monseigneur, power to dispose of six copies—that is to say, one for Philidor, one for Sodi, one for myself, which I beg you to grant me, and the rest for such journalists as are entitled to expect them. Beyond that about a dozen copies must go to the Chancellerie for the King's library, the police, the censor, &c."

The business having now come to a head, Durazzo began to show a white feather on the score of expenses. Favart was equal to the occasion, and wrote:—

"Monseigneur, as far as the edition of 'Orfeo' disquiets you, I willingly engage, at my own risk, to bear all expenses after you shall have taken a hundred copies at fifteen livres each."

Favart's published correspondence being imperfect, it does not clearly appear that his offer was accepted. The inference is that it was not.

On January 18, 1764, the Count informed Favart that both Gluck and himself would soon be in Paris, and advised him not to proceed to publication till they had seen and approved the frontispiece. That both director and composer reached the French capital appears from an entry in the diary of Wille, the famous engraver, who wrote under date March 2, 1764: "M. le Comte Durazzo, director of spectacles at the Imperial Court, having arrived in this city, came to see me." Further on we read: "On the 9th came to see me M. le Chevalier Gluck, the famous composer, so well known in all Europe where good music is esteemed. He is a fine fellow in other respects, and remained several hours with me. He is in the service of the Empress." Both men stayed in Paris but a little while, though long enough to settle the last detail concerning "Orfeo"; and in the middle of April the edition was advertised as on sale.

Paris rushed to the shops and bought—nine copies.

We know this through a letter written in answer to the Count, who had said, "Inform me how the sale of 'Orfeo' goes on, for I don't want you to suffer any loss thereby." Favart was not, however, to be frightened from the obligation he had chivalrously undertaken. Should the transaction prove as disastrous as it promised to be, he would abide by his offer. The business part of the affair continued open till 1770, and there is reason to believe that Favart was not actually out of pocket by it. He had lost plenty of time, it is true, but Durazzo seems to have taken care that he should be the poorer in no other way.

Gluck's introduction to Paris, through the French edition to "Orfeo," had an unpromising opening and a disastrous end. The public treated the new work with supreme indifference, and allowed it to drop out of memory. Ten years passed before the day of revenge came round. In April, 1774, Gluck produced his "Orphée" at the Académie Royale, and saw it through forty-five consecutive representations, given amid growing enthusiasm. Unhappily, all his earnest friends of 1763 were not there to rejoice at the triumph. Mondonville had died six months before, but Favart survived and lived till 1792, when Gluck had achieved the immortality foretold for him, and had passed away full of honour and renown.

The lesson of the foregoing story I need not point out. Every man knows that it may often be said concerning the seed of genius, "It is sown in dishonour, it is raised in glory."

PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.

"If we live a hundred years longer," wrote Berlioz to Wagner nearly thirty years ago, "I imagine we shall know many things and many men." And he might have added—we shall forget many things and many men. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries there were many illustrious organists and contrapuntists, such as Frescobaldi, who, according to Bains, attracted 30,000 persons on the occasion of his first performance at St. Peter's; Froberger, the celebrated harpsichord and organ player (and we could also say organ-blower, for he it was who blew the organ at Westminster Abbey when Gibbons played before the Court); Pachelbel, Telemann, Mattheson. Their names are to be found in dictionaries, and occasionally on programmes of historical concerts, their manuscripts are preserved in public and private libraries; but musicians in general now only take real interest in the life and music of the most distinguished name of that period—John Sebastian Bach. What about Buononcini, the famous rival of Handel? He wrote operas and oratorios; but they are little known and never played. Gluck's operas still keep the boards, but how about those of his rival the Italian Piccini? Yet by many intelligent contemporaries he was reckoned Gluck's equal, and by some his superior. About a hundred years ago we find Benda making a sensation with his duo-dramas "Ariadne" and "Medea"; Mozart himself listened to one of them twice with the greatest interest, and liked them so much that he used to carry them about with him. But Benda and many other illustrious contemporaries of Mozart have passed away and vanished like a dream. In reading Pohl's life of Haydn we come across a long list of composers of symphonies who had a share with the great master in the notice of musicians and the favour of the public—Dittersdorf, Galuppi, Gyrowetz, Vanhall, Wagenseil, and others. But who cares for them now? Pohl again, reminding us that very many of Haydn's quartets have stood the test of a century, says that he could give more than a hundred names of quartet-writers belonging to the Haydn period whose works have long passed out of sight—nay, many who were forgotten even before the commencement of the present century. And yet they were once known and admired. And what about the composers of the Beethoven period, which belongs, indeed, to our century? There are illustrious musicians still living who knew the celebrities of those days; and hence the gradual disappearance of such notable names appeals to us more forcibly than the almost total oblivion of musicians who lived "a very long time ago." The Beethoven period is also specially instructive, for by its proximity to us we can study in a fuller and more satisfactory manner the causes by which musical life and death are determined. And, to come still nearer to the present, read only the list of composers whom Schumann wrote about and thought they showed signs of promise. Out of ten we may now know one, but where are the nine? In some cases, perhaps, it may be thought that the importance and popularity of these "dead" men have been exaggerated; but we have many trustworthy accounts tending to prove that they really were for the time famous. We have spoken of such eminent men as Buononcini and Piccini. Let us just name one more—Ignaz Pleyel—and hear what was thought of him by contemporaries whose opinions are certainly of some weight. Haydn, writing from London in 1792, when Pleyel was engaged at the Professional Concerts, says: "We shall each take our share of success, and go home satisfied." And Mozart already, in 1784, wrote to his father: "It will be a happy thing for music if, when the time arrives, Pleyel should replace Haydn for us."

So much for the names forgotten. But we have learnt many new ones. Will the inexorable law of the survival of the fittest continue to act? Will many composers now well known and esteemed pass away into oblivion, and musicians at the end, say, of next century know only a few of the notabilities of our day? Of one thing we may be pretty well sure—Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven have not effaced or even dimmed the names of Bach and Handel—they have rather helped to reveal more fully the greatness of these men; and so, whatever composers of the present are handed down to the next century as the most fitting survivals, the great triumvirate will lose neither their fame nor their splendour. The best quartets of Haydn, the best operas of Mozart, and the best symphonies of Beethoven will last as long as the art of music itself. It is not difficult to point to certain works of Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Brahms, and others and declare them inferior and even weak specimens of their respective composers; but would any one be bold enough to single out one name among the recognised men of the present and assert that it will be no more to musicians in the future than the Dittersdorfs, Vanhalls, and Pleyels to those of our time? Such a thing appears scarcely possible. How strange would it seem, if any of us could revisit this earth a hundred years hence, to read, perhaps, in the musical histories of that time how Mendelssohn, a popular composer of the early part of the nineteenth century, wrote two oratorios and other works; how Chopin, a sentimental composer, fascinated the pianists of his day but was soon forgotten; or how Liszt dazzled for a time some of his friends and admirers, but never wrote a work of any real or lasting value. The future is fortunately hidden from us, and thus each generation works on with the experience of the past to guide it and the verdict of the future to encourage it. In some instances thoughtful men have been able to predict coming events with tolerable accuracy. One could, of course, venture to assert that in fifty years Beethoven will occupy the most exalted position in the history of music, because his works have already stood the test of time; and even if any of the composers of the present should equal or surpass him, it will take as long, or even longer, before they can oust him from the sovereign position which he holds in the world's esteem. Again, one cannot be far wrong in supposing that Wagner, who laboured for half a century to establish certain theories, and who has exerted so powerful an influence over dramatic composers of all countries, will be an important factor in the future development of music for the stage. But it is quite a different thing to announce the decline and perhaps fall of the heroes of our day. Take, for example, composers whose names have been prominent only for the last twenty years. No signs of decay may be visible, but if greater geniuses follow them the former will decrease and the latter increase; and thus, long before a century has elapsed, new men and new things may be in vogue. "The greater glory will dim the less." It is, however, the duty of all serious musicians to watch the signs of the times, to encourage what is good and to fight against what is bad; they cannot prevent the ultimate victory of the strong over the weak, but by unscrupulous praise or unjust censure real progress in art, as in other matters, may for a time be arrested. For the future concerns us; coming generations will reap what is now sown, and the better the seed the richer the harvest. When the world is a hundred years older, musicians will be able to discuss in a calm and philosophical spirit some of the burning questions of the day; at any rate, they will, by the very reason of distance, be better able to appreciate the labours and understand the character of the musicians of the nineteenth century. They will perhaps have reached the end of what appears to be a period of transition. The opinions of Wagner with regard to instrumental music, and his theory of the combination of the arts, will have been weighed in the balances, and possibly found wanting. And, lastly, the earnest strivings of English composers will have borne fruit; and let us hope that English musical art will have names and works of which our country and the world may be proud. But the future, though it may bring fresh light and solve many difficulties, will open up new paths and start fresh problems. Finality in art is a thing neither to be wished for nor expected.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

CHERUBINI's position at the Théâtre de Monsieur, though decidedly honourable, was not very remunerative. His annual salary did not exceed 4,000 francs, for which he engaged to superintend rehearsals and act as composer to the house, writing two French operas every year, in which, according to the then custom, he had no property. It is true that he was rarely required to fulfil the conditions, and between 1789 and 1794 produced only two operas; but, on the other hand, he had to labour hard upon the works played by the Italian section of the company. MM. Viotti and Léonard were wise enough to know that Italian opera pur et simple would never do for the French, who required more dramatic interest and truth than satisfied Cherubini's countrymen. Hence they kept a poet on the premises to alter libretti, Cherubini's business being to provide music wherever the changes made required it. As the management was unusually active, producing twenty French and Italian operas in eleven months, this involved a good deal of toil. Cherubini, however, felt quite content. He occupied a post which kept him before the public, and enabled him rapidly to build up a reputation.

The new venture fell upon troublous times. In the first place, Viotti and Léonard could not open on the date announced, because of, as official advertisements put it, the "extreme rigour of the cold." Next, the house had to be closed for the Easter holidays; next, the performances were interrupted by the taking of the Bastille and attendant events; lastly, the theatre had to be given up because, after the abortive flight to Varennes, the royal family were brought to Paris and lodged in the Tuileries, under the same roof. This event happened, as every reader of history knows, in October, 1789, but the company did not give their last performance at the Théâtre de Monsieur till December 23. On closing the doors they were literally homeless, and advertised as follows: "To-day and to-morrow there will be no performance. The public will be informed by fresh bills when and where the performances will be continued." We may assume that no one concerned measured the significance of political circumstances at this moment. The abyss of the Revolution did not yet yawn in the nation's path, and men hoped and believed that king and people would find a way of settling their differences. Undismayed, therefore, by the stormy aspect of things, Viotti engaged a building at the Foire St. Germain, and opened it as the Théâtre de Monsieur on January 10, 1790, the opera chosen for the occasion being Paisiello's "Il Barbiere," a work destined in after years to be extinguished by the "Barbiere."

of Rossini. These quarters were, of course, but temporary, and in less than twelve months Viotti and Léonard had a new theatre ready, which they called the Théâtre Feydeau. The first performance at this house took place in January, 1791; and in the same year Cherubini produced his first French opera, "Lodoiska," breaking for ever with the Italian style he had theretofore cultivated, and entering upon a new path leading to highest honour and fortune. The fortunes of the new Théâtre Feydeau were soon darkened by shadows which the splendid success of "Lodoiska" could not disperse. Before the events of '92-3, all interests gave way. The Italian section of Viotti's company hurried out of France pell-mell, frightened by the terrible 10th of August. Léonard, compromised by some sort of connection with the flight to Varennes, also put the frontier between himself and the revolutionaries, and Viotti escaped to England. The French company were thus left without leaders, upon which, following the fashion of the day, they constituted a republic—in other words, a joint-stock company—and carried on the enterprise for a common profit.

Cherubini's work at the Théâtre Feydeau previous to the break-up just described will ever be memorable on account of the "new departure" he made in "Lodoiska." The master had, from the first days of Léonard and Viotti's enterprise, charmed French ears by his beautiful additions to the Italian operas performed. These gave him repute, and influenced in his favour the jury to which he had resolved to submit a typical French work, which, while melodious with Italian tune, should be dramatic in its musical characterisation. "Lodoiska" at once became a town's talk, the newspapers especially going into raptures over it. "M. Cherubini's music," said the Almanach Général de Tous les Spectacles, "is comparable to nothing less than the sublimest efforts of the greatest masters. . . . Never did French ears listen to more expressive and characteristic music." Les Spectacles de Paris exclaimed: "A grandiose subject: a frightful conflagration and enchanting music!" The Annales Dramatiques declared: "This music is entrancing—sublime; a broad style, admirable treatment of the masses, profound orchestration, astonishing dash, surprising originality, and grand touches—this is what it offers us, and which justifies the enthusiasm of the public, who during the performances rose at every piece and applauded the immortal author." On its part, the weighty and influential Journal de Paris said: "The style of the words is beneath mediocrity. Just the contrary must be stated of the music which is that of a great master. The public were informed whose it was, and it was only natural for them to expect a very great deal from the young composer. Despite of this they were none the less astonished at the brilliant effects with which he has profusely adorned his work. . . . We scarcely know an instance of more vigorous and more fertile talent. We are compelled sometimes to think it is too much so; if there is anything we could wish in the music, it is a trifle more melody, which would enable the audience to rest after the exceedingly numerous orchestral effects." Another critic, quoted by Mr. Bellasis, echoes this last remark, observing: "If we have a reproach to utter about the music of this work, it is this—it is too beautiful; and this is a real reproach. All the pieces, worked out with infinite care, and all equally worked out, do not give the listener time to breathe; by being forced to admire, you end by being fatigued with too-continued beauty; you would prefer from time to time simpler pieces on which to take repose." What, let us ask in passing, would these writers have said to a Wagner opera with its orchestra in full blast the whole time, and scores of leit-motiven calling for recognition and comprehension? However, the too great beauty of "Lodoiska" did not stand in its way, the work being performed two hundred times in one year. If it be asked wherein the peculiar qualities of Cherubini's opera are found, we cannot do better than quote a writer in the Neidersheinische Musik-Zeitung, who says: "While Cherubini carried out in the melody the fundamental law of dramatic truth, the agreement of the music with the situations in the drama, and their poetic expression as laid down by Gluck, he exhibited greater depth of intention, fuller and bolder harmony, and a style of instrumentation which, by its richness and the characteristic employment of the wind instruments especially in conformity with the peculiar quality of their sound, introduced the orchestra in a brilliant manner, not only as the foundation for the vocal portion, but also as its necessary adjunct and its equal in bringing about the theatrical effect as a whole." On the same subject M. Pougin remarks: "By the new forms he adopted in his score of 'Lodoiska,' by the vigour displayed in its general conception, by the power he succeeded in giving to his orchestra, and by the truly architectural structure of this virile production of his genius, Cherubini came forward as the determined champion of the evolution which comic opera, that style of composition so eminently French, was about to go through. Dramatic truth, the study of grand situations, and the portrayal of character, which Gluck had so successfully introduced amongst us in lyric drama properly so called, were all things Cherubini determined to transport to the stage of the Théâtre Feydeau, and endow with them our musical comedy, which, with a few exceptions, had hardly been distinguished for delicacy or wit, grace or tenderness, and which was pretty generally deficient in breadth and emotion." These extracts amply suffice to show wherein consisted the distinctive merit of "Lodoiska" and in what manner and degree Cherubini appeared as a reformer of opera.

Cherubini bent a little to the storm which drove his employers and many of his colleagues out of the country. In the delirium of the hour Paris was a dangerous place for people who had been in any way associated with the fallen régime. Our master, therefore, withdrew from the capital to a house at La Chartreuse de Gaillon, near Rouen, where lived his friend Louis, the architect. In the company of this gentleman and his wife, an accomplished musician, who had even written and produced, at the Favart, an opéra-comique, "Fleur d'Épine," Cherubini spent some months of '92, and nearly all the année terrible, '93. It was there he received news that his father had passed away and there that, not being absorbed by dramatic composition, he wrote a number of his smaller works. "Koukourgi," an unfinished three-act opera, belongs to this date, as does, on the evidence of Cherubini's own biographical notes, a two-act opera entitled "Elise, ou le Mont Saint-Bernard."

The master returned to Paris towards the end of 1793, and soon events happened which had the greatest possible influence upon his future life. In the first place he married a lady with whom he had been for some time in love. Her name was Anne Cécile Tourette, and her station that of daughter in the family of an obscure music-teacher once attached to the Chapel Royal. Cherubini's marriage was not, therefore, an ambitious one, but it turned out happy. M. Pougin says: "Cherubini and his wife, who loved each other tenderly, lived together for forty-eight years in the most perfect harmony, and when the great man died in 1842 not a cloud had ever obscured their constant accord—nothing had been able to alter their mutual affection." We may state here that of this fortunate and, indeed, blessed union there were three children—Salvador, who, after a good career as an artist, died in or about 1869; Victoire, who married a military commissary named Turcas; and Zénobie who married the well-known artist Rossellini. Madame Cherubini long survived her husband, dying in July, 1864.

More important, in an artistic sense, than the master's marriage was his enrolment (1794) among the musicians of the National Guard, his instrument, according to D'Ortigue, being the triangle. This may seem rather a degrading position for an eminent man, but the musicians of the National Guard were a peculiar and important body. Originally established in 1789, by a staff-captain named Sarette, as a military band of forty-five players, it had been taken over by the municipality in 1790, and increased to seventy instruments. Then a gratuitous school of instruction was attached to it, which developed (1793) into an Institut National de Musique, comprising 115 artists and 600 students. To this body Cherubini, in his capacity as triangle player, became attached, his more important duties being, of course, those of a teacher. In 1795 the National Guard band was dissolved by decree, the Institut going with it and a Conservatoire de Musique being established to fill the gap (October 15). Thus arose the famous French school, of which Sarette was the first director, with Grétry, Lesueur, Méhul, Gossec, and Cherubini as inspectors or chief professors. The triangle-player, we may assume, knew what he was about when accepting his humble instrument, though he hardly recognised a first step to the chief place in the most famous of all musical academies.

The events of 1794 include also the production at the Théâtre Feydeau of "Elise, ou le Mont Saint-Bernard." This work is generally accounted an exception to the rule that Cherubini's operas are marked by intellectual rather than emotional beauty. It abounds in true Italian melody, of a tender character, and, as the master when writing it was under the influence of his father's death, the fact cannot be deemed surprising. We have more right to be astonished at the opinion of the Parisians, who thought the music "too learned and too German." "Elise" was not the rival of "Lodoiska" in point of success, but Cherubini showed how much he felt inclined to study a light public taste by composing as his next opera "Médée." This, however, was not till near upon two years later, the intervening time being fully occupied with work connected with the new Conservatoire, in which Cherubini taught counterpoint, and in writing solfeggi for use at the same establishment.

In 1797, our master entered upon a novel kind of labour as composer to the Republic. Those were days of national celebrations. France entertained visions of conquest and supremacy. She saw, in anticipation, the world at her feet, and, dating her new life from the dawn of revolution, loved to observe anniversaries and keep alive the memory of great events by magnificent fêtes. Into these music of course entered, and Cherubini, who, as a professor at the Conservatoire, received State pay, was sometimes called upon to write patriotic hymns. His biographical notes mention some of these compositions, and from their titles they appear to be of a rather lurid character. There was, for example, an "Ode for the Anniversary of August 18"; and "Le Salpêtre Republicain," performed at a festival in celebration of the manufacture of saltpetre. All, however, were not of this class, something higher and better being found in the "Hymn to Fraternity," the "Festival of Youth" and the "Festival of Gratitude."

M. Pougin speaks in high terms of some among them, and calls the "Hymn to Gratitude" superb. We are quite ready to believe his testimony, and can only regret that so much talent should have been wasted upon mere occasional pieces, used one day and for ever laid aside the next. It is not pleasant to dwell upon this episode in Cherubini's life, one which, we cannot help thinking, was thoroughly distasteful to him. As the musical hack of a Republic still reeking from the shambles, he must have despised himself. Happily, nobler work awaited him.

In 1797, Hoffmann flourished as critic of the Journal des Débats, but did not confine his labours to journalism. Like most of his class, he wrote libretti, and having already collaborated with Méhul and Nicolo, was anxious to become the colleague of Cherubini. To this end, he prepared a book on the subject of Medea—a theme, as everybody knows, full of gloom and horror, and not at all adapted for the class of lyric drama known as opéra-comique. Nevertheless, Cherubini closed with the musical law-giver of the Journal des Débats, and was soon hard at work writing his immortal music. He seems to have laboured with great zeal and assiduity, otherwise the new opera could not have been produced at the Feydeau on March 13, 1797. We all know "Médée," and it will be interesting, therefore, to read some of the criticisms passed upon it in connection with the first performance. Some of these are given by M. Pougin, who collected them from dusty files of long-forgotten journals, and deserves thanks for so doing. The Journal des Indications said: "In the part of Medea it—the music—rends the soul; it paints. . . . The music is broad, expressive, majestic, and terrible." On its part the Journal de Paris remarked: "Overture, recitatives, duets and trios in the form of dialogues, concerted pieces, marches, choruses, and accompaniments are all rich in melody and perfectly adapted to the action on the stage." The Courier des Spectacles was not less laudatory, but the Censeur, true to its name, declared: "The music, by Cherubini, is often melodious and sometimes virile, but the public noticed in it reminiscences and imitation of Méhul's manner." Méhul himself rose up to answer this criticism and did so in terms of noble generosity. Here is his note to the editor: "O Censeur, you do not know this great artist. But I do know him, and admire him because I know him well, and I say and will prove to all Europe that the inimitable author of 'Démophon,' 'Lodoiska,' 'Elise,' and 'Médée,' never required to imitate in order to be successively elegant or tender, graceful or tragic—to be, in a word, that Cherubini whom some few may accuse of imitating others, but whom they themselves will not fail to imitate unfortunately at the first opportunity. This justly celebrated artist may find a Censeur to attack him, but he will have as defenders all who admire him—that is, all who are capable of understanding and appreciating the highest talent." Upon this, exit Le Censeur with, it is to be hoped, much shame of face. Upon this also Cherubini dedicated the score to Méhul, in terms as follows:—

"Cherubini to Méhul: Receive, my friend, from the hands of friendship the homage she delights in paying to a distinguished artist. Your name placed at the head of this work will lend it a merit it did not possess—namely, that of appearing worthy to be dedicated to you—and this will serve it as a support. May the union of our two names everywhere attest the tender sentiments which bind us to each other, and the respect I entertain for real talent."

Our master had worked so hard at "Médée" that when the opera was safely launched and M^{me}. Scio was drawing all the town to see her as the vengeful wife, his health gave way. Rest became necessary and change of scene desirable; he, therefore, once more took the diligence to La Chartreuse de Gailion, and lived for a while with his friends, M. and Mme. Louis. A letter written thence to his wife has been published, and is interesting, as showing how tender the so-called "grim Florentine" could be; also, how his pen would slip in writing French.

"I have at length received a letter from you, my darling, and hope to receive another to-morrow. I thank you for the pleasure you have procured me, for it is a pleasure to hear about you and my little cocotte (ma petit cocotte). Pretty dear! so she often asks for me, does she? Kiss her well for me, as I cannot have the satisfaction of kissing her myself. It is horrible weather here; nothing but wind and rain. . . . I have not as good an appetite as the first day I came. However, I shall go out to-day after dinner (cette après diner), for the weather is not so bad as it was. Not having 'Madame Angot'* to amuse me, I pass my life in eating and sleeping, for we go to bed at half-past ten. We have a little music and play the remainder of the time; occasionally we have billiards and harmless games in the evening. I am delighted that you also are amused. You are very lucky to be able to go to the first performance of Méhul's piece ('Le Chasse de Jeune Henri'). I shall look forward anxiously for the news of his success. If he achieves such a success as I hope he will and as he deserves, he will have a great one. The only thing that annoys me is not being able to be present at his good fortune, so that I may share it with him, and be the first to tell him what gratification it affords me. . . . Adieu! Give my dear Victorine, who writes like a little angel, a thousand kisses for me. All the ladies here desire their kind regards; they wish you had been with me, but that will be some other time. Good-bye, my darling! With very best love, I remain, your affectionate husband and friend."

There is another letter extant, written to his wife a few days later, but containing little more than small details, of no interest now. Some sentences in it, however, afford a glimpse of the indifference which later on became a feature of hardness in the master's character. They will explain themselves as we quote them: "As for your brother's marriage, I am not at all offended at his contracting it without me. On the contrary, I am glad he spared me the trouble of it. All the worse for him if he is wanting in respect towards his parents. But who were the witnesses at the ceremony? You must tell me all this on my return. Papa sent me a letter, in which he tries to excuse himself for not being able to prevent the solemnisation of his son's marriage without me. I am about to reply to set his mind at ease, and show that my tranquillity is not disturbed by the matter."

Cherubini returned to Paris in May 1797, and resumed his duties at the Conservatoire, but did little else till the death of that pure-souled patriot, General Hoche, plunged France into mourning. Then, associated with Chenier, he prepared a great lyric scene to be performed at the Opéra and at the Feydeau in celebration of the departed hero. Thereby hangs a tale which must be told in another chapter.

ON THE TRAINING OF CHILDREN'S VOICES.

An article thus headed, which appears in the last number of the Century Magazine (an excellent illustrated journal, published simultaneously in New York and London), so thoroughly expresses our own opinions upon the defective manner in which school-children are taught—or, rather, permitted—to sing that we have much pleasure in calling attention to it; for although it gives the result of careful investigation of the subject amongst the schools of Chicago, there can be no doubt that many of the remarks apply with equal force to the class-teaching of children in this country. The paper is by Mr. William L. Tomlins, a well-known worker in the cause in America, and is preceded by a few observations from Mr. Theodore Thomas, who seems to have been the first to ventilate the matter in the United States. After saying that the most Utopian anticipations were indulged in with regard to the degree and value of the musical culture of children when the study of singing was first introduced into the public schools at Boston, Mr. Tomlins proceeds to debate the question whether in truth the method commonly adopted in these seminaries is not positively harmful to the voice and destructive to future ability to sing artistically. "Briefly mentioned," he says, "the faults of current instruction are these: Everything is sacrificed to a knowledge of musical notation. The voice is developed only in respect to power, and this, unfortunately, in a way which must be entirely undone whenever the study of artistic singing is begun. Instead of soft, pleasant, expressive voices, one hears in school almost universally a hard, shouty tone, unsympathetic and inexpressive." As a rule the introduction of class-singing into our schools has done much for the spread of a knowledge of music where perhaps utter ignorance upon the subject existed before. But if singing is to be taught at all, it should be taught well, either in or out of a class; and if we admit the truth of Mr. Tomlins's complaints upon the methods usually adopted, it will be good to listen to what he has to say upon the causes of, and the remedies for, the evil. "All of these shortcomings," he tells us, "finally reduce themselves to two—namely, ignorance of, or indifference to, the physiological relation between singing and the vocal organs; and, second, apathy with regard to all kinds of musical relations beyond the simplest and most obvious. This state of things, which prevails for the most part throughout the country, is to be accounted for, or at least has been influenced by, two or three circumstances. The music-teachers are chosen mainly for their knowledge of notation and the sight-reading of music. They are generally earnest, practical teachers, with perhaps a turn for music, but with no systematised training in the physiology of the vocal organs, and without practical acquaintance with the technic of vocal culture." He afterwards mentions the Sunday school singing-books and the Moody and Sankey hymns as being written down for the class-singing market; but works of this kind are perhaps more supplied to school-children in America than in England. Some very good observations are made, too, upon the habit of coupling physical exertion with singing; and the author very truly says "the panting of the breath directs the blood to the throat and lungs, and involves an action of the extrinsic muscles of the throat which directly antagonises the proper act of singing." There can be little doubt that, as Mr. Tomlins observes, the only way of altering the received method of teaching children singing at large schools is by the dissemination of proper knowledge of vocal culture amongst the teachers themselves; for if the attention of young people is solely directed to notation and sight-singing, he who can shout the correct interval the loudest is certain to be considered the best singer. With regard to the system adopted by Mr. Tomlins, who has between two and three hundred children under his instruction at Chicago, we quote the opinion of Mr. Theodore Thomas, who was present during an exhibition of his class. "The singing of the children," he says, "as I heard it on that occasion, demonstrated the soundness of Mr. Tomlins's theories and his rare abilities as a teacher. They showed ease, spontaneity, warmth, expression, accuracy of pitch, precision—in fact, came so near to perfection that I assured them I had never before heard such beautiful singing." Such unqualified praise as this upon the result of Mr. Tomlins's teaching seems conclusive as to the success of his theories, and leads us to believe that the matter is worthy of serious consideration in this country.

LITERARY piracy has been latterly so thoroughly exposed that it becomes now a hazardous undertaking to reproduce the work of one author signed with the name of another. It is true that from many half-forgotten volumes whole pages may sometimes be appropriated without discovery; but there is still the danger of some inconvenient critic being sufficiently well read to be reminded of a resemblance to the original; and as the British Museum is always available, the robbery can at once be unmistakably brought home to the delinquent. In music, wholesale plagiarism of this kind has been less frequent, for methods can better be resorted to which to some extent cover the theft. Slight alterations may be made in certain notes; passages may be inserted which direct the attention away from the flow of the subject, or a different character may be given to a vocal composition by its adaptation to words varying in sentiment from those to which the music was originally set. We have on several occasions drawn attention to instances of this nature; but one is now before us which stands almost alone in its enormity, for the piece is in the same key as that from which it is copied, the harmonies are in most cases identical, and all that the "composer" has done is to follow the precedent to which we have alluded, of adding a few phrases and changing the feeling of the words: It is inserted as a part-song in a pamphlet called "The Underground Railway: A Service of Song; containing thrilling incidents, heroic actions, and wonderful escapes of fugitive slaves; related by Levi Coffin"; and although the music is said to be "by G. Day-Winter," it happens to have been previously composed by Mendelssohn. In its original form it is known as "The First Day of Spring," but Mr. Winter's paraphrase appears as "How bright will be the day." In case of an extension of this "Underground Railway," Mr. Day-Winter may perhaps compose some other part-songs of the standard writers; and it is well, therefore, that the public should be placed on its guard.

ALTHOUGH the "royalty system" is one now tolerably well known even to those who are made the victims of its operation at public concerts, it is the general belief that songs are thus forced into notice by private contract between the publisher and a celebrated vocalist, who, "for a consideration," sings them whenever and wherever an opportunity offers. The receipt of a so-termed "new and beautiful song" by a professional lady a short time since, however, deceives us on this point; for, as it comes from the publisher, accompanied by a printed circular promising a graduated scale of payment in case the recipient should be able to sing it in public, we find that these rewards are open to all who think it worth while to earn them. "The copy sent," says the circular, "will, no doubt, suit the compass of your voice; and in the event of your feeling disposed to give it wide publicity by singing it at your concert engagements, on your sending us a programme with it inserted thereon as 'New Song' (and our name and address as publishers, if possible), we shall have much pleasure in forwarding you each time (within a period of three months from date) our usual fee, varying according to the class of concert and popularity of vocalist." Other inducements are also held out, such as the announcement that "the composer would be most happy to accompany the song at London engagements," but we have extracted enough to show what a chance is open to vocalists. We have expressed no opinion upon the composition itself—nor indeed is any opinion asked for—but may mention as a singular fact, that, although the name of the composer of the music is printed on the title-page, the song is said to be adapted from the melody of a Polka by somebody else.

THAT operatic singers should like to sing operatic music is not to be wondered at; but it must be remembered that, apart from the vocal display usually expected from a prima donna, even at a miscellaneous concert, something is due to the necessity of the occasion, which assuredly demands that the works selected shall at least be intelligible to the audience. "Programme-music" without a programme cannot be more utterly unmeaning than impassioned pieces the words of which are completely detached from the events that called them forth; and if scraps from operas, therefore, must be given, they should be such only as can be sufficiently separated from the context to be in themselves presentable as abstract compositions. When we consider the rich mine of wealth in vocal music especially written for the concert-room by our best composers, it is certainly disappointing to hear the talents of some of our finest singers wasted upon compositions which are totally ineffective without the aid of dramatic action. What is termed an "operatic concert" is exceedingly like an exhibition where small pieces cut from great pictures are hung round the room. Each of these may represent the power and skill of the painter; but the design and treatment of the work from which such portions are taken can only be understood when the entire picture is shown. It is true that the fashionable frequenters of concerts may for a time support entertainments thus organised for, and ruled by, their favourite vocalists; but they are a remnant of past days, and the sooner they are made to accord with modern notions of musical art, the greater will be the chance of prolonging their life.

In America, we see by the local papers, the establishment of bands in the open air is being pushed forward more vigorously than in our own country. A paragraph in a journal of the 19th of May, headed "Washington Square Music," says "Cappa's 7th Regiment Band gave their first concert in Washington Square, Friday afternoon. The concerts have been organised for the special benefit of the poor living near the square, and will be continued every Friday afternoon during the summer season. The expenses are defrayed by the wealthy residents of the neighbourhood. The concert was announced to commence at five o'clock, but long before that time the square was one mass of humanity. The children were allowed the privilege of playing on the grass, and seemed fairly intoxicated by the strains of the 'Mascotte.'" As this movement is now patronised by royalty in England, there is every hope that it may spread as rapidly as it appears to have done in America; but much remains yet to be done, for there are still parks to which music has not gained admission. May it not, however, be worth considering whether concerts intended for the people should also include vocal part-music? The gems especially written for such occasions are not only so numerous, but published in such a cheap form, that it seems marvellous how they can be allowed still to remain almost unknown to the general public. Surely the rendering of these beautiful pieces would attract as much as, or indeed even more than, a band; and if vocal and instrumental concerts could be alternated on fixed evenings in our favourite promenades, we are convinced that they would prove not only an inestimable boon to the working classes, but a most powerful aid to the healthy dissemination of the art.

We are not of those who desire that the compositions of native musical artists in this country should be performed to the exclusion of works of high continental reputation, but they should at least have an equally fair chance of being heard; and as Court patronage is all important, it has ever been a matter of regret that Court Concerts should so rarely contain a piece, either vocal or instrumental, by an Englishman. We have much pleasure, therefore, in drawing attention to the programme of the State Concert of the 27th ult., in which is included the beautiful love-duet from the fourth act of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Opera "Colomba." It is gratifying to find that the Royal favour recently conferred upon British musicians is now being extended to their works; and we sincerely trust that the many gems of English art still unknown in an English palace may gradually gain admission, and receive that due recognition of their claims which has so long been accorded to them by the general public.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

THE eighth celebration of this the greatest of triennial festivals took place in the Crystal Palace transept on the 18th, 20th, and 22nd ult., having been preceded, as usual, by a public rehearsal on the 15th.

Some anxiety was felt by those who looked forward to the occasion, circumstances having greatly changed since the Festival of 1880. One of the parents of the enterprise died at the moment that the Sacred Harmonic Society ceased to exist, and the other—the Crystal Palace—had to take upon itself the entire management. Besides this, the health of Sir Michael Costa was known to be in a precarious state, warranting grave doubts as to his ability to discharge the functions of conductor. Here were two very serious drawbacks, adapted to discourage public interest and throw a weighty influence into the scale against success. It turned out, however, that fears were superfluous: so true is it that no man, or body of men, is necessary in this world. Public opinion often concludes that So-and-so resembles the key-stone of an arch, and cannot be removed without ruin. But when death, or some equally powerful destroyer, comes along and knocks the key-stone away, there is no catastrophe—nothing more serious than the disturbance which results from throwing a pebble into a stream. We see a plash, followed by a few tiny wavelets, and presently the current runs on as smoothly as before. In this case the late managers of the Sacred Harmonic Society—Mr. Husk, Mr. Durlacher, and others—gave their services as individuals to the Crystal Palace Company, and Mr. Manns filled with remarkable distinction the place vacated by Sir Michael Costa. Instead of ruin we simply noted reconstruction.

No difficulty seems to have been encountered in getting together the enormous band and chorus required for the Handel orchestra. Amateurs, vocal and instrumental, were as ready to assist as in former years, and the numbers were speedily made up, the only difference being that London supplied, if we are not mistaken, a larger contingent than usual. There are, no doubt, financial reasons why the metropolis should be drawn upon thus fully, but, after all, these may not represent the soundest policy. The Handel Festival should be national, and the presence of country amateurs is the best possible agency for securing and retaining this character. We trust, therefore, that no further diminution in the strength of provincial contingents will challenge remonstrance. The band consisted of 441 instruments, namely—first violins, 95; second ditto, 92; violas, 56; violoncellos, 64; double basses, 50—in all, 357 strings. The wind and percussion mustered 84 strong, that is to say—piccolos, 6; flutes, 8; oboes, 8; clarinets, 8; bassoons, 8; double bassoons, 2; trumpets, 6; cornets, 6; horns, 12; trombones, 9; ophicleides, 3; drums, 3 pairs; side drums, 4; bass drum, 1. Of the players, 350 were resident in London, the remaining 91 coming from seventy-two different places. It follows that most of these places had but a single representative. Among those sending two or more were Exeter, Dorking, Maidstone, Dublin, Croydon, Ramsgate, Sevenoaks, Birmingham, Sunderland, Penzance, and Northampton. Wales and Scotland were not in the orchestra at all; while Ireland sent only the two players from Dublin. To England, therefore, belongs all the glory, and we are unfeignedly sorry for it. The three kingdoms, and not one only, should be on the Handel orchestra when honour is paid to the great Saxon master. Turning to the chorus it is found that London supplied 2,284 voices, the balance being gathered from 68 other places. Among the towns most strongly represented, were Birmingham (100), Bradford (39), Leeds (29), Liverpool (15), Manchester (14), Norwich (13), Huddersfield (13), Glasgow (12), Bristol (11), Worcester (10), York (10), Wolverhampton (11). These were all that ran into double figures, while seventeen places, among them Salford, Sunderland, Hull, and Rotherham, sent only one voice each. Taking the different parts of the United Kingdom, we find Wales represented by a solitary chorister from Ruabon; Scotland by twenty voices from Edinburgh and Glasgow; and Ireland by seven from Kingston and Dublin. This, we confess, is not quite satisfactory, and it is to be hoped that the Handel Orchestra of 1886 will more generally embody the amateur talent of the three kingdoms. The principal artists engaged were Mme. Albani, Mme. Valleria, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Marriott, Mrs. Suter, Mme. Patey, Mme. Trebelli, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. Maas, Signor Foli, Mr. Bridson, Mr. F. King, and Mr. Santley. Of these, Miss Williams did not appear, for reasons connected with the allotment of music, her place being taken by Mme. Valleria.

The public rehearsal does not call for criticism, especially as Mr. Manns rightly treated the occasion as one for preparation rather than display. About 19,000 persons entered the Palace, either as performers or auditors, and, as usual, the work done was chiefly limited to the selection, nearly all the airs and choruses of which were tried. Many persons felt the result as anything but assuring, the performers not seeming at home with Mr. Manns's beat, and Mr. Manns himself not giving the time with sufficient breadth of gesture and decision of character. The experience gained from the Rehearsal was, however, most valuable, as we shall see.

The "Messiah" day—Monday—proved all that could be desired in point of weather, and 22,383 persons were present, being nearly a thousand more than in 1880. This immense gathering was admirably managed by the experienced officials, who saw no occasion to make material changes in the arrangements that had aforetime worked so well. Sir Michael Costa's version of the National Anthem opened the proceedings as usual—the Royal box was occupied by some members of the Queen's family—and then the great army on the orchestra addressed themselves to what was, all things considered, a fine performance of Handel's masterpiece. The band and chorus quickly proved that their quality had not fallen off. If anything, the tenors were less good than on some former occasions, their intonation being occasionally at fault. But the other parts were splendid, and the ensemble in the greater choruses such as "For unto us," "Lift up your heads," "Hallelujah," and "Worthy is the Lamb," was as magnificent and as moving as of old. There is no need to go into details about this matter. The effect has come under the observation of most people, and can be imagined in all its gradations and changes. We must say, nevertheless, that Mr. Manns and his followers were on much better terms than at the rehearsal. The conductor gave the requisite beat, and the executants understood it. This was enough for success, perhaps the only drawback being a tendency to hurry the time under the influence of a very natural excitement. Madame Albani sang all the soprano solos, those for contralto being divided between Mesdames Trebelli and Patey. All the tenor airs fell to Mr. Maas, and Signor Foli shared with Mr. Santley those for bass. We can say nothing new with regard to the performance by these well-known artists of a familiar task. Let us be satisfied to state that Madame Albani, whose "Rejoice greatly" was a failure, retrieved her laurels in "Come unto Him," and that Mr. Maas gave uniform pleasure by the well-sustained excellence of his singing. Mr. Santley vocalised "Why do the nations" in his very best style, calling forth much enthusiasm.

The Selection day (Wednesday) proved, like Monday, fortunate as to weather, and 22,290 persons went through the turnstiles, this being a falling off of exactly 205 from the figures of 1880. So small a difference hardly excites speculation, and the Wednesday audience must always be considered a fluctuating one consequent upon the nature of the programme. This time nothing new was presented, for the brief and unimportant air "Tears such as tender fathers shed" ("Deborah") is hardly entitled to count, though sung by Mr. Santley. Amateurs regretted so complete an absence of novelty, but were scarcely surprised; Sir Michael Costa, who anticipated conducting the Festival almost till the last moment, being in no condition to prepare unfamiliar music. Under these circumstances it would be hard to complain, but on another occasion censure will undoubtedly follow supineness. There are scores of Handelian pieces that have never been heard at the great Festival. These must be brought out of their obscurity into the light, though the doing so cost money and labour. The Handel Festival does not exist simply for the purpose of pecuniary gain. Fifteen works were drawn upon for the selections performed, and many of the pieces chosen proved to be those most frequently heard. For examples take the "Occasional" Overture, "Envy, eldest born of hell," "Gird on thy sword," "Righteous Heaven," "When His loud voice," "From harmony," "May no rash intruder," "O, the pleasure of the plains," "Wretched lovers," and "See, the conquering hero." These have so often been heard at Sydenham that it is as difficult to say anything new about their performance as about themselves. There is, however, a strong temptation to tell the old story—to enlarge upon Handel's greatness as shown in these master-works, and to dwell upon the almost terrible impression made when they are presented under such conditions. If we resist, it is because no satisfactory answer comes to the question, Cui bono? The gigantic power of the Saxon composer is an English article of faith undoubted by any save the oddities who rise up to dispute that which is clear to everybody else, while the effect produced by the Festival Orchestra—"strong without rage, without o'erflowing full"—could not be put into words by ever so great a master of language. That effect appeared at its best. The shortcomings of the Rehearsal had vanished, and although criticism was possible on certain points, they were no other than such as wait upon immense numbers, and cannot be conjured away. We give all credit to Mr. Manns and his great choir for their performance of the Selection music. It was unique, and so to the credit of England that it must have made every Englishman proud. The orchestra won its share of special honour in the "Occasional" Overture, the March in "Joshua" and the March in "St. Cecilia's Day," which had to be repeated; while the principal vocalists ran both band and chorus hard for the premier place. Mme. Albani sang "Angels, ever bright and fair" and "Let the bright seraphim" (trumpet, Mr. McGrath) with a distinct advantage on the side of the more florid air; Mme. Valleria made a most successful début at these Festivals in "From mighty Kings," enrolling herself thus among our best singers of Oratorio; Mme. Patey contributed "What though I trace" and "Lascia ch'io pianga," and Mme. Trebelli gave "Verdi prati," each in her best style; Mr. Lloyd sang "Love in her eyes" splendidly. Mr. McGuckin revealed unsuspected power in "Deeper and deeper still," and Mr. Santley achieved a familiar success with "O ruddier than the cherry." All this good fortune will be taken without calling for particulars, since if an artist would not try to excel himself at a Handel Festival, where would he do so? There remains to add that Mr. Best played Handel's First Organ Concerto, in G minor, much as on former occasions—that is to say, with abundant facility and unvarying correctness. The eminent organist would, no doubt, have preferred some less hackneyed work, and we trust that next time his taste will be indulged.

"Israel in Egypt," performed on the 22nd (Friday), drew the largest audience of the week, if the estimate of the officials may be trusted, the number present being computed at 23,000. This was of course expected. Who can resist the gigantic choruses of "Israel," as given under the only conditions able to bring out all their effect and realise the ideal which the master must have had in his mind? So much has been written during the last twenty-five years regarding the Handel Festival "Israel" that we despair of achieving anything better than "vain repetitions" by enlarging upon it here. Enough that the best work of previous occasions was rivalled by the band and chorists, who were on the whole wonderfully steady. Indeed, we do not remember hearing "He led them through the deep" under more favourable conditions, and even that almost impracticable number "The people shall hear" was more nearly achieved than ever before. This was a great result for the executants, and a great delight to the audience, who sat all through the oratorio under the full impression that the highest creative and executive art can make. The "Hailstone" chorus was encoored as usual, and almost every number might have been so honoured without undue compliment.

In "Israel" the airs and duets are not of much consequence, but they had all the advantage that such artists as Madame Valleria, Miss Marriott, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Bridson, and Mr. King could give. Mr. Lloyd's singing of "The enemy said" evoked much enthusiasm, and was redemanded.

We repeat that the Festival of 1883 was a success, and the fact is important as showing continued vitality, and encouraging a reasonable hope of long life for the enterprise. After having passed safely through the crisis involved in the death of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and the retirement of Sir M. Costa, the great Handelian solemnity has nothing else to fear.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

PONCHIELLI'S Opera "La Gioconda," produced at this establishment on May 31, resulted in a success which we are glad to say rested not upon the brilliant singing of a popular vocalist but upon its own intrinsic merits. We cannot certainly accord it a high place amongst those lyrical works which have made the names of Italy's recognised composers; but the music is so bright and varied, so tuneful and even popular in character, that during the whole four acts into which the work is divided there was not a symptom of that restlessness amongst the audience which has too often attended the "novelties" of past seasons at the Royal Italian Opera. That "Gioconda" bears not the stamp of individuality sufficiently to justify us in regarding Ponchielli as the "coming man" cannot be doubted; but he knows how to write music essentially fitted for the situation to which it is united; and that he has studied instrumentation to good purpose is unmistakably shown in the effective and varied colouring of very many of the concerted pieces which, if weakly or coarsely scored, would have produced but little impression upon the audience. That opportunity is given for the employment of much dramatic power in the composer may be judged by the following sketch of the plot, which is founded upon Victor Hugo's "Angelo," the libretto being written by Signor Arrigo Boito (who, for some unexplained cause, prefers the nom de plume Tobia Gorrio), the English version being carefully prepared by Mr. Henry Hersee. The scene is laid in Venice in the seventeenth century. On the rising of the curtain the courtyard of the Ducal Palace, decorated for festivities, is filled with holiday people awaiting the regatta. On the departure of the throng Gioconda, a street ballad-singer, brings her blind mother, La Cieca, to her usual seat near the church, leaving her there. Barnaba, a spy of the Inquisition, who has been repulsed by Gioconda, hopes by getting the blind mother into his power that he may win the daughter, and therefore persuades Zuane, the unsuccessful boatman, that his defeat has been caused by La Cieca, accusing her of being a sorceress. The people threaten to kill her, but she is protected by Enzo, a Genoese noble. Alvise, one of the heads of the State Inquisition, and Laura, his wife, enter, and the blind woman is freed at the intercession of Laura, on whom La Cieca bestows her rosary. Barnaba, who perceives that Enzo and Laura are known to each other, informs Enzo that Laura intends visiting him on board his ship during her husband's absence at the Council, but afterwards warns Alvise by letter of his wife's intended flight. In the second act, Enzo is awaiting Laura, who arrives, but after a duet, Gioconda appears, owns her love for Enzo, and points with triumph to an approaching boat containing Laura's husband. At the sight of her mother's rosary, however, her angry feelings are changed to pity, and she assists her rival to escape. The third act takes place in the palace of Alvise, who commands his wife to drink some poison, which he places on the table. He leaves the room, when Gioconda enters, bringing a narcotic, which she bids her take instead; Laura does so, and throws herself on a funeral bier prepared behind a curtain. Alvise returns and receives guests bidden to a fête. Enzo arrives, unmasks himself, and denounces Alvise, and is immediately seized by the guards. Gioconda promises Barnaba to become his if he will save Enzo; this he pledges himself to do, and the act ends by Alvise drawing the curtain, and showing Laura lying on her bier. The last act is in a ruined palace on the island of Giudecca, where Gioconda lives. The still sleeping Laura is brought in, and Gioconda, who was meditating suicide, is tempted to destroy her rival, but while she is hesitating Enzo comes to express his gratitude to her for preserving his freedom, but resolving to end his life. Laura, waking from her trance, escapes with her lover, after thanking their kind deliverer. Gioconda, remembering her vow to Barnaba, resolves to fly, but is prevented by Barnaba, who comes to claim her. Summoning all her courage, she tells him gaily that she means to keep her word, and while pretending to adorn herself with trinkets, seizes a dagger and stabs herself to the heart. In the treatment of this story the composer has set himself a task which, although beyond his strength in parts, he has evidently worked at with a resolution which at least is commendable. Upon the Italian style—which seems natural to him—he has engrafted much of the modern Wagnerian feeling, which shows itself in the treatment of the orchestra, and also in the adoption of two leit motives, one associated with Barnaba, and the other with the rosary given to Laura by La Cieca, both being heard in the orchestral Prelude, which in modern operas takes the place of an overture. In the first act the melodious and exciting chorus of revellers, and the blind mother's song, "Voce di donna," gave ample proof that the music was of no ordinary type, but the duet between Enzo and Barnaba, a trio for La Cieca, Gioconda, and Barnaba, and several choral pieces must also be mentioned as excellently constructed numbers. The second act contains a sailors' chorus (encored), the effect of which was much heightened by the addition of boys' voices, a barcarole thoroughly popular in character (and also redemanded) for Barnaba, a cavatina for Enzo, and two duets—one between the lovers, and the other (which won an encore) between the rival ladies—both, however, containing some reminiscences of Verdi, which can scarcely escape notice. From this point the music falls off in interest, although we have some clever writing in the ballet scene of the third act, the climax of which is highly dramatic; and in the fourth act Gioconda's solo and the whole of her scene with Barnaba have much merit. The debut of Madame Durand in the part of Gioconda was a decided success, for although she does not come to us with an unworn voice, the quality is extremely good, and she sings and acts with an unexaggerated intensity of expression which thoroughly enlisted the sympathies of the audience. Madame Tremelli materially enhanced her reputation in the character of La Cieca, the expressive aria alluded to, in which she presents the rosary to Laura, being so well given as to elicit an enthusiastic encore, a compliment which she acknowledged by curtsying and attitudinising to the audience in a style scarcely befitting the poor blind mother of the ballad-singer. Madame Stahl sang the somewhat thankless music assigned to Laura with good dramatic feeling; Signor Marconi, despite the harshness of his voice, was a fairly satisfactory Enzo, Signor Cotogni was appropriately energetic and forcible as the spy Barnaba, and Signor De Reszke created as much effect as could fairly be expected in the part of Alvise. The choral music was better sung than we have ever heard it at this establishment, and the ballet entitled the "Dance of the Hours" was charmingly graceful, and won the warmest applause. Signor Bevigiani conducted with much skill, and, with the principal vocalists, was summoned on the stage to share in the honours of the evening. The Opera has been several times repeated, and quite as warmly received as on the first night.

Madame Durand has also appeared as Valentina in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," and in the rôle of Verdi's Opera "Aida," achieving a success in both parts fully equal to that already recorded in "La Gioconda." As Urbano, in "Les Huguenots," Madame Scalchi made her entrée, and Marguerite de Valois had a most able representative in Madame Repetto, but the work was, as usual, much mutilated. The appearance of Mr. Maas in the arduous part of Lohengrin in Wagner's Opera proves beyond doubt that English vocalists can obtain a firm footing upon the Italian operatic stage, and in company with even the favourite prime donne. His singing throughout was marked by intelligence and precision, in many parts—especially in the Address to the Swan—evidencing the result of deep sympathy with the music, and in the impassioned portions displaying a declamatory power which elicited warm and well-deserved applause. As Elsa, Madame Albani was charming as a vocalist; but her acting seemed somewhat overstrained in parts, as if she were anxious to add to, rather than to sustain, her former reputation in the character. Madame Adeline Patti's reception as Rosina, in "Il Barbiere," it is almost needless to say, was as enthusiastic as ever, baskets and bouquets of flowers having, as usual, an important share in the demonstration. These absurd offerings at the shrine of a petted vocalist take us back at a time when we had hoped we were steadily going forward.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE final Saturday Concert at the Crystal Palace, given on the 2nd ult., introduced one novelty in the shape of the music to the Ballet "Coppelia," by M. Déléibes, the French composer. It consists of five pieces, respectively called "Slavonian Melody, with variations"; "Festival Dance and Valse of the Hours"; "Nocturne" (the prettiest and most refined amongst the number); "Music of the Automaton and Valse"; and "Czardas." The general opinion, shared by both dancers and musicians, is that the two arts, as a rule, do not "hit it"—that good music is very rarely good dance-music. Few people would care to perform the ordinary gyrations of the ballroom to one of Chopin's valse or mazurkas. This opinion M. Déléibes has done much to shake. His music is always rhythmical, and therefore well suited for an accompaniment of dance and pantomimic action; at the same time the treatment of his themes and the orchestration are never without interest to the musician. To this rule the "Coppelia" Suite is no exception; at the same time it loses much of its effect by its transference from the theatre to the concert-room. M. Pachmann played at the same Concert Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G (No. 4) and the same master's Thirty-two Variations in C minor with exquisite refinement of style. Mrs. Hutchinson and Miss Hope Glenn sang the lovely duet "Vous sôupirez, madame" from Berlioz' musical version of "Much Ado About Nothing," to which they added severally an air from Auber's "Le Serment" and "Le Spectre de la Rose" from Berlioz' "Les Nuits d'Été." The supplementary Concert, given as usual for the benefit of Mr. Manns, had a varied and interesting programme, designed evidently with a view to attracting a large audience, and one is almost ashamed to own that this view was frustrated, the hall being but sparsely filled. Opening with Schubert's unfinished Symphony, the programme included Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillant, Op. 22 (the pianoforte part gracefully rendered by Mdle. Kleeberg, a French artist of great promise), Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and the same master's "Tannhäuser." Overture by way of wind-up. English music was represented by extracts from the two operas recently produced by Mr. Rosa's company at Drury Lane. From "Esmeralda" we had the melodious air "Oh, vision entrancing," belonging to Phabus, and given on this occasion by Mr. Barton McGuckin, the original representative of that gallant but fickle soldier. The same artist joined Mdme. Valleria in an admirable rendering of the love-duet from the fourth act of "Colomba." Mdme. Valleria also gave the "Vocero" from the same work, Miss Annie Marriott adding the Corsican Ballad "So he thought of his love." The Prelude and the ballet music completed the selection from Mr. Mackenzie's opera.

The following is a list of the principal works produced for the first time at the Crystal Palace during the past season: Berlioz, Grand Messe des Morts; Brahms, Pianoforte Concerto in B flat, No. 2 (O. Beringer); Corder, Nocturne in B flat; Cowen, Suite for strings, "In the olden time"; Délibes, Suite, "Coppelia"; Dvorák, Concert Overture, "Mein Heim"; Gounod, "The Redemption"; Mackenzie, Intermezzo, "Jason"; Selection, "Colomba"; Mozart, Symphony Concertante with Solo, violin and viola (Joachim and Krause); Selection, "King Thamos"; Parry, Symphony in G; Prout, Cantata, "Alfred"; Raff, Symphony in D minor, No. 6; Schubert, MS. Symphony in E, No. 7, completed by J. F. Barnett; Smetana, Symphonic Poem, "Vyschrad"; Wagner, Introduction and Charfreitagszauber from "Parsifal"; Wingham, Concert Overture, Symphony in D, No. 4.

THE RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE stability of this enterprise seems now assured, the attendances this season having been uniformly good, while the enthusiasm of those present is quite pleasant to witness. As usual the music of Beethoven and Wagner is found most attractive, and rightly so, as the ability of the Viennese conductor is most fully displayed in the works of these masters. The first three Concerts were noticed in the May number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, and our present record must therefore commence with the fourth programme, on May 28. No novelty was presented on this occasion, and the first appearance of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel since their lengthened absence in America was the most noticeable feature of the entertainment. The lady, who was formerly known in our concert-rooms as Miss Lilian Bailey, sang a florid but not very interesting air from Graun's roccoco Oratorio "Der Tod Jesu." Mr. Henschel chose Pagner's Address from the first act of "Die Meistersinger," and Wotan's Abschied from "Die Walküre," these Wagnerian excerpts suiting his style to a nicety. In the latter of them the orchestra is of greater importance than the voice, and it would be impossible to imagine a finer rendering of Wagner's striking and original effects. This closing scene of the second section of "The Nibelung's Ring" displays the tone poet's genius in its most favourable aspect, and even in the concert-room the conception is wonderfully impressive. The purely instrumental items were Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture No. 3 and the Symphony in F, No. 8, concerning the interpretation of which difference of opinion may be allowable. Herr Richter may have authority for the slow tempo he adopted in the first movement of the Symphony, but to unaccustomed ears the effect was unsatisfactory. The next Concert, on the 4th ult., had a longer and more varied programme, the tastes of musicians of the older school being gratified by the performance of Haydn's Mass in D minor, known to us as the "Imperial," though termed the "Nelson" in Germany—the latter title possessing the largest amount of justification. According to Herr Pohl, the greatest authority on matters connected with Haydn, the Mass was composed in 1798, and therefore could have borne no reference to the Emperor Joseph II., who died in 1790. On the other hand, it is stated that Haydn, on hearing the news of the victory at Aboukir, introduced a trumpet-call of victory in the Benedictus; and, further, that the Mass was performed in Nelson's presence during the stay of the great commander in the Austrian dominions in 1800. The question of a title is not one of great importance in the instance of a Mass, but if one be given it should possess some appropriateness, and it appears evident that the term "Imperial" applied to Haydn's work has no authority whatever, though we fancy it is likely to cling to it notwithstanding Herr Pohl's explanation. Owing to the development of a severer taste in church music the popularity of the Haydn-Mozart school has declined, and the D minor Mass is not heard so frequently in the concert-room as it used to be. Its performance under Herr Richter was fair, but by no means first-rate, and Mr. Armbruster's organ part was strangely at variance with the composer's directions. The not very important solo parts were efficiently rendered by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Orridge, Herr George Ritter, and Mr. F. King. The artistic feelings of musicians received a severe shock in the interpretation of Beethoven's Choral Fantasia by Mr. Walter Bache, who did not scruple to alter and spoil some of the composer's most effective and characteristic passages. No protest could be too strong against vandalism of this kind. The most satisfactory performances of the evening were those of the Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger" and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in D, No. 2, the latter a remarkably clever and brilliant arrangement of gipsy melodies. The superficial yet alluring piece so took the fancy of the audience that they requested an encore, to which Herr Richter somewhat weakly assented. Altogether this was not a very satisfactory Concert, but amends were made on the next Monday, the 11th ult., when very little occurred to mar the general feeling of content. M. Saint-Saëns's rhapsodical composition in G minor, mis-called a Concerto, is not a first-rate medium for the début of a pianist; but, in spite of the unsatisfactory nature of the music, the impression created by Madame Stepanoff was remarkably favourable. This presumably Russian executant has a remarkably fine technique, her touch being at once powerful and sympathetic, while her interpretation of the most difficult passages showed powers of execution far beyond the average. We shall be glad to hear Madame Stepanoff in some work of higher calibre. Dvorák's Slavonic Rhapsody in G, No. 2, was on the whole a disappointment, simply because it does not possess the freshness and spontaneity of character usually associated with the works of the Bohemian composer. It is certainly less charming than the companion work in A flat introduced two seasons ago, but at the same time is remarkably clever, and some passages are extremely effective, though considered in its entirety it must be pronounced laboured and patchy. Perhaps it might improve with acquaintance, like Brahms's tragic Overture, Op. 81, which grows upon the listener with each successive hearing. This last work is worthy of the composer of the German Requiem and the "Song of Destiny," and higher praise it would be impossible to bestow. The items which seemed to please the audience most thoroughly were Wagner's "Siegfried-Idyll" and the Introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," both of which were rendered to perfection, as was also Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, No. 4, which concluded the programme.

The seventh Concert on the 18th attracted an overflowing audience, although the honoured name of Beethoven was absent from the programme. But Wagner was represented by the popular "Tannhäuser" overture (superbly played), and the Preislied from "Die Meistersinger" which was exquisitely interpreted by Mr. Edward Lloyd. Another very fine solo performance was that of Schumann's Concerto for violoncello in A minor, Op. 129, by Herr Hausmann. Unfortunately the work does not display the composer's genius in a favourable light, the first and third movements being dry and laboured. The juxtaposition of Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa" and Brahms's Second Symphony in D secured the effect of contrast. Both are thoroughly modern in spirit, but the latter belongs to purely classic art in form and texture, while the former, with all its cleverness and originality, is theatrical and bizarre, appealing to a lower order of intellect. The symphonic poem and the symphony are alike worthy of their respective composers, so that there is no unfairness in the comparison we have made. The performance of each was as near perfection as possible, and the Concert was, therefore, a thorough success. A Pianoforte Concerto by Herr Henschel, with the composer as executant, was announced to be given at the eighth Concert, on the 25th ult., but a slip was inserted in the programme to the effect that through unforeseen circumstances the work could not be performed. The natural disappointment which was doubtless felt was to a great extent counterbalanced by the "Vorspiel und Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde," which was given instead. This Wagnerian excerpt is always a trump card with Herr Richter, and it never created a greater effect than on this occasion. Mr. Edward Lloyd, who made such a success with Walter's prize-song at the previous Concert, introduced the two airs, "Am stillen Herd" and "Fanget an," from the first act of "Die Meistersinger," and invested them with infinite charm. It is seldom that Herr Richter includes two Symphonies in one programme, but this Concert commenced with Mozart's delightful Symphony in C, generally known as No. 6, and closed with Berlioz's "Harold en Italie." The Viennese conductor seemed quite at home in the exacting work of the French composer, and the performance must have thoroughly satisfied musicians, though, sooth to say, it was not very heartily received by the general audience. Notwithstanding this lukewarmness, Herr Richter may be recommended to add a few more works of Berlioz to his repertory—the fanatics of the modern German school should not be permitted to have full control over the programmes.

M. DE PACHMANN'S RECITALS.

A MUSICAL executant who has gained celebrity by reason of his uncommon talent in the interpretation of one distinctive school of composition may readily be pardoned if he seeks to prove that he is no specialist, but rather an artist whose sympathies extend to every branch of the sphere in which his life's work may be said to centre. M. de Pachmann came to us as an apostle of Chopin, and his supremacy in the music of the Franco-Polish composer was frankly acknowledged. We have now had opportunities of judging him in the works of other masters, and it must be avowed that his success or failure has been in proportion to the Chopinesque spirit of the music he has played. At the last Recital, on the 9th ult., at St. James's Hall, he selected Beethoven's Sonata in A, Op. 101, and the result was extremely unsatisfactory. The tempo rubato is not required in Beethoven's music, and unfortunately the masculine breadth of style which really is needed was not forthcoming. In its place we had exaggerated nuances and a dreamy sentimentality of style ill befitting the Bonn master's utterances. M. de Pachmann made ample amends for whatever shortcomings were apparent in this instance by his exquisite interpretation of a selection of Chopin's compositions, including five of the Etudes, which were given to absolute perfection. Complete success was also won in a clever Air with variations by Rubinstein, played for the first time in England, and the Recital generally went to prove that the Austro-Russian pianist is more at home on romantic than on classical ground, a fact which is by no means to his discredit, since it is scarcely given to any performer to excel in every department of his art.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE sixth and last Concert of the season took place on May 30, the novelty in the programme being a selection from Liszt's "Christus," a work which, judging from the portion given, can scarcely be considered representative of the style of a master who must be admitted, even by his detractors, to possess a large amount of dramatic power. We have no desire to compare Handel's Pifferari music with that of Liszt, nor do we wish to call to mind the fragments of Mendelssohn's Oratorio on the same subject, because every composer has a right to be judged according to his own individuality; but music must in some way arrest the attention, and that this was not the case with a patient Philharmonic audience was proved not only by the many who left before the composition was half over, but by the marks of disapprobation which were heard throughout the room at the conclusion. The parts of the Oratorio chosen were the Pastorale and Message of the Angel, and the March of the Three Holy Kings; and, although it must in fairness be said that we should suspend our decision upon the merits of a work of such magnitude until it is placed before us in its entirety, we have no hesitation in asserting that the impression made upon us by the excerpts given created but little desire on our part to extend our knowledge of the composition. The performance was by no means satisfactory; but the apathy of the audience made this fact but of small importance. The solos were carefully sung by Miss Minnie Gwynne and Mr. Ernest Laris, and the work was steadily conducted by Mr. Cusins. A feature in the selection for the evening was the violin-playing of Signorina Teresina Tua, who performed with much delicacy and facility of execution a Ballade and Polonaise by Vieuxtemps, and was most warmly applauded. Madame Sophie Menter's rendering of Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat displayed the clever pianist's real capabilities to the best advantage; and Madame Sembrich's fine singing of Mendelssohn's Scena "Infelice" must be mentioned in the highest terms of admiration. Mr. Santley also contributed the effective Scène from Gounod's "Philemon and Baucis," "Au bruit des lourds marteaux"; and the orchestral pieces were Beethoven's Symphony in C minor and Weber's Overture, "The Ruler of the Spirits." Mr. Cusins—who, we understand, retires from the post he has so long occupied as Conductor of the Society, after the present season—directed the whole of the Concert with his usual care and earnestness.

THE COLOGNE CHOIR.

IN 1853 the "Kölner Manner-Gesangverein" paid a visit to this country, and met with such a warm reception that they came again in 1854 and in 1857. Thirty years have elapsed since the first appearance of the Association among us, and music in England is believed to have made enormous strides during the interim; and yet it cannot be denied that their performances have produced but little stir on the present occasion, and the amount of Royal and influential patronage bestowed upon the singers has been comparatively small. There is an apparent contradiction here, but it is readily explainable. Where one Choral Society flourished in 1853, we may now find a score, and the special qualities which characterise the Cologne Choir are not unknown at home, though they may not frequently be cultivated to such perfection. It is idle to say, however, that the public no longer cares for part-songs because it has learned to appreciate symphonies. There may now be a select contingent capable of assimilating the greatest masterpieces of art, but beyond there is the vast majority to whom anything stronger than a sentimental ballad is as naught. It is the quantity of music that we now have, rather than a general improvement in public taste, that accounts for the absence of the lionising which the German singers formerly received at our hands. In place of indulging in complacent comparisons between the ignorance of the past and the enlightenment of the present, it would be well to note the lessons to be gained from the method of working of a society which has no counterpart in this country. Allowing that there was more patriotic than art significance in the average Liedertafel of Germany, there is no justification for numbering the Cologne Male-voice Choir among radical or bibulous organisations. Their motto, "Durch das Schöne stets das Gute" ("Always the good by means of the beautiful"), has ever governed their action from the time they were first banded together in 1842, and various charitable and beneficent enterprises have gained help to the extent of £15,000 by their means. The completion of Cologne Cathedral was an object with which every one could sympathise, and all members of the Church of England owe them a debt of gratitude for their present efforts in behalf of the intended Anglican church in the Rhine city. Whether any material sum has been raised by the ten Concerts given at St. James's Hall on June 11, 12, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19, 21, 22, and 23, we have no means of declaring, nor have we the right to inquire. Reverting to the strictly musical aspect of the subject, it may be noted that the choir is fairly entitled to rank as supreme among the multitudinous kindred associations in Germany, since whenever it has competed with others it has borne away the palm. Unfortunately, while we can admire the special qualities which distinguish its performances, we have no means of instituting comparisons as male-voice choral singing is practically unknown in this country. The former visits of the Cologne Choir gave no impetus to the cultivation of this branch of art, nor is it reasonable to suppose the case will be different now. Societies in which both sexes meet on equal terms, commend themselves to the ordinary habits and social instincts of English people, and the national character is not likely to undergo a change. Whether we lose very much as a musical nation from possessing no equivalent to the Gesangvereine of the Fatherland or the societies of Orphéonists in France must be a matter of opinion. The répertoire of such a body as the Cologne Choir consists of a mass of material, good, bad, and indifferent. Some of the greatest composers, notably Schubert, Weber, Schumann, and Mendelssohn, have written beautiful pieces for male voices, and these remain neglected in England for the reasons stated. This is regrettable, but on the other hand we are also spared the inanities of Kücken, Gumbert, Abt, and other composers of the same stamp. It would serve no useful purpose to criticise seriatim the programmes of the whole of the concerts enumerated above. The listener could not fail to be impressed by the perfection of discipline which characterised the performances, and which is honourable alike to the Conductor (Herr S. de Lange) and the singers themselves. The faultless precision in attack, the justness of intonation, the wonderful crescendi and diminuendi, and the unity of feeling pervading the ninety-two executants show what may be done by careful training and zealous co-operation of a leader and his subordinates. As an example of the exquisite ensemble attained, we may refer to Kremser's old Dutch song "Come, my maiden dearest," in which a mezza voce is maintained throughout. Schubert's delicious "Gondolier's Song" and Koschat's humorous part-song in the Carinthian dialect also displayed the best qualities of the choir to advantage, and the same may be said of pieces by Kreutzer, Mendelssohn, and Julius Rietz. The part-music was relieved by violin and pianoforte solos, and by the singing of Herr Henrik Westberg, a robust tenor, whose method was not altogether admirable. If the Cologne singers had further varied their proceedings by a performance of Mendelssohn's "Antigone" or "Œdipus," or a rendering of Cherubini's fine Mass for male voices, their claims to consideration would have been enhanced; but, as it is, their homogeneity, their enthusiasm, and their strict subordination of individual feeling to the requirements of the art they practise and love, offer a lesson to English amateurs which they would do well to lay to heart.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

THE want of self-confidence which betrayed itself at one of the early Concerts this season given by this Society was again perceptible, though happily to a less extent, at the third Subscription Concert, on Thursday, May 31. It will be generally agreed that a programme of part-music needs some relief, and perhaps it is as well that the best available artists should be secured to provide the requisite variety. To musicians the most interesting feature of the Concert was the performance of Sterndale Bennett's motett "In Thee, O Lord," recently published for the first time. The gifted composer was called upon in virtue of his official position as Professor at Cambridge to make some contributions to service music, and this eight-part motett or anthem was the second of his efforts in this direction, and was partly composed in 1856, but was not finished until 1873. As an English composer Bennett found no difficulty in adopting the true Anglican style, and Cathedral choirs will find in the work a welcome addition to their repertory. Another novelty was a bright and effective part-song by Mr. A. R. Gaul, entitled "The Children's Hour." This setting of Longfellow's charming verses so pleased the audience that an encore was demanded and granted. Among other choral items, Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer" (the solo part tastefully sung by Miss Mary Davies) and Palestrina's madrigal "April, sweet month" deserve mention. The singing generally, under Mr.

Randegger's direction, was admirable, but again the comparative weakness of the soprano contingent was perceptible. M. de Pachmann played Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, and Madame Patey and Mr. Lloyd contributed some songs.

M. SAINTON'S FAREWELL CONCERT.

M. PROSPER SAINTON came to this country from his native town, Toulouse, in 1844, the year which introduced to us Joseph Joachim, then a boy of thirteen. M. Sainton was thirty-one years' old when he landed on our shores; he is now seventy, and all the intervening time has been spent in England, as, at some period or other, leader of Her Majesty's private band; chef d'attaque at the Royal Italian Opera, Sacred Harmonic Society, and Provincial Festivals; deputy-conductor for Sir Michael Costa; Professor at the Royal Academy of Music, solo performer, and what not besides that is dignified and honourable. He has, therefore, filled a large space in the world of English music, and fully earned the right to take a formal farewell of the public on the occasion of retiring into private life. That right he exercised on Monday, the 25th ult., when the distinguished violinist gave a Concert in the Albert Hall, and had the satisfaction of seeing a very large and sympathetic audience respond to his invitation. Interesting in itself, the occasion was made attractive in various ways, though considerable disappointment ensued upon the failure of Madame Adeline Patti and Mr. Sims Reeves to redeem their promise of assistance. In each case indisposition was alleged, and the audience had to accept an explanation which, of course, disarmed resentment, if it could not atone for the thing explained. But even without the "stars" just named, the Concert gave satisfaction and was a success. M. Sainton was, of course, a conspicuous figure. He played first the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Concerto, and next two solos written by himself; in each case exhibiting the admirable qualities which years ago made him famous, and causing regret that so much ability should be withdrawn from the public service. His reception was cordial in the extreme; and demonstrations of kindly feeling repeatedly made must have convinced him that he carries into retirement the admiration and esteem of the people among whom he has lived so long. A number of eminent artists assisted the bénéficiaire, M^{me}. Sainton-Dolby at their head. The famous contralto, whose voice many present had never thought to hear again, sang "The days that are no more" and "Strangers yet," with all her old breadth of style and expressive power. In these respects she was the Miss Dolby of years ago, and deep was the interest excited by her performance. Miss Mary Davies, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Rigby, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, M. Lasserre, Miss Gyde, Signor Scovello, and others lent their aid to promote the success of the occasion, and did themselves honour by assisting at the farewell of an artist not soon to be forgotten as one who, alike in public and private life, discharged his duties in an exemplary manner, and fully earned for his declining years the reward of "honour, love, obedience, troops of friends."

CHOIR BENEVOLENT FUND.

THE Anniversary Dinner of this excellent Charity took place at Willis's Rooms, on the 21st ult., the Right Hon. G. Cavendish Bentinck, M.P., in the chair. The presence of a large number of professional musicians of the highest eminence, and of influential patrons of the art, evidenced the warm interest taken in the welfare of an Association which, having for its object the securing a provision for aged or invalid members who are lay clerks and organists in cathedrals and collegiate churches, the granting of a fixed sum payable at the decease of members to their widows or children, and the temporary relief of the said widows and children in time of need or affliction, should claim the sympathy and support of all desirous of maintaining the efficiency of our choral service, and of perpetuating the works of the great English church composers. In proposing the principal toast of the evening, the chairman strenuously advocated the importance of upholding native art, and of affording assistance to those by the exercise of whose talents the standard compositions are kept alive before the public. Eloquent speeches were also made by the Dean of Lichfield, the Rev. Canon Prothero, Mr. Sheriff Savory, and Mr. Wootton Isaacson; also by Mr. George Benson and Mr. George Gray, members of the Association, who were practically acquainted with its working, and whose exertions had materially aided its development. During the evening several madrigals and glees were finely sung by a choral body selected from the principal cathedrals, under the conductorship of Sir G. Elvey, Dr. J. F. Bridge, and Mr. W. Winn. The list of subscriptions announced by Mr. Charles Fry, Secretary to the Fund, amounted to about £160; but we sincerely trust that the stream of charity will continue to flow in the direction of this thoroughly deserving Institution. The banquet can occur only once a year; but age, sickness, and infirmity are around us daily.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

DR. PARRY'S new Symphony, inserted between Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose" and Brahms's "Schicksalslied," formed the very attractive programme of the Cambridge Society's last Concert, on the 12th ult. An audience at the Cambridge Guildhall is on such occasions very much above the average. The president and committee of the Society are in the enviable position of not having to consult popular tastes in the selection of music. The director, Dr. Stanford, with the excellent soloists and chorus of the Society at his disposal, aided by a London orchestra and supplemented by local amateurs of the very first merit, is practically uncontrolled in his ambition in regard to the works to be performed. He has already spoiled us to this extent, that in each term we shall now expect some musical novelty or rarity at one, at least, of the Concerts of the Cambridge University Musical Society. The interest of a programme is not always in its novelty, but also, as occurred in the Concert we are noticing, in the judicious contrast of the pieces. Schumann's "Pilgerfahrt" is a pretty but not very vigorous work, whereas the "Schicksalslied" by Brahms is one of the best of his vocal compositions. There is no room here for comparison between the two composers; nor can we reasonably compare the setting of a fairy legend of elves and flower-land with the glimpse of Elysium Brahms allows us to see, as it were, through the gloomy portals of a synagogue. The two works, however, well represent a section of time in the history of the German part-song, from its artistic perfection to its partial idealisation. And, after all, what a short step from Schumann to Brahms—how slow is the process of musical evolution! The thought should restrain any propensity towards a nibbling criticism of a new work, and above all of a symphony. There can be no more ungrateful task for a musician at the present day than to labour at a symphony. Like virtue, it must be its own reward, for it is not in request amongst publishers, managers, or singing-classes. Unless it carve its way at once into a high category, it is at most a species of musical investment in a terminable annuity, at a very moderate rate of interest. The best that can be said of it is that the interest is temporarily secure, and not altogether evanescent like some higher profits. Dr. Parry's Symphony No. 2, in F, produced at the Cambridge Concert on the 12th ult., will, in the general opinion of English critics, more than confirm the position he had attained as a composer by his "Prometheus Unbound," and his Symphony No. 1, in G. His last work is written in accordance with ordinary models. Its familiar form being easily followed, it will get the cheap credit of clearness of outline; a quality always welcome, and in immature composers a sign of progress. In Dr. Parry's case, it is simply a sign that he, like many others, finds it easier to work in old grooves, or that as a newly installed professor at the Royal College of Music he is desirous of setting a wholesome example of reverence. Beyond the mere schematic form, there is nothing archaic in Dr. Parry's new Symphony. Indeed, if in following the propensity we have just impugned, we wanted to find fault at all, we should say it erred in being too faithful a representative of the music of the day. Its over-elaboration is fortunately mellowed by strains in themselves captivating, and by an instrumentation which has colour and warmth, if at times a little laboured and artificial. The Symphony commences with a short Introduction, Andante sostenuto, in F minor. This is followed by a Moderato in the major, a Scherzo in the relative minor, and a Trio in D major. The slow movement is in B flat, and the final movement, an Allegro moderato, is in the normal key and in 3-4 measure. In the last coda group the strings introduce a melody, simply harmonised and, like the subject of the Trio, of a very engaging vein. The annotator of the printed programme refers to it as derived from the principal subject; and in reference to other instances he justly calls attention to the unusual skill and lavishness with which the composer has utilised all his thematic material in producing a general unity of effect. At the conclusion of the Symphony Dr. Parry was called for and received long and hearty applause. The vocal soloists who ably took part in "The Pilgrimage of the Rose" and "The Song of Destiny" were Miss Amy Aylward, Miss Helen Arnim, Mr. Walter Ford (King's College), and Mr. Herbert Thordike.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE season just closed has been, in one way, very disappointing to lovers of music in Oxford. Not only have several hundred pounds, according to trustworthy information, been lost by various Societies in giving concerts, but in one case, that of the Orchestral Concerts, the losses have been so heavy as to necessitate the abandonment of the enterprise.

It is with much regret that we record the great loss that Oxford music has sustained by the death of Mr. W. Howell Allchin, Mus. Bac., Organist of St. John's College, a gentleman whose character, both in society and as a musician, had gained him the respect and esteem of all who knew him. His friends, professional and amateur, resolved to show their regret practically by organising a Concert for the benefit of his family, and it is gratifying to be able to record that, by gratuitous assistance in every particular, and by the combined efforts of all concerned, a most successful Concert was given on April 13, which produced some £225.

Turning to more recent events, the most important Concerts of the Summer Term just ended have been the performance of Gounod's "Redemption" by the Choral Society on May 17, and that of Haydn's "Seasons" by the Philharmonic on June 11, in the Sheldonian Theatre. It is not possible to speak very favourably of either performance. In each the chorus was unsteady, wanting in tone, and not unfrequently out of tune.

Of College Concerts there have been a very great number, and it is impossible to do more than chronicle some salient features. Besides Sir George Macfarren's "Ajax" music at Queen's (May 18), there were performances of Cowen's "Rose Maiden" at Keble (May 14), of Hattori's "Robin Hood" at Worcester (May 16), of Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" at Exeter (May 18), of Macfarren's "May-Day" at St. John's (May 29), and of Handel's "Alexander's Feast" at New College (June 12). Moreover, at each of these colleges, with the exception of Worcester and New, a band was used, whereas for a decade an orchestra had only been known at Queen's. As regards the performance, the most successful Concerts were certainly Queen's and Pembroke. At the former the "Ajax" music, written last year for Cambridge, proved more effective in a concert-room than could have been expected; a Symphony (Mozart's "Clarinet") was admirably played, and the solo performers, both vocal and instrumental, were of the first order of merit. At Pembroke also the performance was of consistent excellence, and in the case of Mr. Tuckwell's singing, of something more. At each college the chorus-singing was very good. We may select from the pile of programmes before us the performances of "Robin Hood" at Worcester and of the "May Queen" at Exeter, the Quartet and Symphony at St. John's (Mozart's B flat), and the first part of the programme at Christchurch (which made its first appearance as a musical college) as most noteworthy. At New College and Magdalen, also, excellent Concerts were given, as might be expected from the fame of their professional choirs.

There is a good deal of room for improvement in the programmes, where the same pieces appear with tiresome iteration. There are surely enough good madrigals to prevent its being necessary to sing Gibbons's familiar "Silver Swan" twice in a month. Why, again, should Pembroke and Christchurch repeat Garrett's "Hope" Waltzes, performed only a few weeks earlier at Queen's? and St. John's include in their programme part of a symphony played in Oxford less than a fortnight before? Our experience of the season proves that there is much still to be done in Oxford. We have lost during the past year some leading spirits whom we could ill spare. Let us hope that their successors will prove equal to filling their places.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THERE has been more noise than music in Birmingham during the past month, in connection chiefly with the popular celebration of Mr. Bright's twenty-fifth year in the representation of the borough, and the public ear has been virtually monopolised by street bands with more than their due proportion of instruments of percussion. At the best of times, however, the month of June is not prolific in Concerts, experience having long since taught our caterers that summer evenings are not conducive to large audiences, however admirable the entertainment provided.

Comic opera of course flourishes where classic music cannot subsist, and the performances of Sullivan's "Patience" and Planquette's "Rip Van Winkle," by two of Mr. D'Oyley Carte's touring companies, have drawn good houses at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, and elicited much commendation. As both the works and the principal vocalists who took part in them are well known in London, detailed notice of these performances would be superfluous, and it will suffice to remark that Sullivan's music has evidently lost none of its charm yet for the Birmingham public, and that that of Planquette seems destined to a wide popularity.

The only event of real musical interest this month has been the Pianoforte Recital given by Mr. R. Rickard, a Birmingham man, in the new lecture theatre of the Midland Institute. This Recital, which took place on the 21st, was devoted exclusively to the works of Chopin, so far as the pianoforte was concerned, and was substantially identical with that given by Mr. Rickard in St. James's Hall last month, comprising the Fantasia in F minor (Op. 49); the Berceuse in D flat (Op. 57); the Barcarole in F sharp (Op. 60); Brilliant Variations in B flat (Op. 12); Scherzo in B minor (Op. 20); Andante spianato and Polonaise (Op. 22); Trauermarsch from Sonata in B flat minor (Op. 35); Ballade in A flat (Op. 47); Nocturne in D flat (Op. 27); and Concerto Allegro in A (Op. 46). The whole of these pieces were played from memory with remarkable skill, power, and unerring accuracy, eliciting frequent and enthusiastic applause from a crowded and critical audience. The entertainment was agreeably varied by the vocal solos of Miss Clara Myers, whose rich contralto voice was heard to great advantage in songs by Schumann, Hermann Levi, and Marzials, and by sundry flute performances by Mr. A. Collard.

On the previous evening Mr. A. R. Gaul's sacred Cantata "The Holy City," composed for the last Birmingham Festival, was performed before a crowded congregation in St. Michael's Church, Handsworth, under the conductorship of Mr. C. J. Stevens. There was a full instrumental band in addition to the organ, at which the composer presided, and the performance altogether was a successful one.

WORCESTER CHORAL FESTIVAL.

THE fourth Triennial Festival of Choirs of the Worcester Archdeaconry took place on the 7th ult. at the Cathedral. Sixteen hundred chorists in surplices took part in it, and the effect of such masses of voices in a place so unusually good for sound was beyond measure impressive. The singers were divided into two portions, those occupying the nave being marched in first to a voluntary played simultaneously by Mr. Done and his assistant on the two organs, and those seated in the choir entering last to the Processional hymn, "Advance, advance, the day is come!" by J. W. Elliott. The chants to the Venite and Psalms were by Turle, Pymar, and Jones, and all went well. Next followed a Te Deum and Benedictus in D, by the Rev. H. H. Woodward, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Minor Canon of the Cathedral and Secretary of the Choral Association, and this may be said to have formed the chief feature of the morning service. The anthem was Barnby's "I will give thanks," in which the verse-parts were taken by the Cathedral choir only. The hymns were "Jerusalem on high," from Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley's Oratorio "Hagar," and Berthold Tours's setting of "For thee, O dear country," the construction of which was effectively brought out in the fourth verse by assigning alternate lines to the trebles and men. The recessional was "Praise the Rock of our salvation," to Dr. Dykes's tune.

In the afternoon the chants were by Sir George Elvey and J. Jones (reharmonised). The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to C. H. Lloyd's Service in G. The anthem, Walmisley's "From all that dwell below the skies"—the theme given out each time by the Cathedral choir, and repeated full—was by far the most effective and best sung portion of the afternoon service, though the hymns "Summer suns are glowing" (J. Smith) and "Rejoice to-day with one accord" (J. S. Bach) went fairly well. The Processional and Recessional were the same as in the morning. The Rev. H. W. L'Estrange Malone intoned the second part of the service morning and afternoon. Throughout the choirs and congregation took the plain song, while the Cathedral choir alone sang Tallis's Ferial harmonies, but these were inaudible in the nave. Mr. Milward, Conductor of the Association, conducted from the screen, and his beat was transmitted to the north transept by Mr. Dyson, Vice-Conductor, and to the choir by the Rev. H. H. Woodward. The intonation was provided for by five trumpets, which kept up the pitch most successfully.

THE 150th Anniversary of the Consecration of St. John's Church, Horselydown, was celebrated on Friday, the 15th ult. We had an opportunity last autumn of calling attention to the great alterations for the better then recently effected both in the church and its services, and we are now glad to record the continuation of the good work, musical and otherwise, then set on foot. The proceedings at the present Festival were a short service at noon, at which Smart's Te Deum in F, with Processional and Retrocessional hymns, were sung, the service being followed by a luncheon in the fine old hall of the neighbouring Grammar School, known as Queen Elizabeth's; and, at 7.30, full choral evensong. At this latter service a string septet reinforced the organ, which was exceedingly well played by Mr. C. Warwick Jordan. Tours's Evening Service in F and Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" were respectively the service and anthem. The Cantata (the tenor solos in which were taken by Mr. Kenningham, of St. Paul's Cathedral) was well sung throughout, the Wailing Chorus being especially effective. Mr. R. Lemaire, the Organist and Choirmaster of the church, conducted this service, and the Cantata was repeated on the following Sunday evening without the string band.

THE Society for the Propagation of the Gospel held its annual Festival in St. Paul's Cathedral on Wednesday morning, the 13th ult. The service, which was preceded by the ordinary choral matins of the Cathedral, consisted of full choral celebration of the Holy Communion with a sermon from the Bishop of Newcastle, the music being Schubert's Mass in G, a service familiar to habitués of the Cathedral. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who intoned his part, was the celebrant. The same venerable Society held a service on the preceding evening, at Westminster Abbey, which was not largely attended. At this service Mendelssohn's "Why rage fiercely the heathen?" formed the anthem; the "Hallelujah" Chorus, which was also on the programme, being omitted. Dr. Bridge presided at the organ.

AN attractive Concert, given in aid of a local charity, took place at Kensington Town Hall, on Wednesday, May 30. The principal feature of interest was the performance of Reinecke's "Little Snowdrop," by the South Kensington Ladies Choir, under the direction of Mrs. Arthur O'Leary, who held the bâton. The remarkable finish, precision, and spirit with which the choruses were executed reflected the highest credit, not only on the ladies themselves, but on their Conductor, whose energy and patience contributed to such a satisfactory result. The solos were excellently rendered by the Misses Howes and Spencer Jones. In the second part of the concert the choir showed excellent training in their rendering of Mackenzie's part-song "Come, sisters, come" and Gade's chorus from "The Crusaders," "The wave sweeps my breast," in which Mr. Robertson sang the tenor part most effectively. Miss Robertson gave Randegger's "Bird of the Springtime," and "I know my love loves me," by Rosetta O'Leary, in her best manner, and obtained for each a rapturous encore. Lady Benedict also performed with much effect Chopin's Ballade in A flat. Mr. Fowles was an excellent accompanist. The Concert was altogether a success, a substantial sum having been raised for the charity.

UNDER the auspices of the People's Entertainment Society a Concert was given in the Bolingbroke Hall, Battersea Rise, by members of the Battersea branch of the Metropolitan Choral and Orchestral Union, an Association organised by the Society above mentioned for the purpose of fostering a taste for good music amongst the poorer classes. As both band and choir are exclusively composed of mechanics, factory hands, and men employed on the river, the performance was in the highest degree creditable, and fully evinced the skilful training of the Conductor, Mr. W. H. Leslie. A selection from "The Messiah" commenced the Concert, the choruses in which were most effectively given, the Viscountess Folkestone (who has always taken the utmost interest in the Society) giving an excellent rendering of "There were shepherds," and "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and Mr. H. Yates singing "Comfort ye" and "Ev'ry valley" with much success. The second part of the programme included the March of the Priests from "Athalie," vocal music by Lady Folkestone, Miss Wakefield, and Mr. Budd, and a violin solo by Miss Hardy. The hall was crowded, part of the audience being admitted on payment, but the majority, as is the rule on such occasions, being invited by the Society.

THE Eltham Choral Society, established in the autumn of last year, gave its first Concert, with great success, in the Public Hall, Eltham, on Tuesday evening, the 29th May, under the direction of its Conductor, Mr. George C. Martin, Sub-Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. The first part of the Concert consisted of Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm, followed by Gade's Cantata "The Erl-King's Daughter," in which the soloists were Miss Marian Wardroper, who undertook the name-part, together with that of the Mother, and gave an efficient rendering of both, and Mr. T. Kempton, who sang admirably in the part of Sir Oluf. The choir also was extremely good in the choruses, which are somewhat exacting in many places; the leads being taken up with precision and accuracy, and the time being maintained firmly throughout. The second part of the programme was devoted to a miscellaneous selection of songs, glees, and part-songs, with solos from the vocalists already named. Mrs. G. C. Martin presided at the pianoforte throughout the first part of the Concert, Mr. C. E. Miller (who conducted the Cantata) at the harmonium during the Psalm, and Mr. Martin at the same instrument during the Cantata.

THE Kyrie Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave a performance of "Samson" on the 13th ult., in St. Mary's Church, Hoxton. The soloists were Miss Edith Phillips, Miss Isabel Tomalin, Mr. Reginald Groome, Mr. Albert Orme, and Mr. Ap Herbert. A second performance of the Oratorio was given on the 20th, in the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Commercial Road East. The soloists were Miss Hoschke, Mrs. Oram, Mr. D'Arcy Ferris, Mr. Albert Orme, and Mr. Ap Herbert. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ on both occasions.

A CHORAL FESTIVAL in connection with the Girls' Friendly Society was held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday, the 14th ult., the musical arrangements being undertaken by the Choir of St. Peter's Church, Eaton Square, Mr. W. M. Sergison presiding at the organ. The service commenced with the Te Deum, sung to Smart in F, followed immediately by a choral celebration of the Holy Communion, for which Dr. Stainer's well-known service in A was used, shorn, however, of its Nicene Creed: this omission, which certainly did not enhance the effect of the service, is in no way to be commended. During the offertory Wesley's "Blessed be the God and Father" was sung, and after the Consecration prayer Attwood's Veni Creator, a composition hardly so appropriate to this particular part of the service as many hymns we could name. The singing of the choir, not a large one, was on the whole commendable. In connection with the same Society an evening Festival was held on the following Saturday, the 16th ult., in Westminster Abbey, when the music was rendered by the Choir of the Lay-Helpers' Association, conducted by Mr. G. C. Martin. Mendelssohn's "Grant us Thy peace" was the anthem.

At a meeting of the subscribers to the "Henry Smart Memorial Fund" (the Rev. Canon Duckworth, D.D., in the chair), held on the 19th ult., at Trinity College, Mandeville Place, it was resolved that the amount available after expenses, about £500, should be devoted to the establishment of a perpetual exhibition at the Royal Academy of Music bearing the name of Henry Smart. It had been found impracticable to carry out the original idea of establishing a musical scholarship at Oxford or Cambridge. The Committee having expressed their great disappointment at the smallness of the sum contributed, it was resolved by the meeting that the trustees, in whose names the capital sum will be invested, be empowered to receive and add thereto any additional contributions which may be offered them. The musical public which has so largely profited by the genius of Henry Smart will thus still have an opportunity of doing honour to the memory of one of the most gifted English composers. Contributions may still be paid to the "Henry Smart Memorial Fund" at Messrs. Coutts, 59, Strand, W.C.

A SUCCESSFUL Concert was given on Monday, the 11th ult., at Clapham Hall, in aid of the Clapham Home for Fatherless Girls, by the members of the Clapham Private Choral Society. The principal item in the first part was Haydn's "Spring" ("Seasons"), the choruses of which were particularly well rendered, reflecting great credit on the Conductor of the Society, Mr. James Shaw; and the solos being most effectively sung by Miss Ring and Messrs. J. and A. H. Sarjeant. The duet, "Quis est homo," from Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and Barnby's song "The soft Southern breeze" were well given by the Misses Crocker and Mr. A. Smith respectively. The second part was miscellaneous, the artists being Miss Howes (R.A.M.), Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, and Mr. Robert Hilton. Mr. Albert Rowarth played the Andante and Allegro movements from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, for which he was much applauded; and Mr. James Shaw contributed a pianoforte solo in his usual finished style.

THE twenty-ninth performance of new compositions by members of the Musical Artists' Society took place at the Royal Academy concert-room on Saturday, the 23rd ult. There were two concerted works in the programme, a Trio in E flat by Dr. Jacob Bradford and a String Quartet in C by F. Adler. The former did not create a very strong impression, the subjects being devoid of dignity and the treatment tame and diffuse. No opinion could be formed of the Quartet, as two of the executants did not arrive and it had to be omitted. The most commendable item was a set of four Characteristic Dances for pianoforte by Mr. E. H. Thorne, played by Miss Edith Goldsbro'. These are all well written, and the third number, entitled "An Eastern Tale," is extremely fresh and fanciful. Other pianoforte pieces by Mr. Algernon Ashton and Mr. H. C. Banister completed the list of instrumental compositions. Songs by Miss C. Prescott, Mr. C. J. Reed, and Mr. Duncan Hume were favourably received, but scarcely need criticism.

We have great pleasure in stating that the Archbishop of Canterbury has conferred the degree of Mus. Doc. on Mr. G. C. Martin, Sub-Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. Dr. Martin was originally Organist of the Parish Church of Lamborne, Berkshire, where he gained such a high reputation as Organist and Choirmaster that the Duke of Buccleuch appointed him to similar work at Dalkeith. Whilst there the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, on the recommendation of Dr. Stainer, offered him the posts of sub-organist and teacher of the chorists of St. Paul's. Since he has resided in London Dr. Martin has trained the boys of St. Paul's with well-known success, and has produced many compositions which bear testimony to his remarkable musical gifts. The honour now conferred by the Archbishop will be welcomed, we are sure, by all church musicians. Dr. Martin took the degree of Mus. Bac., Oxon., about twelve years since. He has lately been appointed by Sir G. Grove one of the professors at the Royal College of Music.

THE St. Michael's Choral Society gave a Concert at the Morley Hall, Hackney, under the able conductorship of Mr. J. Clippingdale, on May 28, before a large audience. A telegram was read from Madame Patey announcing her inability to appear from indisposition; but Miss Rose Dafforne fully justified the cordiality with which her name was received as a substitute, for in all her songs she displayed not only a highly sympathetic voice, but the result of sound culture, and earned a good opinion with her listeners, which will assuredly make her speedy reappearance anxiously looked for. Songs were also contributed with much success by Mr. G. Colvill and Signor Foli; and the excellent pianoforte performances of Miss Hammer, Madame Clippingdale, Sir Julius and Lady Benedict were features of the evening. The programme was effectively diversified by the singing of several part-songs, all of which were much applauded. The accompanist was Mr. Herbert Sharpe.

It is with sincere regret that we record the death, on Friday, the 1st ult., of Mr. S. N. Barber, which occurred at his residence, 174, Denmark Hill, S.E. Mr. Barber was an enthusiastic amateur and lover of organs and organ music, and had at different times in his life no less than four organs built for his own private house. His collection of organ music was almost unique in its extent, and not long since he published at his own cost, from the simple desire to perpetuate the name of a deceased artist, a series of organ compositions by the late Dr. J. C. Tiley. In him another face familiar to the habitués of the Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace has disappeared for ever, and in him, too, many musicians, organ-players particularly, will feel that they have lost a kind and appreciative friend.

THE programme of the Derby Choral Union announces three Concerts for its eighteenth season, commencing on the 13th of November next. At the first Concert Gounod's "Redemption" will be given, the solo parts being assigned to Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Messrs. E. Lloyd, H. Blower, and Frederic King. Handel's "Messiah" will occupy the second Concert, with Madame Laura Smart, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. J. W. Turner, and Signor Foli as solo vocalists; and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and Gade's "Crusaders" will be performed at the third Concert, the principal singers being Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. H. Pope. The Conductor will be Mr. T. Tallis Trimmell, Mus. Bac., and the organist Mr. S. Neville Cox.

THE fifth competition of Sunday School Choirs connected with the South-west Auxiliary Sunday School Union, was held on Monday evening, May 28, in the Vestry Hall, King's Road, Chelsea, the Rev. J. Forster, LL.B., presiding. The competing choirs were the Markham Square Choir (Conductor, Mr. Patten) and the Westminster Chapel Sunday School Choir (Conductor, Mr. W. H. Beach). The choirs sung alternately, first a piece of their own selecting; then a piece chosen by the judges, and next a test piece. The adjudicators, Messrs. Bonifacio, Griffith, and Sampson, highly commended the singing of the Westminster Choir, but awarded the banner to the Markham Square Choir.

THE members of the St. George's Glee Union gave their 173rd monthly Concert, at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 1st ult., when a good miscellaneous programme was well rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Bessie Diamond, Miss Susie Fenn, Miss Belval, Mr. C. W. Small, Mr. W. C. Burridge, and Mr. F. C. Bevan; Miss Edith Mahon contributing a pianoforte solo. The part-songs performed by the choir, included "The Cough and Crow" (Bishop), "Hunting Song" (Benedict), "The Bells of St. Michael's Tower" (Stewart), and "Allegiance we swear" (Bishop), the solo in the latter being ably sung by Miss Nellie Watts. Mr. F. R. Kinkead presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

THE Hackney Choral Society gave its opening Concert at Morley Hall, Triangle, Hackney, on May 26, when Mr. James Thomson's work "The Lady of the Lake" was performed for the first time in London. The composer presided at the organ, and Miss M. L. Harris at the pianoforte. The solos were well rendered by Miss M. Warner and Mr. C. Prickett. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. The Misses Annie Williams and Ada Robertson were very successful in their songs, and Mr. C. Roberts gave a couple of violin solos. The choir, numbering about sixty voices, was under the direction of Mr. T. H. Warner.

MISS ADA HAZARD's first Pianoforte Recital took place at the Royal Academy of Music on May 30, when she gave evidence of a cultured style and versatile talent in a well-selected programme, including the compositions of Bach, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schumann, Sterndale Bennett, Sir G. A. Macfarren, and Walter Macfarren. Miss Hazard elicited genuine and well-deserved applause by her excellent rendering of Sir G. A. Macfarren's Sonata in G minor, a work which was highly appreciated by the audience. Miss Clara Samuël and Mr. Arthur Thompson were the vocalists, and Mr. H. R. Rose was an able accompanist.

MISS FRANCES SMITH, a promising pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, gave a Matinée Musicale on Saturday, May 26, at 31, George Street, Hanover Square, by kind permission of Mrs. William Playfair. In her rendering of Sterndale Bennett's Trio in A major, Chopin's Barcarole, and a new Toccata in F major, by Arthur O'Leary, Miss Smith proved herself an excellent pianist, and her reception was warm and well deserved. Miss Robertson, Miss Ehrenberg, and Mr. Shakespeare contributed some effective vocal music, and Messrs. F. Ralph and Woolhouse assisted in the Trio and played a solo each. Mr. Arthur O'Leary was the Conductor.

THE Preston Choral Society announces for the season 1883-4 a series of four high-class Concerts, in the order and upon the probable dates named: Berlioz' "Faust" or Mendelssohn's "Elijah" early in November; Handel's "Messiah" at Christmas; a Chamber Concert of classical music in January or February, 1884, and a miscellaneous Concert, with an important new work, in March, 1884. During the season it is hoped that the following artists will appear: Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Miss Orridge, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. Charles Hallé. The orchestra will be occupied by members of Mr. Charles Hallé's band; Conductor, Signor Risegari.

THE degree of Doctor of Music, Honoris causa, was conferred upon Mr. C. Villiers Stanford at a Congregation held at Oxford, in the Sheldonian Theatre, on the 14th ult. In the unavoidable absence of the Rev. Sir F. A. G. Ouseley, Bart., Professor of Music to the University, Mr. Stanford was presented by Mr. C. H. Lloyd, M.A., B. Mus., Organist of Christ Church. We sincerely congratulate this eminent artist upon an honour which he has so legitimately earned.

AT St. Barnabas' Church, Bell Street, Marylebone, on the feast of the patron saint (the 11th ult.), Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was sung by the choir of the church, assisted by that of All Saints', Margaret Street, under the direction of Mr. W. S. Hoyte. Mr. Hoyte, who is the Choirmaster of the church, presided at the organ, and Dr. J. F. Bridge conducted.

A SERIES of Organ Recitals has been given by Mr. W. M. Sergison at St. Peter's, Eaton Square, on the Wednesday afternoons of the past month, after each of which collections have been made for the Organ Completion Fund, £250 being still required. The effect of the organ, however, is at present seriously detracted from by its unsatisfactory situation; it is to be hoped that this fault may at no very remote date be remedied. Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" will be sung, but without orchestral accompaniment, at the afternoon service on Thursday next, the 5th inst., the octave of St. Peter's Day.

The fine organ in Salisbury Cathedral has at last received what it has long needed—namely, a case. This work has just been effected, at a cost of nearly £1,000, from designs prepared by the late Mr. G. E. Street, R.A. To those who sympathise with such a laudable expenditure of money we venture, unasked, to commend an exactly similar want which at present exists in the neighbouring Cathedral of Chichester. The case of the present organ, which only needs a small outlay to make it a very fine instrument, was destroyed by the collapse of the spire twenty years ago, and has never since, owing to lack of diocesan funds, been replaced.

An evening of Chamber Music was given on the 1st ult., in the Lecture Hall of the Lewisham High Road Congregational Church, by Mr. W. Byrom, assisted by Mr. T. Carrington (violin) and Mr. P. Kleine (violinello). The programme, which was admirably rendered, included Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 10, No. 2; Spohr's Duo-Concertante, Op. 95, for pianoforte and violin; Mendelssohn's Variations Concertantes, Op. 17, for pianoforte and violinello; and Reissiger's Pianoforte Trio, Op. 85. The vocalists were the Misses Sampson, R.A.M. Mr. W. H. Sampson, B.A., conducted.

The members of the St. Mary's Choral Society gave a most successful Concert on Thursday, May 31, in St. Andrew's Hall, Balham, in aid of the choir fund of St. Mary's Church. The first part of the programme consisted of Hiller's "Song of Victory," which was exceedingly well rendered. Miss Minnie Gwynne was the solo vocalist. The second part was miscellaneous, the vocalists being Miss Gwynne, Mr. E. Bryant, Mr. G. Bassett, Mr. T. Powell, and Master Miller. Violin and pianoforte solos were contributed by Miss Clara Titterton and Mr. Kempling. Mr. Walter Skeen conducted.

A CONCERT was given at the City of London School, Victoria Embankment, on Wednesday evening, the 20th ult., by the Students of the Guildhall School of Music. There was a large attendance, including the Lady Mayoress. The programme was a good one, and the manner in which the students performed the pieces allotted to them testified to the careful training given by their professors. There were several recalls, but the only encores were accorded to Miss Clara Dowle, who has an excellent soprano voice, and Mr. Sydney Beckley, an exceptionally good baritone. Mr. Weist Hill, the principal, conducted.

The fifteenth Annual Report of the Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society offers congratulations to its members on the conclusion of an exceptionally prosperous season. The performance of Gounod's "Redemption" at the first Concert, in November last, was so successful that the Committee recommend it for the opening Concert of next season. At the second Concert "The Messiah" is to be given, and at the third it is suggested that the services of Madame Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé shall be secured, the programme to include Gade's "Psyche" and some other short work.

The Festival of the Army Guild of the Holy Standard was held on Tuesday evening, the 5th ult., in St. Paul's Cathedral, the Gregorian Association being, as on the previous festivals of the Guild, responsible for the musical portion of the service. Some few members of the band of the Coldstream Guards materially enhanced the musical effect of the service; and a wise discretion was exercised in the selection of Farrant's "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake" for the anthem. The remainder of the music does not call for special notice. Mr. C. Warwick Jordan was the organist.

The Dulwich Grove Choral Society gave a Concert in the Lecture Hall, Dulwich Grove, on the 5th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of a selection from "The Messiah," the solos being ably rendered by Miss Maud Cameron, Mrs. Charles Edwards, Miss Joyce Maas, Miss M. Horton, Messrs. C. A. White, R. Shill, and Duckett. The second part consisted of songs, glees, &c., in which the above-named artists took part. The Concert proved a great success, and was well attended. Mr. W. H. Hook conducted.

MR. EDMUND ROGERS gave a Concert at Steinway Hall on Thursday, May 24, when his Cantatas "Blue Beard" and "Beauty and the Beast" were performed. The solos were well rendered by Miss Adela Vernon, Miss Winthrop, Mr. Henry Taylor, and Mr. Frederic Penna, and highly appreciated by a large audience, several of the numbers having to be repeated. The Cantatas were conducted by the composer, who was warmly applauded at the conclusion of each work. Mr. Charles T. Corke was an able accompanist.

MISS AGNES BARTLETT, pupil of Liszt, reappeared in public, after a long illness, on Friday evening, the 15th ult., when she gave a very successful Pianoforte Recital at the Alexandra Hall, Blackheath. The programme included works by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Rameau, Chopin, Raffi, and Liszt. Miss Bartlett is gifted with a good touch, which combines great strength with extreme delicacy. Miss Carlotta Elliott was the vocalist, and contributed songs by Schubert and Schumann in a refined and sympathetic style.

An Organ Recital was given by Dr. Charles Joseph Frost at Christ Church, Newgate Street, on the evening of the 25th ult. The programme included works by Eberlin, C. E. Stephens, J. Baptiste Calkin, Dr. Westbrook, Gigout, Frost, and Morandi. The choir sang Macfarren's Anthem "O Holy Ghost," Sullivan's arrangement of "The Son of God goes forth to war," and two other hymns.

We regret to announce the decease of Mr. John Dunne, Doctor of Music of Trinity College, Dublin, which took place at his residence, Ashton, Killiney, on the 7th ult. He was formerly a member of Worcester Cathedral choir, and left that place to accept the post of Vicar Choral of the Cathedral, Dublin. Dr. Dunne was the author of several musical compositions, and was personally much respected.

A FESTIVAL of parish church choirs in the diocese of Bath and Wells—the first, we understand, for eighteen years—is to take place in Wells Cathedral on the 12th inst. More than 1,500 voices are expected to take part in the service. Those who know the smallest of cities will be able to imagine what a stir the meeting is likely to create.

A BALLAD Concert was given at Wellington Hall, Upper Street, Islington, on Monday, May 28. The vocalists were Misses Bessie Webber, Ethel Harwood, and Minnie Kirton; Messrs. Clinkscales, S. Ratcliff, and W. H. Mason. Mr. E. C. Robinson contributed a violin solo and Miss Willcocks ably presided at the pianoforte. The programme was well rendered and much appreciated.

In consequence of the success attending the May Day performance of the Bethnal Green Choral Society, the Concert was repeated on Thursday, May 31. Madame Clara West gave an effective rendering of the solos in Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and Macfarren's "May Day," and Miss Lottie West was very successful, her songs being encored.

H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT has, through Sir Howard Elphinstone, intimated his acceptance of the Presidency of the Epping Forest Musical Society, whose meetings are held at the Royal Forest Hotel, Chingford. The Lord Mayor of London has also consented to act as one of the Vice-Presidents.

At a meeting held in the Guildhall, Exeter, on May 28—the Mayor of Exeter (S. Jones, Esq.) presiding—it was resolved to take measures for the foundation of a Devon Scholarship at the Royal College of Music, and a large sum towards this object was subscribed in the room.

At the Festival of the London Church Choir Association, which takes place at St. Paul's Cathedral in the autumn, a new Service (Magnificat and Nunc dimittis), written for the occasion by Mr. C. E. Miller, Organist of Lambeth Parish Church, is to be sung. Dr. Stainer has promised to compose an anthem for the Festival.

ORGAN Recitals have been given during the past two weeks at the International Fisheries Exhibition, South Kensington, by Mr. G. Augustus Holmes. The programmes have included compositions by Mendelssohn, Handel, and other masters, and a new March by Mr. Holmes.

The organ in St. Paul's Cathedral is about to be cleaned, an operation which will necessitate its silence for several weeks, during which period use will be made of the small chancel organ, placed for the purpose immediately west of the choir stalls on the northern side.

The Epping Forest Choral Association held a festival in St. Alban's Abbey, or rather Cathedral, on Saturday, the 9th ult. The voices, which numbered about 400, were reinforced by a few wind instruments, and conducted by Mr. Walter Latter.

At a recent meeting held in the Washington Hotel, Glasgow, it was resolved to take steps for establishing a Glasgow branch of the Tonic Sol-fa College, and a committee was formed for the purpose of furthering this object.

His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury has accepted the office of President of the College of Organists, a position held by his predecessors in the Primacy from the foundation of the institution.

The London Gregorian Choral Association held a Festival at St. Alban's, Holborn, on the evening of St. Barnabas' Day, the 11th ult., Mr. C. Warwick Jordan presiding at the organ.

THE Dominican Church at Haverstock Hill was opened last month, on which occasion Gounod's "Messe du Sacré Cœur" was sung. Mr. Bowen presided at the organ, built by Messrs. Willis and Sons.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE's sacred Cantata "Philippi" will be performed at Newcastle, on the 25th inst., by Mr. Ions's Choir, consisting of between 300 and 400 voices. The composer has been invited to conduct.

A SUM of £1,000 was realised for the Royal College of Music by the Morning Performance at the Lyceum Theatre, on the 14th ult.

WE are requested to announce that Mr. J. E. Fimister, Organist and Precentor of St. Peter's Church, Walton-on-the-Hill, Epsom, has resigned on account of ill-health.

THE Silver Medal of the Society of Arts has been awarded by the Council to Mr. A. J. Hipkins for his lecture on the history of the pianoforte, read on the 7th of March.

REVIEWS.

Lakmé, Opéra en trois Actes. Poème de MM. Edmond Gondonet et Philippe Gille. Musique de Léo Délibes. [Paris: Heugel et Cie.]

THIS work was produced at the Opéra-Comique in April last, and is playing now, concurrently with M. Saint-Saëns's "Henry VIII." at the Grand-Opéra. The two things run together, we are bound to add, with a difference. For all the fine music it contains, "Henry VIII." drags languidly through the season. On the stage it is not interesting, and when people go to the great house, they do so to look at the ballet and admire the scenic effects rather than for a higher purpose. "Lakmé," on the other hand, shows real vitality. It is sought after for its own sake as congenial to public taste, and has certainly raised the status of the composer in French eyes. We may add here the names of the artists by whom the work was first interpreted: Mlle. Van Zandt played Lakmé; Mlle. Frandin, Mallika; Mlle. Rémy, Ellen; Mlle. Molé, Rose; Mlle. Pierron, Mistress Bentson; M. Talazac, Gerald; M. Cobales, Nilakantha; M. Barré, Frederic; and

M. Chennevière, Hadji. All these proved from the first equal to their task, while the talk of the town has run upon little Miss Van Zandt's impersonation of the Indian maiden.

By the way, "Lakmé" is an orthographical error, there being no such word in Hindoo nomenclature, which, however, contains one very like it, and one so commonly used that in any group of Indian girls a large proportion would answer thereto. But we may truly ask here, "What's in a name?" Besides, our French neighbours have a genius for misquotation in this respect.

The least-informed reader knows that an opéra-comique contains more or less of spoken dialogue, which serves to expose the motives of the plot, as the lyrics set to music serve for the expression of feeling. Not having a copy of the drama before us, we cannot give the scenes in detail, nor is it possible to convey an idea of the composer's orchestral efforts from a pianoforte score containing very few indications of the means employed. These disadvantages should be borne in mind throughout the following remarks.

The Prelude may be passed over lightly. It has the dramatic significance which arises from the anticipation of themes prominent in the body of the work, but its musical interest is very small. What has become of the operatic overture? And is our abandonment of the practice which has given us so many orchestral masterpieces a sign of progress? If so, we are, for once, sorry to have advanced. The epoch of "Fidelio," "Der Freyschütz," and "Oberon" was, in this respect, good enough for us.

The action opens at daybreak in the garden of an Indian temple, where Nilakantha is priest, and Lakmé, his daughter, the chief of the sacred maidens. A crowd of people enter and sing a quasi-religious chorus in unison, the composer here showing an early resolve to use as much "local colour" as possible, while the priest, giving the people his blessing, improves the occasion by railing at "nos vainqueurs," upon whom he invokes the vengeance of Brahma. He is at the climax of his tirade, when the voice of Lakmé, accompanied by harps, is heard from behind the scenes. The people prostrate themselves, murmuring an occasional response as the maiden goes on with her morning supplication. That the strain she sings is wild and fantastic may be gathered from the subjoined example:—

No. 1.

In this character, which perhaps would be very strange to Indian ears, lies the interest of the piece, and we are not going to call it in question, since faith is easy. The crowd, devotions performed, now go away repeating their chorus, and the scene ends. A short dialogue follows for father and daughter, in which the priest takes temporary leave of Lakmé, and confides her to her attendants, Mallika and Hadji. The music here has a graceful figure of accompaniment, but is otherwise not remarkable. Left together, Lakmé and Mallika contemplate the beauty of the river and gardens, and sing a very sentimental duet before getting into a boat and floating down the stream. The duet is quite French in character—extremely light and exceedingly pretty. Its rhythm (6-8) is flowing and well sustained; the phrases are vocal, and the accompaniment no more than sufficient to sustain the voices and fill in the harmonies. It ends well, moreover; snatches of the theme being heard faintly and more faintly, as the stream bears the singers away. The whole piece is a grand success in its unaffected and graceful manner. A party of "nos vainqueurs" now enter. They are Ellen, Rose, Mistress Bentson, and two young officers, Gerald and Frederic, the last-named of whom is rallied about some mysterious native maiden. The quintet carries on, à la Française, a good deal of discussion anent the comparative qualities of Indian and English women; but we need not stop to inquire into that, nor indeed to analyse the music, which is trivial. Presently we find Gerald alone in the garden, his purpose for some reason or other being to take a sketch of Lakmé's jewellery. The influences of the place soon affect him, and he begins to dream of the Indian maiden about whom his comrade raves. This of course prompts him to song, the air "Fantaisie aux divins mensonges" being the result.

The song is a good specimen of its class, and neither inane nor insipid. Its melody is symmetrical, and its structure quite formal; at the same time, the music has character, combined with much capacity of expression. As Gerald looks upon the jewels the two girls return, attended by the pretty theme of their duet, and the young officer watches them from a place of concealment while they busy themselves with the flowers and then move away to seek the shade of the tree. Lakmé lingers behind her companion. She feels a strange mysterious influence. She weeps without knowing why, and is happy without an intelligible reason. All this she tells herself in a Recitative and Andante, asking at intervals the question "Pourquoi?" The Andante, accompanied by muted violins and little else, is both pretty and simple. At its close, Lakmé perceives Gerald, but when Mallika and Hadji answer her cry of alarm, she puts them off with a trifling excuse and allows them to go away, herself remaining to face the intruder. A long duet follows. At first Lakmé is angry at the Englishman's sacrilegious boldness, but Gerald's words of passionate love arouse another feeling in her heart and make her willing to sacrifice to another god than that whose minister her father is. The music is capable of much expression, and therein lies its chief merit. Délibes here does not use elaborate means. His orchestration is simply accompaniment, and everything depends upon the force with which the singers endow his unaffected melodic phrases. We should add that the number has no recognised form, its various movements being determined by the character of the poetic text. At its close Lakmé sees her father returning and implores Gerald to fly. This, prudently enough, he does, and with his departure the scene ends. At the opening of the next scene Hadji shows Nilakantha and a crowd of Hindoos where some violator of the sacred enclosure has entered, while the old priest and the people cry for vengeance. This is about the shortest finale known to opera. It consists of just twenty-seven bars.

Passing over an entr'acte the substance of which recurs later, we see the curtain rise upon a busy market-place in a Hindoo city. Soon, also, we hear the inevitable market chorus—a bustling piece, in which the composer lays on what he conceives to be local colour with liberal hand. Mistress Bentson appears mixed up with the throng, and a good deal of action ensues of a more or less humorous sort. All this is outside the current of the story, together with the fête which follows. Here, of course, the ballet comes in, and we soon discover that M. Délibes can write characteristic dance-music with the facility expected when the composer is French. Of the three principal numbers the best, perhaps, is that called "Persian," a very ingenious and original Andante, in which the horn and oboe are alternately used as solo instruments. The dancers having gone away, attention is called to Nilakantha and Lakmé in the disguise of mendicants. The priest is hunting the intruder upon his sacred domain, and now addresses his daughter in an Andante air, essentially modern French in the character of its vocal theme and the sensuous richness of its accompaniment. He dwells upon his daughter's sadness, and promises that she shall soon smile again, using strains admirably adapted to express the depth of his paternal love and the strength of his religious zeal. When noting this, however, we cannot overlook the fact that something a little more original might easily have been conceived. Nilakantha now reveals the plot he has designed to catch the intruder. Lakmé shall sing while he watches for some sign of recognition between herself and the young Englishman who may come near to listen. Lakmé thereupon executes a fantastic cadenza; a crowd gathers, and Nilakantha announces the sacred legend of the Daughter of Parius. This is a somewhat lengthy scena, consisting of a number of fragmentary themes and a more developed Allegro, into which a bell subject pleasantly enters. The whole is in the showiest style of opéra-comique, and, indeed, has no other purpose than the display of "first-lady" gifts and graces. Musically its importance is small, while an almost continuous single or double pedal runs grave risk of wearying the ear by monotony. Lakmé's ditty at first produces no effect of the kind desired by her father, and he urges her to sing again. She has hardly recommenced when her eyes fall upon Gerald, and her voice falters. Nilakantha, watchful, urges her on. She continues singing; Gerald recognises her; he calls out her name, and the priest exclaims "That's he." But Lakmé perseveres with her song as well as she is able, while Frederic strives to restrain Gerald from any further act of indiscretion. All these incidents have a vigorous musical illustration, and the action is rapid, but a crisis is avoided by the passing of some English troops, headed by drums and fifes, who play a spirited and thoroughly English air, bearing no resemblance, however, to the "British Grenadiers." After these the crowd run, and Nilakantha proceeds to advance a stage nearer the end of his plot. Accordingly he directs a band of followers to separate Gerald from his friends by manœuvring in the throng so as to surround him, and make vengeance easy as well as certain. This episode is briefly treated, the men repeating in unison the phrases that fall from their leader. All then go away to carry out the design, leaving Lakmé in Hadji's care. We know, of course, what is to follow. Hadji has a soft heart, and Gerald finds no obstacle in him to the delight of a second interview with the Indian maid. This involves a duet, which Gerald begins with some of M. Délibes's favourite broad, simple, and measured phrases. Presently, however, the music becomes more impassioned and the rhythm less regular:—

This is the principal theme, though perhaps the most interesting part of the duet is an Andante wherein Lakmé, now wholly given over to love, speaks of a shelter in the forest, and invites Gerald to abandon all and go with her thither. He pleads honour and duty against the promptings of passion, and the situation is much strained when a religious procession approaches to end it, Lakmé praying Dourga to save her lover's life or take her own. The three-part processional chorus is one of the best numbers in the work, having unusual character and force; being varied, moreover, by the theme of a sacred dance. Amid this we do not care for the appearance of Mistress Bentson and her English, with their uninteresting chatter. They come, however, and serve as a foil to the graver business and more picturesque people. The crisis now draws near in earnest. Nilakantha's men surround the unsuspecting Gerald, and in the midst of prayers for the returning procession, the priest stabs him, but not to death. This is perceived by Lakmé, who remains near her wounded lover, and claims him as under her care. Hereupon the curtain falls. On the whole we must approve the second finale, but should like it better were Mistress Bentson and the other nonentities removed. The music is not wanting either in power or interest.

The second entr'acte embodies several now familiar themes, but especially that of the Andante from the duet wherein Lakmé describes the forest concealment to which she invites her lover. We are thus prepared for the place itself, as shown when the curtain rises. It is a bamboo hut in the depth of the wood, half hidden by foliage and flowers. There Gerald lies wounded, looked after by Lakmé and her faithful Hadji. At present he is asleep, lulled by the girl's voice as she sings a quaint love-song, "Sous le ciel tout étoilé." This piece acquires interest from the very distinctiveness of its character, though sometimes "local colour" is laid on recklessly. The melody, for example, begins in the dominant of the key (C minor), and is accompanied simply by a double pedal on the tonic. However, the simplicity of the music and its appropriateness to the singer and the situation give a certain charm, which easily meets with recognition. Gerald now awakes and endeavours to recall what has taken place. This is a good opportunity for the composer, who attends upon the recitative with passages from the music of the preceding act. Gerald then sings a Cantilene, "Ah! viens dans la forêt profonde"—a bit of truly French sentiment, that is to say, more affected than earnest—after which comes a pretty incident. As Lakmé speaks of converting Gerald to a belief in her gods, and of their living happily ever after, a chorus of female and tenor voices is heard from behind, the sopranos and first tenors singing a simple, characteristic melody in octaves, while the contraltos and second tenors, also in octaves, sustain a tonic pedal. The effect, though far from new, is good. Lakmé forthwith explains that the voices are those of happy lovers, who go to drink together of a sacred spring, in token of their union. The chorus re-enters, now combined with quasi-recitative for Gerald and Lakmé, who, at its close, go away for a while. All this is charming and idyllic enough for the most "gushing" taste. Those ridiculous English people now reappear, Miss Ellen, Miss Rose, and Frederic singing a trio, over which we pass to pick up again the thread of the story. Lakmé has returned to her lover. The flame of love burns brightly, and after an impassioned dialogue Gerald is about to drink of the cup which shall bind him to Lakmé, when he hears the roll of a drum, followed by the English martial air, and a chorus of marching soldiers. The voice of duty calls, and the soldier puts the cup from him, seeing which, Lakmé, in despair, eats a poisonous datura flower, following up this deed with a tender song, "Tu m'as donné le plus doux rêve." She then again presses the cup upon Gerald, who drinks, both joining presently in a duet which is really touching, pathetic music adding the effect of a pathetic situation. At its close Lakmé tells her lover that she is about to die, the duet thereupon resuming in more impassioned style. Now comes the finale. Nilakantha and his Hindoos surprise the lovers and threaten Gerald with death; Lakmé informs them what has happened, offers herself as an expiatory sacrifice to the gods, and dies singing a fragment of the duet "Tu m'as donné." The curtain then falls, as priest and people exclaim, "She has entered into the glory of the heavens." Obviously this last act is the best. The feeling of the music may not be very profound, but it is true and touching, and aids the strong human interest of the situation to produce a real effect.

The Opera as a whole can hardly be called a powerful work. It is too conventionally French, and too flimsy in character for the serious nature of the story. But a certain sentimental interest arises from it in volume more than sufficient to explain the success achieved in Paris. We shall probably see "Lakmé" performed in London in an Italian dress; because, with a good prima donna, the result is almost assured. Then it will be possible to discuss M. Delibes's orchestration, and that general effect of representation that cannot be discerned by ever so much looking at a pianoforte score.

Musique et Musiciens au XVIIe. Siècle. Correspondance et Oeuvre Musicales de Constantin Huygens. Publiées par W. J. A. Jonckbloet et J. P. N. Land.
[Leyde: E. J. Brill. 1882.]

THE Society for the History of Dutch Music (Vereeniging voor Noord-Nederlandsch Muziekgeschiedenis) has now been quietly carrying on for a number of years the valuable work of making known the stores of music which that nation produced in the great epoch of its history, the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The importance of the Low Countries as contributing to the development of vocal music, and especially of the madrigal, has long been known; (although the names of Adriano (Willart), Orlando de Lasso (de Lattre), &c., have suffered the conventional Italian modification. Recently, too, thanks to the publications of the Dutch Society, Sweelinck, hitherto little more than a name, has been brought into due prominence, and recognised as one of the founders, if not the founder, of the North German school of organists. The language, however, in which the publications are printed has doubtless proved a barrier to their extensive circulation. Even among Germans the Society appears to have but five subscribers. It is therefore a matter of congratulation that the beautiful volume before us is written in French; so that musicians will have no excuse for remaining ignorant of its exceptionally interesting contents. The book is a small quarto, printed in a manner worthy of the great Leyden printer, the successor of the Elzevirs; as to its scholarly character it is only necessary to allude to the fact that the editors are professors in the University of Leyden, the one distinguished as a master of Dutch literature, the other as an accomplished musician and musical antiquary.

The work is divided into two parts; the first containing so much of Huygens' unpublished correspondence as relates to music, the second being a reprint in modern notation of his extremely rare volume of songs, the "Pathodia Sacra et Profana Occupati," originally published at Paris in 1647. Written, as these were, for the lute, it was a task of no little difficulty to reproduce them in such a manner as to be capable of performance now-a-days. We think that Professor Land has successfully overcome the difficulty, although, perhaps, some may regret that he has not felt himself at liberty to fill in the harmonies of the bass. The songs themselves are mostly composed to verses from the Psalter, and in style are remarkable for the absence of commonplace. If but few can be said to deserve a pre-eminent rank among the productions in the same field of the seventeenth century, at the same time almost all are relieved from monotony by the boldness of the harmonies, and by the variety of the rhythms; and some are decidedly striking.

The general reader will probably turn with most pleasure to the introduction, which occupies more than three-quarters of the letter-press portion of the volume, and commences with a short memoir of the composer. Constantin Huygens, or Huyghens, was a brother of the famous natural philosopher, and belonged to a family of great note in the political history of the United Provinces. His long life (1596—1687) almost covers the golden age of Dutch literature and art—the age of Vondel and Rembrandt and Frans Hals; but Huygens was only a littérateur and musician in his leisure moments; his professional occupation was that of member of the Council of the successive Princes of Orange. And yet he found time to write and compose a great deal. He lost no opportunity of introducing his favourite subject in letters even of the most business-like character; and the circle of his correspondents includes nearly every French or Dutch musician of name, amateurs as well as professional musicians, and not a few in England and Germany. These correspondents, and indeed every person mentioned in the letters, who can by any stretch of imagination be brought into connection with music, are enumerated and described with all necessary detail in the second section of the introduction, where their own letters to Huygens are also printed, like his, from unpublished sources. This dictionary is by itself an invaluable store-house of information for the musical history of the time. The English reader will find matter of interest under the heads of Biondi, Jermyn, Killigrew (Killigrew), Ogle, Smith, Stefkens and Warwick. James I. is described as "naturally little addicted to music"; but Charles II., on the contrary, seems in some respects to have been a man after Huygens's own heart, not only on account of the musical library he collected at the Hague, but also as an aristocratic amateur like himself. As a supplement to the dictionary, we next have an excellent sketch of the state of music in Holland during the seventeenth century, with special reference to Huygens. It is a chapter in the history of music which has yet to be written with the completeness it merits. The outline in the present volume offers many suggestions and hints which will do good service in this direction; and the remarks about the downfall of Dutch national music, as coincident with the collapse of trained church singing, are both just as criticism and significant as a warning.

It would take us beyond the limits of a review if we were to venture into a detailed examination of this book. As we have pointed out, its great value lies in the fact that it is based almost entirely upon unpublished or inaccessible sources. The materials are placed before us in the most orderly manner, and they are enriched with copious notes, these too being in many instances drawn from authorities which we might seek in vain in England. It is indeed superfluous to do more than heartily recommend the work to students of musical history.

Song of the Little Baltung (A.D. 395). Choral Ballad. Words by the Rev. Charles Kingsley. The music composed by Alice Mary Smith (Mrs. Meadows White). [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

ONE of the great merits in the music of Mrs. Meadows White is that she considers the expression of the words of primary importance, and is consequently never tempted into a display of profundity where due effect can be obtained by simple means. In addition to this she always writes clearly and intelligibly both for voices and instruments; and in none of her works perhaps have these qualities been more evidenced than in the one now before us. The quaintness of Kingsley's verses suggests a quaintness in the music, which has been most happily caught by the composer; and we congratulate her upon following the very successful "Ode to the Passions" by a composition which will not only sustain but enhance her well-earned reputation. There is much character in the opening chorus, in E minor, the bold diatonic harmonies of which are in excellent keeping with the nature of the subject. The change into the tonic major for the baritone solo, the key being continued throughout the next chorus, and the following choral pieces—especially that in C major, commencing "He showed him his engines"—interspersed with baritone solos, carry on the story with true dramatic feeling, the accompaniments throughout being appropriate and unobtrusive. The duet for first and second tenor is welcome, not only on its own merits, but as a contrast to the music by which it is surrounded, the rest of the pieces being choral, with the exception of a baritone solo in E major and minor, an excellently written piece, most happily sympathetic with the dying words of the "Old Balt." It is announced on the title-page that the orchestral parts may be procured of the publishers—and we can imagine that the effect of the work will be much heightened by the colouring of the instrumentation—but even on the piano-forte the accompaniment will be found to give much force to the voices; and we cordially commend Mrs. White's latest composition to the attention of all Choral Societies in search of novelty. By the Lombard Amateur Musical Society its effect has already been most successfully tested in a public performance.

An Essay on the Construction of Flutes. By Theobald Böhm. Edited by W. S. Broadwood.

History of the Boehm Flute. By Christopher Welch, M.A., Oxon. [Rudall, Carte, and Co.]

THE history of the flute is, says Mr. Welch, in the preface to his work, "incomparably more varied and interesting than that of any other instrument"; and assuredly no other instrument has undergone so many changes, both as to its structure and its mechanism. In structure it was formerly cylindrical throughout; then it was fashioned in conical shape; and in its latest modification it consists of a cylindrical tube terminating at the upper end in a conical or parabolic prolongation (see Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," art. "Flute"). In regard to its mechanism, it possessed, in the time of its royal amateur Frederic the Great (for whom Quantz, we are told, composed 200 solos and 300 concertos) (Grove, ubi sup.), but one key (that for D sharp, Quantz subsequently adding another for E flat). Other keys were afterwards added, and in the year 1832 it possessed eight keys. In that year Theobald Böhm, a flute-player at Munich, brought out a new flute (since generally adopted) of which the holes, the fingering, and the disposition of the keys were so entirely altered that, as Mr. Welch remarks, the flute now in general use may be said to be a new instrument under an old name. The flute thus brought out by Böhm was, in its internal structure, the same as that of the old eight-keyed flute. In the year 1847 he invented the above-mentioned cylinder with parabolic prolongation; a contrivance which, as the writer in Grove's Dictionary remarks, "adds materially to the power of tone, and gives it a reedy quality closely approximating to that of the clarinet." Other advantages are mentioned by Mr. Welch, pp. 6 and 7.

The Böhm flute now in use differs therefore from the old eight-keyed flute in two essential particulars—(1) Its mechanism, or system of fingering; (2) Its cylindrical-conical structure. It is important to bear this in mind; for whereas the invention of its cylindrical shape with conical head is unquestionably due to Böhm, the invention of its system of fingering has been disputed, and has by many been ascribed to an amateur, one Captain Gordon, an officer in the Gardes du Corps of Charles X. (see Welch, passim; Berlioz "Modern Instrumentation," art. "Flute"; Grove's Dict., ubi sup.).

The work edited by Mr. Broadwood gives a very interesting and admirably written history of the Böhm flute. That written by Mr. Welch contains an account (as complete as one, we conceive, as is now obtainable) of the dispute as to the invention of the system of fingering.

It appears that in the year 1831 Böhm and Gordon met, and became acquainted, in London; both had for some years been endeavouring to improve upon the eight-keyed flute, and they showed each other what they had respectively done. In the year 1832, Böhm brought out his new (conical) flute; and it is alleged that he borrowed the idea of it from Gordon. As M. Coche (Professor of the Conservatoire at Paris, and by whom Gordon's cause was first espoused) roughly put it in a letter to Böhm, in 1838: "They say in musical society that the flute which bears your name was discovered by a person of the name of Gordon, an old pupil of Drouet." Whether there was any truth whatever in this allegation will probably never now be known. As a matter of antecedent probability, it is most unlikely that Böhm, who from his early youth had been a practical goldsmith and jeweller, possessed a genius for mechanism, and had already made several cleverly designed flutes, could have learnt anything new from a mere amateur (and apparently a clumsy one). But that his indebtedness, if any, to Gordon was of very insignificant amount seems to be conclusively established by the fact that in 1833 (the year following that in which the original Böhm flute was brought out) Gordon went to Munich, and remained there about nine months, availing himself of the use of a room in Böhm's house, and the assistance of his best workman. Surely, if the Böhm flute had merely been a modification of his own invention, he would, as Mr. Welch says, "at once have indignantly broken off all communication with Böhm, as a man who had shown himself capable of grossly abusing his confidence!" Moreover, when Gordon subsequently brought out what he called his "Flute Diatonique," he acknowledged (in an engraved scale he published with it) that part of his mechanism, which in fact contained the essential part of the Böhm system, was borrowed from Böhm's flute.

We commend these works to the attention of all flautists, as containing a most interesting and instructive history of their instrument.

The Communion Service. Set to music in the key of D. By Frank L. Moir. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE do not remember having seen any Church compositions before by Mr. Moir, but in another style he has proved himself to possess at least promising abilities, and in some instances he has been distinctly successful. As might be expected, the work under notice has a decided leaning towards the modern school of service-writing, and we may even go so far as to say that we think the line of demarcation between sacred and secular music has frequently been approached dangerously near, and more than once overstepped. For instance, in the Credo, at the words "Who for us men," we have a passage which necessitates a most undesirable repetition of words, and matters are not mended by the song-like and general light-hearted character of the phrase. The same remarks apply, though in a lesser degree, to the following page, "And was incarnate."

This is a point which our young composers might take well to heart, for every one will admit that Church music must be something more than beautiful—it must be devotional; otherwise, some day another Palestrina will have to purify and recreate a new foundation on which to rear a better and more fitting musical edifice. As to Mr. Moir's part-writing, it can scarcely be said to be of the purest kind. We must not be accused of judging from an academic point of view. We do not consider the fifths in the Credo (at the second and third bars in the bottom line of page 9, between alto and tenor) altogether objectionable, but there are later on octaves to which we do object, between the voice-parts and the accompaniment, and we are by no means impressed with the effect of the passage "And the third day." The short organ symphony at the bottom of page 10 has been more or less popular with composers since Beethoven first penned it in his Mass in C, but of late it has become an immense favourite, and we are beginning to think we have too much of even a good thing. The Benedictus is a pleasant and effective number. The Agnus Dei will no doubt be much appreciated, though the whole of the early part is strongly suggestive of a well-known song by Schubert. We should like to call the attention of those who may be performing this service to the third bar from the end of the Agnus Dei, where some little alteration will be found necessary. The early part of the Gloria is also in spirit much allied to a great work which we believe is known to almost all lovers of music. The latter part of the Gloria, however, beginning at "For Thou only art Holy," is really effective and good.

Researches into the Early History of the Violin Family. By Carl Engel. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

In a brief but appropriate preface to this work, Mr. A. J. Hipkins says: "The author of this book has gone to his rest before the last revision of it. How little had been left for consideration or change is shown in that I have added only four foot-notes to the text." To all who know with what care and earnestness the distinguished antiquarian who has left us this valuable legacy invariably worked, this will be a matter of no surprise; for he accepted nothing upon trust without boldly acknowledging the source of his information, and was not likely, therefore, to throw much responsibility upon those who edited his posthumous publications. As an example of this we may mention that in the work before us the opening chapter deals with the subject of "Available Evidences," and here the author, speaking of the manner in which writers leap to conclusions without troubling themselves to test the accuracy of their statements, says, "the usual attempt of our musical historians to explain the characteristics of the ancient Hebrew instruments from the representations on the Arch of Titus may reasonably provoke a smile, considering that the Arch of Titus was erected about fifteen hundred years after the time of Moses." Indications such as "the middle ages," or "medieval," he also says, are thoroughly unsatisfactory, as, considering the immense space of time included in the "middle ages," it is absolutely necessary to name distinctly the period in which an instrument described was in popular use, in order to convey information which can be of any real value. In a work of such elaborate research, all those who desire to become thoroughly masters of the subject upon which it treats will find ample material for the purpose; whilst the mere cursory reader will derive much pleasure as well as profit from tracing the pedigree of an instrument to which he has often listened with so much delight. When we say that the fiddle-bow, the crwth, the crowd, the rotte, the chrotta, the rebec, the geige, the fiddle, the vielle, and the viol have each a separate chapter in which the origin and history of these instruments is treated of at length, the scope of the work may be readily imagined; and we need but add that not only the facts, but the manner in which these facts are laid before the reader, should attract all lovers of the "Violin Family" to this volume. The many excellent illustrations scattered throughout the book materially add to its interest, and a copious index renders reference to any subject extremely easy.

Ho, every one that thirsteth. Anthem for Bass Solo and Chorus. By George C. Martin. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE Sub-organist of St. Paul's Cathedral seldom puts pen to paper till he has something to say which is worth the saying, and then he says it in a fresh and original manner peculiarly his own. If, therefore, in the productions of his pen we are wont to look for some pleasant deviations from the too well beaten tracks, we shall certainly not be disappointed in the Anthem now before us, his latest addition to the Church's library. Free from any servile imitation of the style adopted by the older writers for the Church, and from the formalities of what we may perhaps call the cut-and-dried school to which many composers, particularly Church composers, of the present day still adhere, there is yet nothing in the work that need alarm the admirers of the perfectly orthodox, nor are there any of the cacophonous displays sometimes locked upon as and mistaken for the music of the future.

The Anthem opens with a Bass Solo, or perhaps we should say Recitative, in the key of F sharp minor, towards the end of which a modulation is made to the dominant major (C sharp), and after a half-close on a chord of the seventh on the last-named note, eight bars of melody in the tonic major (F sharp) for the solo voice to the words of the 3rd verse, of the chapter (Isaiah lv.) "Incline your ear," &c., repeated by the chorus, follow. A return is then made to the opening theme of the Anthem in which the basses lead off, the other parts entering at regular intervals according to the laws of imitation, and a recitative for the solo voice leads us to the sub-tonic (E major), in which key the melody already used for the words "Incline your ear" is repeated, the final cadence being interrupted and lengthened out, somewhat after the manner of the second chorus "Let the whole earth" in Wesley's anthem "Ascribe"; but we do not for a moment suggest that there is any melodic resemblance to that well-known work. A spirited and interesting chorus "Then ye shall go out with joy," in the relative major (in which key the Anthem closes) now follows, and immediately before its termination an episode of great beauty and grace (to the words "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle-tree") is introduced, after which, with a short coda of a page or two the Anthem concludes, the final chord of A major being sustained throughout four bars by the four-part chorus, while a second bass part, introduced for the purpose, furnishes a reminiscence of the theme "Then ye shall go out with joy," the Anthem thus finishing in an original and striking manner.

Throughout the work we can but be struck with the entire absence of the common but grave fault of subordinating the words to the rhythm of the music till the former become the mere vehicle and excuse for the latter; rather does the music appear (as in all truly artistic work) the natural expression and result of a careful and thoughtful study of the text. Musically speaking, although the Anthem is not elementarily easy, there are no difficulties which any ordinary choir, assuming one trustworthy bass voice be available, ought not to overcome with ease.

Thirty-three Studies. By J. B. Cramer. Arranged for violin solo by Ludwig Abel.

[Munich: Jos. Aibl. London: Novello, Ewer and Co.]

As a rule, studies written for one instrument do not adapt themselves well for another; but Herr Abel reminds us in his preface of the excellent arrangement of the celebrated Studies of Moscheles by David. In the publication before us each exercise is provided with some short remarks as to the method of practising it; and as these observations are printed in four languages—German, English, French, and Italian—the work should obtain a world-wide celebrity with violinists.

Dr. Stainer's Tutor for the American Organ.

[Metzler and Co.]

THE American Organ has now so thoroughly earned a high place in public estimation, not only by its purity of tone and capacity of expression, but by the excellence of its touch and power of combination with voices, that a cordial welcome will be accorded to a Tutor for the instrument by the eminent organist of St. Paul's. The author, in his preface, urges upon pupils the desirability of studying simultaneously the management of the stops, and the necessary training of the fingers; and for this purpose gives a description of the characteristics of the instrument, with simple progressive exercises for beginners, and a series of short pieces of various styles. The book is admirably arranged throughout; and although Dr. Stainer modestly expresses a hope that any shortcomings on his part will be overlooked by those who remember that he is, to some extent, "the pioneer of a comparatively untrodden path," we are convinced that those who follow him upon his journey would find it extremely difficult to procure a more reliable or more experienced guide.

Autumn. Part-Song. Words by Thomas Hood. Music by W. Morrison. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Hood's verses have here received an appropriate and melodious setting. The harmonies are simple but thoroughly musician-like throughout, and the voice-parts flow smoothly and gracefully. There is but little attempt at more than a sympathetic union of the words with the music; but Mr. Morrison may at all events congratulate himself upon having successfully achieved the end he has evidently aimed at.

Bourrée, for the Pianoforte. By A. W. Sebastian Hoare. [W. Morley and Co.]

A BOURRÉE must be very good to command any attention at the present time; for so many specimens of these old dance-tunes are now published that we question whether there is much desire on the part of amateurs to add to their store, unless such distinctive individuality is shown in a composition of this class as to make it stand prominently apart from its companions. We cannot say that such is the case in Mr. Hoare's piece; but it is a good example of the Bourrée form, and has the merit of being exceedingly well written throughout.

La Mécanisme du Jeune Violoniste. A Complete and Progressive Course of Instruction for the Violin; in Four Parts. By Guido Papini. [Frederick W. Chanot.]

THE fact of this work having reached its second edition may be accepted as a proof of its usefulness. The increased and increasing study of the violin must render the demand for such able Instruction Books as the one before us fully equal to the supply; and in the interest of students we are glad to add our testimony to its merits. A feature in the book is the printing of all the explanations in French, German, and English.

Golden Rest. A Slumber Song. The words founded on a Poem of the Seventeenth Century. Composed by Arthur E. Grimshaw. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IN spite of the "Slumber Songs," both for voice and pianoforte, which surround us, Mr. Grimshaw's modest contribution to the stock should find favour, not only on account of its melodiousness, but for a certain gracefulness of treatment both in the harmony and the figures of accompaniment. The temporary interruption of the arpeggio for the repetition of the final line of each verse is a point worthy of commendation.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE sixth Silesian Musical Festival took place at Görlitz during the early part of last month. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," with which the Festival opened, was splendidly performed; and amongst the other works given Schubert's C major Symphony, Handel's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," and Raff's Cantata for pianoforte, chorus, and orchestra deserve special mention. Financially the Festival was, like its predecessors, unsuccessful, and it is only in consequence of the interest taken in the undertaking by its founder, Count Hochberg, a distinguished amateur, and the composer of several operas and other works, that the Festival can be continued.

The Leipzig Bach Society gave an interesting Concert on May 27, in the Gewandhaus. A feature in the programme was a selection of old English madrigals by Dowland, Wilbye, and Morley, which were faultlessly executed, and created much enthusiasm. The principal item was Bach's "Dramma per Musica," entitled "Der zufriedengestellte Aeolus," with new words written by Professor Voigt, of Königsberg. This fine composition of the great master is particularly interesting as showing Bach's dramatic power. The Concert concluded with the same composer's A minor Concerto for piano, violin, flute, and string orchestra.

The full-score edition of Mozart's works, undertaken by the famous Leipzig firm of Breitkopf and Härtel seven years ago, has recently been completed. It consists of fifty-three volumes, comprising 523 works, one-third of which had never before been published. A supplementary volume will contain the unfinished compositions. Many of those who took an active interest in the great undertaking have not lived to see its completion. Dr. von Köchel, who prepared the work by his invaluable thematic catalogue of Mozart's compositions, died soon after the first volumes were published; Julius Rietz and Franz Espagne (the musical assistant of the Berlin Library, where many of Mozart's manuscripts are preserved) died in 1877 and 1878 respectively; both had edited several volumes of the series. Amongst other distinguished musicians connected with this Mozart monument—a more valuable one than that which Vienna is about to erect for him—are Brahms, Joachim, Otto Goldschmidt, Spitta (the biographer of Bach), and Dr. F. Wüllner.

In connection with the recent meeting of German musicians at Leipzig, an interesting exhibition of musical instruments was held in that city. In the ethnographic section the instruments of South Sea Islanders, Japanese, Chinese, Siamese, Indians, Russians, Italians, Greeks, and Jews were represented. In the historic section, a grand piano of four octaves, by Schiedmayer (1773); a clavichord-cymbalum d'amour with two manuals, by Silbermann (circa 1750); two lutes attributed to a Swedish instrument-maker of the sixteenth century, and other curious specimens were shown. The latest development of the same industry was represented by the "Adiaphon," a keyed instrument, the sounds of which are produced by means of tuning-forks of various sizes struck by hammers. The quality of the tone is said to be both sonorous and "ethereal," and, if the name does not promise too much, the "Adiaphon" has the invaluable quality of never being out of tune.

The German Parliament has passed the third reading of an International Copyright Treaty with France. The chief headings of the new Bill, as far as they bear upon musical and dramatic publications, are the following: 1. The registering of musical or literary works is no longer necessary, the mere depositing of a copy in the country of first publication being sufficient; 2. The right of translation is reserved to authors or publishers of both countries for ten years; 3. The unauthorised publication of arrangements of operatic airs or other extracts, &c., is finally prohibited in Germany, as it has been all along in France. The French papers point with legitimate pride to the fact that the Code Napoléon is the only law-book which places foreign and native authors exactly on the same footing.

We have received the prospectus of a new "General Richard Wagner Society," which has been formed at Nuremberg for the purpose of securing a triennial repetition of his music-dramas at the Festspielhaus in Bayreuth. The annual subscription for members is only four shillings, and it is hoped by the committee that all the existing old Wagner Societies will join this laudable enterprise. The Bayreuther Blätter (Wagner's own paper) is to be continued by the new Society, and will in future be published monthly.

The annual statistics of the Opera House in Berlin have just been published. We find that from August 23, 1882, to June 13, 1883, fifty-six works by twenty-nine composers have been performed. Only two novelties augmented the standing répertoire—viz., "Raimondin," by Perfall, and "Gudrun," by Klughardt—just as many novelties, by the way, in one year as Mr. Carl Rosa gave us in one month.

Mozart's "Idomeneo" has been revived at the Munich Opera House (for which it was originally composed), after a lapse of more than twenty years. Herr and Frau Vogel are said to have made an immense success in the principal parts.

We read in the Ménestrel that Herr Franz Rummel stopped, on his way from Berlin to London, at Neuwied, when his playing was so much admired by the Princess of Wied and her daughter, the Queen of Roumania, that he was presented by the latter with her own portrait. A few weeks previously Herr Rummel received a handsome diamond ring from the Grand Duchess Catherine of Russia.

The proposed revival of Gounod's first Opera, "Sappho," at the Grand-Opéra has induced both author and composer to subject their joint effort to a severe process of revision. Several alterations are contemplated, the most important of which is the addition of a fourth act, which M. Emile Augier, the librettist, has just completed. The experiment of engraving on a youthful attempt the work of maturer years is a dangerous one. M. Gounod, however, is too good a critic to spoil what is excellent, or to send into the world what cannot be made excellent by any process of mending or altering.

Gounod has been presented at Paris with a magnificent bas-relief, executed by Franceschi, in remembrance of a private performance of his chef-d'œuvre, "The Redemption," which took place on May 20, at the house of the well-known Parisian amateur Madame Fuchs. This work has obtained another immense success at Geneva, where it was performed on the occasion of a Festival given by the Société Musicale de la Suisse Romande. It is to be repeated in the same town, and by the same Society, early next winter.

The Italian opera at Paris, which has been defunct for several years, is about to be revived by some enthusiasts of the Italian school, who believe that the works of such modern composers as Boito, Ponchielli, and others will be sufficient to justify the revival of an institution which was once the most important item in the musical life of the French capital. It is rumoured that Signor Faccio, of Milan, the Conductor par excellence, is to wield the bâton, and that the Opera "Iago," which Verdi is supposed to be busily engaged in composing, will be the first work performed.

A statue, erected to Auber at Caen, his birthplace, was unveiled on the 10th ult. One of his most popular Operas, "The Crown Diamonds," the only Violin Concerto composed by him, and a great number of small instrumental and choral works formed the programme on this occasion.

The Marquis d'Ivry, composer of "Les deux Amants de Vérone," is engaged upon a grand Opera, "L'Orfèvre du Roi," the subject of which is founded on Balzac's "Désespérance d'Amour."

A large theatre at Warsaw has been burnt down, fortunately without incurring loss of life.

Frau Reicher-Kindermann, one of the ablest and most celebrated interpreters of Wagner's music, died at Trieste on the 2nd ult., at the early age of thirty years. She was the daughter of a favourite bass singer in Munich, and her career as a prima donna was most successful. Germany has lost in her one of the most promising stars of the modern operatic stage. Our London readers will remember her as a prominent member of the company which performed Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring" at Her Majesty's Theatre last year.

Professor Carl G. P. Grädener, a great authority on the theory of music and one of Hamburg's most renowned teachers of composition, died at that town on the 11th ult., at the age of seventy-one. Dr. Hugo Riemann has been appointed his successor.

Professor Wilhelm Krüger, the well-known composer, and editor of Handel's pianoforte works, has died at Stuttgart at the age of sixty-two years.

The death is also reported of Charles Wehle, a clever pianist, and composer of some very popular drawing-room pieces.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—During the several years that I have taken THE MUSICAL TIMES I do not remember ever having seen what I conceive to be a practical suggestion for the improvement of Congregational Singing in Parish Churches, more especially those churches in which a Choral Service is adopted. The subject is one of vast importance, and capable both of division and sub-division. Let me first state some of the principal objections to Choral Services, and then, if possible, offer a remedy. In churches where the psalms are chanted it is desirable, in order to relieve the monotony of the ordinary chant, to have chant services to the Canticles (Te Deum, &c.). As an objection to this arrangement it is urged that the congregation cannot join in them with freedom, hence in such a case the singing of the choir becomes nothing more or less than a "performance," which ought as far as possible to be avoided in public worship. This however, may be remedied by the Chant Service in use being repeated for several successive Sundays. Then again as regards the Psalms, it is impossible for the general congregation to join in singing them, because they do not properly understand the system of pointing, and in a dozen different churches where the Psalms are chanted the chances are that a dozen different systems of pointing will be detected. I will now endeavour to explain a simple and effective remedy. To illustrate my plan let me suppose the case of a new church about to be opened, where a choral service is to be adopted. We often hear of the S.P.C.K. Society, I think, making grants of prayer-books and hymn-books (not to be taken away) for the use of the congregation. The Psalter to be used being decided upon, let some society interested in the promotion of Choral Services (no matter whether they be Anglican or Gregorian) make a grant of Psalters (words only) for the use of the congregation. Let also the clergyman publicly invite the congregation to at least a dozen or two general practices at which the Organist or Choirmaster shall carefully explain the general working of the Psalter, laying stress on the distinct pronunciation of the words, and then I think a large majority of the congregation would join in the singing with ease and pleasure to themselves, and one of the chief objections to choral services in parish churches would be effectually removed. I am quite aware how imperfectly my subject has been dealt with, but if any good should ultimately arise, my efforts will not have been in vain. Hoping some abler pens will place the matter in a clearer light,

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

THOMAS E. EXLEY.

Smisby, Burton-on-Trent, June 15, 1883.

THE COMPOSER VINCENZE MARTIN, OR MARTINI.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In Grove's excellent "Dictionary of Music" only one composer Martini is mentioned, namely Giovanni Battista, known familiarly as Padre Martini. How could so eminent an authority as Dr. Grove overlook Vincenze Martini, the friend of Mozart and the composer of the Opera "La Cosa Rara"? (Vide "Don Giovanni," last scene, which contains a snatch from this famous work, as Leporello points out!) Vincenze Martin, or Martini, also called Lo Spagnuolo, was born in 1754, at Valencia, Spain. He set out for Italy in 1781, where his Operas became popular, notably "La Cosa Rara" which created quite a furore. The other Operas, "Lilla, or Beauty and Virtue," and "L'Arbore di Diana," have altogether disappeared from the continental stage. That such should be the fate of "La Cosa Rara," considering its intrinsic worth, is greatly to be deplored. Lorenzo da Ponte, who wrote the libretto of the immortal "Don Giovanni," furnished the composer with the text. The subject is identical with that of Conradin Kreutzer's "Nachtlager zu Granada." Mozart spoke highly of the work, as well as other musical contemporaries, themselves composers of note. Martini shared the favours of the Emperor Joseph II. with Mozart, Cimarosa, Paësiello, Haydn, and others. After residing three years in Vienna, he left for St. Petersburg, where he died in 1810. Can you inform me whether this composer was related to Padre Martini?

Your obedient servant,

CHARLES KROLL LAPORTE.

Birkdale, Southport, June 18, 1883.

the Anthem was Handel's "Zadock the priest," the hymns being selected from various sources. The whole of the service was very satisfactorily rendered, giving evidence of careful training and reflecting great credit upon the Conductor.

ST. LEONARDS.—An Evening Concert in aid of the Building Fund of the new nave of St. John's Church, Upper St. Leonards, was given at the Assembly Room on the 14th ult. The choral music was excellently rendered, and solos were contributed with decided success by Miss Matilda Roby, Messrs. Herbert Schartau, Arthur Thompson, W. G. Forington, L. T. Walton, Edward Collins, F. J. Gordon, L. C. Walton, and C. T. Johnson; Master Walter Oakshot taking the solo part with much effect in two choral pieces. There were several encores, and the Concert was in every respect highly successful. Mr. Fountain Meen presided at the pianoforte and played a solo.

SIDMOUTH.—The Choral Society has recently presented its Conductor with a handsome coffee tray, bearing the following inscription: "Presented to H. A. Harding, Mus. Doc., Oxon., on the occasion of his marriage, by the performing members of the Sidmouth Choral Society, in grateful recognition of his services as Conductor for the past ten years."

SOUTHESEA.—The members of the St. Jude's Choral Society gave the last Concert of the session at the Portland Hall, on Thursday, May 24, under distinguished patronage. The first part of the programme consisted of Gade's Cantata Convito, which was excellently rendered. The solo vocalists were Mrs. G. Coles, Miss Ashburner, Miss E. Francis, and Captain Auld. Mr. G. S. Lohr conducted, and the accompanists were Miss Starkey, Miss Francis, and Mr. R. H. Lohr. At the conclusion of the Concert the members of the Society presented their Conductor, Mr. Lohr, with a handsome case of knives and forks. The presentation was made by the Rev. C. R. Tompkins.

TOTTENHAM.—On Thursday evening, the 7th ult., an excellent Concert of Sacred Music was given in the High Cross Congregational Church, under the direction of Mr. J. J. Harrison. The principal vocalists were Mesdames Clara West, Lottie West, Woodruff, Evans, Etherington; Messrs. Weston, Fisher, Smith, Webb, Oram, and Master Russell; the choruses being sung by the choir of the church.

TROWBRIDGE.—The Concert season terminated on May 30, with a very effective performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea by the members of the Musical Union, numbering over 100 performers. The soloists were Madame Lita Jarratt, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. W. Thomas (Bristol Cathedral). The band was led by Mr. W. Millington and conducted by Mr. H. Millington. Mr. H. Millington is giving a series of Organ Recitals at the Parish Church during the summer months.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. James M. Preston, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Thomas's Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Mr. Hugh Swanton, to St. John's, Portland, Canada.—Mr. W. Moreton Hand, Organist and Choirmaster to the Church of the Ascension, Lavender Hill, S.W.—Mr. G. M. Fisher, Organist and Choirmaster to Christ Church, Barksland.—Mr. Edwin Allwright, Organist and Director of the Choir, All Saints, Forest Gate.—Mr. Carl Riechelmann, Organist and Choirmaster to Marylebone Presbyterian Church.—Mr. Chas. O. M. Philips, to St. Chads, Haggerston.—Mr. C. A. Hodgkinson, Organist and Choirmaster to Christ Church, Bexley Heath.—Mr. C. C. Caird, to Llandewi Skirid Church, near Abergavenny.—Mr. Frank Ketcher, to Hawarden Parish Church, Chester.

PAULINE D. TOWNSEND

Three Volumes, Cloth,

With Five Portraits, and Preface by George Grove, D.C.L. Price £1 11s. 6d

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

THE TIMES.

"Mr. Grove, in his brief and able preface, calls the publication in an English dress of Otto Jahn's famous biography of Mozart 'an event in our musical history,' and his statement cannot be considered an exaggeration. . . . The English public is to be congratulated upon a translation of his monumental effort which may without exaggeration be called excellent. Miss Townsend has done her work with skill and conscientiousness, and we doubt whether a much more careful comparison with the original than we have thought it necessary to undertake would discover many, or any, serious blunders."

DAILY NEWS.

"He (Jahn) has made admirable use of Nissen, with his laborious compilation, and of all other authorities, and he has succeeded in producing a work which is complete without being confusing through excess of detail, and in which the interest of the narrative is not broken by undue reference to other writers who, treating of the same points, have treated them differently and often incorrectly. . . . The work has been well translated, and it is prefaced by a brief but interesting introduction from the pen of Mr. George Grove."

THE ATHENÆUM.

"It is with great pleasure that we are able to speak in terms of the highest praise of the manner in which Miss Townsend has acquitted herself of the by no means easy task of translation. In so voluminous a work as the present it is almost inevitable that a few slips should be found; but those that we have noted are not only extremely rare, but mostly of slight importance. . . . We have done inadequate justice in this review to one of the most important works in the whole domain of musical literature; our excuse must be the absolute impossibility of dealing fully with it within reasonable bounds. We conclude by most cordially recommending it to all who are interested in music, and need only add that the printing and general appearance of the volumes are worthy alike of their contents and of the reputation of the firm which publishes them."

SECRETARY—MR. A. W. WHITE.

REGISTERED OFFICES—180, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

PROSPECTUS.

The Directors believe that, notwithstanding the activity of private publishing firms, full provision in some particulars has not even yet been made for the growth of the national musical taste, and that a large field of operations is open in facilitating the publication of meritorious works by young and unknown musicians. To secure so far as possible against the issue of music that would be unworthy of public attention, a jury of three musicians will examine works offered for publication, which will be accepted or otherwise according to the verdict of these judges. Inasmuch as the profits of the music trade are large, which is evident from the high financial position of many members of the trade, the Directors have every confidence that the profits arising from this branch of their business alone will be sufficient to pay a good and increasing dividend.

The Company, being desirous of meeting the requirements of the large number of persons who very justly complain that the present high price of pianofortes places the attainment of a really good instrument quite beyond their reach, have determined to supply for cash genuine pianofortes which for volume of tone, quality of touch, solidity of construction, durability, and finish compare most favourably with the productions of the best makers both English and foreign, and at prices which have never before been attempted. This they will be enabled to do by supplying the instruments direct from their factory at first cost, and as they will supply for cash only it is obvious that purchasers dealing with the Company will save the amount usually added for credit, middle profits, and bad debts. The prices at which these instruments will be sold will range from 10 to 40 Guineas, and as this tariff will inevitably command a large sale, and is sufficiently remunerative to yield a fair profit, a considerable and safe income from this branch of the business may be relied upon.

The General Agency Branch of the Company's operations (which will comprise the business usually carried on by Trade Protection Societies, including the collection of debts, and the transaction of all business in any way connected with the Music Trade and Profession), although it will not occupy the most prominent position therein, will doubtless contribute largely to the Company's returns. The number of Subscribers to the Trade Protection Department may, at a low estimate, be fairly taken at 250 for the first year, and if each subscriber only gives debts to the ridiculously small amount of £150 to collect, the commission at £5 per cent. on the total amount, together with the subscriptions of members, will produce an income of upwards of £2,000; to which of course must be added the profits on the manufacture and sale of musical instruments, sale of music, the engagement of vocalists and instrumentalists, the management of concerts, &c.

The services of Mr. Thomas Ward have been secured as Managing Director, and the Company will thus reap the advantages of his large and varied experience and extensive connection with the music trade and profession.

It is proposed to call up 10s. per share only in the first instance; viz., 5s. on application and 5s. on allotment. Two clear calendar months' notice will be given of future calls.

Applications for shares to be made to the Secretary, at the Offices of the Company, accompanied by a remittance of 5s. per share. If no allotment is made, the amount paid on application will be returned in full.

HOW TO LEARN TO PLAY THE PIANO WELL. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF.

Extract from a letter from the Professor at a large Training College: "I have sixty-seven pupils under my care, and it is marvellous with what rapidity they have progressed since I adopted your little manuals on 'How to Learn to Play,' and 'Playing at Sight.'"

"Here, in the compass of fourteen pages, is matter calculated to produce better results than half a dozen years' teaching."

Second Edition. Price 1s.

THE ART OF PLAYING AT SIGHT. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF.

"The author believes his system to be infallible; after a fair trial, we must say, we believe so too."

"The coveted art of 'playing at sight' may undoubtedly be acquired under this system."

"It is somewhat strange that no author has ever advanced this plan for reading at sight before."

Just published. Price 1s.

LITTLE DIFFICULTIES WHICH OCCUR IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING, ILLUSTRATED AND EXPLAINED. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF.

"There is a fund of wealth in this little manual. The different and varied characteristics of turns, shakes, beats, the art of phrasing, &c., are concisely explained and illustrated, besides which there is a good deal of valuable information on other subjects, of which the majority of players know little or nothing."

Important to all who are anxious to become thorough Musicians and first-class Performers on the Piano.

Just published. Price 2s. 6d.

BOOK I. of Herr A. HOERING'S GRAND METHOD FOR THE PIANOFORTE on an entirely new principle. The chief characteristic feature of this method is that the entire Theory of Music, including Harmony and Musical Composition, is taught and practically applied to Pianoforte playing in a systematic course of 120 lessons (contained in six books). Moreover, the art of learning to play every musical composition, as it is taken in hand by the students, from memory, is taught in a course of about sixty lessons (Books 4–6). The whole course will contain over 100 pieces, in systematic gradation from the easiest to the most difficult, selected from the best and most popular compositions of the great composers. No musical student ought to be without it, as it is a great advance upon all former methods and pianoforte tutors, which this new method is sure to supersede in course of time. Book 1 will be sent post free for 30 stamps by the Author, Herr A. HOERING, 1, Cambridge Road, Teddington, or may be ordered from the publishers.

London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

PHILIPPI

A SACRED CANTATA OR CHURCH ORATORIO

THE WORDS BY THE

REV. J. POWELL METCALFE

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

F. E. GLADSTONE

Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Octavo, Paper cover, price 2s. 6d.

"Dr. Gladstone having intended his work for church use, we expect to find the music solid in character, sober in expression, and liberally contrapuntal. In this we are not disappointed. . . . Firmness and tricky effect would be out of harmony with the spirit of English church music, and Dr. Gladstone has avoided both with indisputable success. . . . There is abundance of talent in the work."—Daily Telegraph.

"Dr. Gladstone's music to the words is learned and clever without being abstruse or unvoiced; on the contrary, the several numbers are so written as to bring their own interest both to the singers and to the hearers. . . . With a view to enlisting the sympathies of those who listen to music for the immediate effect it produces, or for its apt association with words, Dr. Gladstone has contrived his design most ably. It may, therefore, be recommended to the consideration of church choirs and choral societies with every confidence."—Morning Post.

"The composer expresses his thoughts in a clear and pleasing manner. The voice parts are soberly and effectively written."—Academy.

"The purely religious style of Dr. Gladstone is admirably suited for the subject he has chosen; for although throughout the Cantata he has most sympathetically coloured the incidents of the narrative, in no part has he been betrayed into an ultra-dramatic setting of the events which would in the slightest degree unfit the work for the sacred locality which should be its natural home. . . . We heartily welcome so excellent a specimen of church oratorio as the one now under notice."—Musical Times.

It is proposed to add the other six, as referred to in the CANTICLES NOTED, SECOND SET; and to publish the nine in one 8vo. vol., as soon as a sufficient list of purchasers can be secured. The friends of the Editor, and all persons interested in the cultivation of the Canto Fermo, and Canto Figurato, of true Church Music, are requested to send orders for the work to Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., without delay. The price will be 3s. 6d., and the work will be published as soon as warranted by the encouragement thus afforded. N.B.—About 350 copies must be sold to cover the cost of publishing at the price named above.

THE HOLY CITY

A SACRED CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.
"A good sound musical work this 'Holy City' is. I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The Holy City" is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

NEW PART-SONG. PRICE 3D.

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

This Part-Song, written for, and dedicated to, the Kyrie Society, is laid out in Mr. Gaul's very best manner, and while recalling, for its beautiful effects, his elegant Part-Song, "The Silent Land," the resemblance begins and ends there. Mr. Gaul knows to the very letter the capabilities of the voices he writes for, and one is perfectly safe, even after a single experience only, in predicting a widespread popularity to "The Children's Hour."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

THE ORGAN WORKS

JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH

EDITED BY

J. F. BRIDGE AND JAMES HIGGS,
Mus. Doc., Oxon. Mus. Bac., Oxon.

BOOK I.—EIGHT SHORT PRELUDES AND FUGUES.
PRICE 2s. 6d.

In this edition much help is offered toward a correct and effective rendering of Bach's Organ Music. The distribution of the parts between the two hands is clearly shown. The notes most conveniently played by the right hand are printed on the upper, and those best taken by the left hand on the lower, of the two manual staves. The pedalling is indicated where necessary. Marks of expression and phrasing are added occasionally, and suggestions for the effective use of the organ are given throughout. The preface contains many useful hints.

BOOK II.—PRELUDES, FUGUES AND TRIO.
Price Three Shillings.

The second book of the new edition of Bach's Organ Works is more advanced in point of difficulty than the first, and will be found of conspicuous interest. It includes the well-known "Giant" in D minor, the shorter Prelude and Fugue in E minor (a great favourite with Mendelssohn), and an exceedingly effective Prelude and Fugue in C minor, in addition to other less-known but important works. It is a specialty of this edition that a convenient and effective mode of performance is everywhere indicated. Appended to the preface is a suggested metronomic rate for each movement.

SPECIAL NOTICE FOR THE NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION.

FORSYTH BROTHERS have great pleasure in drawing attention to the New and Enlarged Edition of Charles Hallé's "Practical Pianoforte School." A great desire having been expressed that Mr. Hallé should make Sections 1 and 2 more extended, he has added sixteen New Numbers, consisting of Airs and Melodies arranged by himself, three Pieces written expressly at his request by Stephen Heller and Ferdinand Hiller, and other favourite works. He has also enlarged and re-arranged the Pianoforte Tutor, making it the best and most useful Tutor ever published. The first three Sections have been re-engraved in the same improved style as Sections 4 and 5, making the whole work uniform, and as complete as the best engraving, printing, and paper can make it.

PREFACE TO THE NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION.

THE great success of the "Practical Pianoforte School" having made it necessary to engrave new Plates, I have taken the advantage of it to correct the few misprints which, in spite of the utmost care, had crept into the former Edition; and, in compliance with the suggestions received from many eminent Teachers, have considerably enlarged the First and Second Sections, earnestly wishing that the usefulness of the work may thereby be still further increased.

E. PAUER'S

BIRTHDAY BOOK OF MUSICIANS AND COMPOSERS.

Cloth, gilt edges, 3s.; Leather, gilt edges, 4s.

THIS elegant little book contains upwards of 500 dates and places of the births and deaths of the most celebrated, influential, and popular Composers, Singers, Instrumentalists, Musical Historians, Archaeologists, Authors, and Critics, with a short account of their lives and reference to their chief works. In the place of poetical extracts, used in the well-known Shakespeare, Tennyson, Longfellow, or Scriptural Birthday Books, more than 450 brief but highly interesting paragraphs are given, so that every day of the year may be musically associated with an unusual amount of information in a compact and agreeable form. These 450 paragraphs have been carefully selected from the biographies, letters, and essays of the most celebrated ancient and modern Musicians and Authors of England, France, Germany, and Italy, and illustrate every phase and feature of Musical Art. This little book is at once a useful and practical book of reference and a highly valuable book of information. A carefully prepared table of contents facilitates the finding of the respective dates, while its elegant appearance and convenient size especially recommend it as a useful, attractive, and acceptable gift.

CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of

LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."

SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).

PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).

MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

A system of construction which, by a careful application of scientific principles, Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have brought to great perfection, is now generally acknowledged as the only one calculated to render the Piano almost impervious to the deleterious influences of damp and extremes of temperature, while it stands better in tune with one-fourth of the usual tuning—a most important consideration where tuners are not readily obtained. The inestimable advantages thus secured are augmented by an increased power and purity of tone hitherto unattainable in the Upright Piano.

A selection from numerous testimonials will be a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the Pianos manufactured by this Firm:—

The Pianettes manufactured by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.—Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Opera.

I consider that Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. Their Pianettes are specially deserving of notice in being remarkable both for their cheapness and general excellence. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,

English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Brackly Villa, Dulwich.

I have on several occasions selected Pianos from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, and have great pleasure in stating they have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate.

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, R.A.M.

THE LONDON MUSIC PUBLISHING AND GENERAL AGENCY COMPANY LIMITED.

THIS Company has been formed for the purpose of assisting unknown and young musicians in obtaining the publication and introduction of their works to the public; the Directors believing that, notwithstanding the activity of private publishing firms, full provision in some particulars has not even yet been made for the growth of the national musical taste, and that a large field of operations is open in facilitating the publication of meritorious works. To secure, so far as possible, against the issue of music that would be unworthy of public attention, a jury of three musicians will examine works offered for publication, which will be accepted or otherwise according to the verdict of these judges. Communications and MSS. to be addressed to the Secretary.

The Company also being desirous of meeting the requirements of the large number of persons who very justly complain that the present high price of pianofortes places the attainment of a really good instrument quite beyond their reach, have determined to supply for cash genuine pianofortes which, for volume of tone, quality of touch, solidity of construction, durability, and finish, compare most favourably with the productions of the best makers, both English and Foreign, and at prices which have never before been attempted. This they will be enabled to do by supplying the instruments direct from their factory at first cost, and as they will supply for cash only, it is obvious that purchasers dealing with the Company will save the amount usually added for credit, middle profits, and bad debts. The prices at which these instruments will be sold will range from 10 to 40 Guineas.

EPPS'S COCOA.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by the careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage, which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maldies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette. Prepared by

Members of the Musical Profession and Trade are requested to apply to the Inventor and Patentee for Drawings, full and explicit Explanation, also prices of this, the only,

PATENT ACTION

FOR ATTACHING

Organ Pedals to Pianofortes.

J. AINSWORTH

Inventor and Patentee of the above, also Sole Proprietor, begs to draw the attention of the musical profession and trade to the fact that (having access to the finest and most improved machinery of the present day) the workmanship of Pedals and Action supplied by him is that which is sure to command favour.

PRICES OF PATENT ACTION AND ORGAN PEDALS:

A.O. Set of Straight Pedals and Patent Action,
£6 15s. 0d.

B.O. Set of Radiating Pedals and Patent Action,
£7 15s. 0d.

C.O. Set of Straight Concave Pedals and Patent Action, as recommended at the Organ Conference,
£7 15s. 0d.

D.O. Patent Action only,
£4 4s. 0d.

EXTRA for IMPROVEMENT, on above prices, whereby the Organ Pedals can be Disconnected, Removed, and Replaced Instantly,
15s. 0d.

SPECIAL C.O.

Special C.O. A Set of Straight Concave Pedals and Patent Action with all improvements complete, price £12. Those who desire a really SPLENDID SET OF C.O. PEDALS should procure the Special C.O. They are made from solid Mahogany throughout, highly French polished, of superior finish, and altogether give a most pleasing and desirable appearance in a good room. The Unparalleled Success which has attended Ainsworth's "The only Patent Pedal Action" is due to its superiority and the fact that it fully supplies a long felt want—viz.,

A PLEASANT AUXILIARY FOR ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS ABSOLUTELY FREE FROM ANNOYANCES.

Ainsworth's Patent Pedal Action and Organ Pedals should be recommended by every member of the Musical Trade and Profession who desires to recommend a Perfect Action and first-class Organ Pedals of superior finish. Unlike other Actions it is perfectly Noiseless in working, has convenient and thoroughly reliable adjustments, Brass adjusting Pins, Brass Screw Eyes, Sliding Mahogany Levers, Bushed Mahogany Guides throughout, Noiseless Cushions, Mahogany combination Nuts and Brass Screw Eyes for Backfalls and Levers, Instantaneous adjustment for Backfalls, allows the pedals to be drawn away and replaced at pleasure. Pedals can also be disconnected instantly. Ainsworth's Organ Pedal Action is in full favour amongst those who desire a first-class set. They are well made and of neat construction. Special attention is also given to the touch, the Springs being adjusted to an equality by a new process which ensures an accuracy hitherto unattained.

TESTIMONIAL.

"Mr. Ainsworth,

"Dear Sir,

"I was exceedingly pleased with the inspection of Pedals and action you kindly invited me to at your establishment previous to purchasing a set for one of my pupils at Burnley. I am now glad to say my pupil is highly pleased with them, and I must confess that the Pedals are much less noiseless in working than any I have seen. The Patent Action I consider a model of perfection, and I feel sure it will establish itself as the Perfect Pedal Action for Pianofortes. Several organists have made inspection and express themselves thoroughly satisfied. The disconnecting movement is most simple and useful, and the removal of pedals being instantaneous is a very desirable accomplishment.

"I remain, yours truly,

"JAMES JACKING,

Organist, Parish Church, Padham."

BY HER MAJESTY'S ROYAL LETTERS PATENT

GRANTED TO
WM. CHINNOCK DYER
1882.

Letters Patent from the French Government have also been received by the inventor.

Members of the Musical Profession and Trade are requested to apply to the inventor and Patentee for the Drawings, full Explanations, and Prices of this the latest and most improved

PATENT ACTION FOR Attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte

WHICH ACTION HE HAS, AFTER CONTINUED STUDY, BROUGHT TO PERFECTION, AND GAINED THE APPROVAL OF HER MAJESTY'S COMMISSIONERS OF PATENTS.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE says:—

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. WM. CHINNOCK Dyer's Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ.

"It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils."

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, is easily attached to any Pianoforte.

Set of Straight Pedals (30 Notes, C to F), with Patent Action, £ s.

Set of Straight and Concave Pedals (30 Notes, C to F), as recommended at the Organ Conference, with Patent Action, price 7 15

Those who already have a set of Pedals can be supplied with the PATENT ACTION only, price £4 4s.

ADDRESS—WM. CHINNOCK DYER,
INVENTOR AND PATENTEE,
WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

To show the popularity gained by this invention, and the way it is making in the houses of organists and students, the last Patent Action sent out previous to March 1 was numbered 2,024; that it will be seen that the turn-out for six months as above will give a total of over 4,000 per annum.

Extract from testimony by E. H. Turpin, Esq., of College of Organists, referring to organ at St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, S.E.:—

"To Messrs. Hele and Co. very high praise is due for the judgment and skill with which they have accomplished the rebuilding of the instrument. All the foundation work I notice to be round, even, and admirably voiced. The 'chorus' struck me as being well balanced and decisive, without being intrusive or too pronounced above the 8-ft. work. The reeds are of very high quality, at once rich and characteristic in tone. The solo registers I found to be after their several types—delicate and finished in quality of tone and in their voicing. The mechanism throughout a trying night's work never failed me, and it is everywhere true, reliable, and admirable. My impressions were so pleasant, that I feel it is a duty to express an unqualified approval of the labours of the very able organ builders."

THE POEM WRITTEN BY WILLIAM GRIST

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

A. C. MACKENZIE.

Octavo, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s. Vocal parts, 1s. each. Full score and wind parts, MS. String parts, 16s.

TIMES.

"Mr. Mackenzie is in every sense a modern composer. There is in his music no trace of the slavish imitation of Mendelssohn which, for years after the death of that great composer, impeded the progress of any national or independent growth of musical art among us. . . . How the composer has accomplished his task of illustrating the action I cannot for the present explain at such length as the music deserves. I may, however, say in summary fashion that Mr. Mackenzie's 'Jason' contains more clever writing and more genuine inspiration than are to be found in any English Cantata produced during recent years, with the sole exception, perhaps, of Mr. Cowen's 'St. Ursula.'"

Octavo, paper cover, 1s. 6d. Vocal parts, 6d. each. Full score and wind parts, MS. String parts, 6s. 6d.

STANDARD.

"There is revealed in the Cantata so much power, and such a command over the means of musical expression, that 'The Bride' will endure, not only for its own sake, but as an earnest of the able work which we may confidently look forward to from the same pen. . . . The brightly scored and spirited bridal march and chorus were immensely encored."

DEDICATED TO HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS OF WALES.

PSYCHE

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

COMPOSED BY

NIELS W. GADE.

Octavo, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s. Vocal parts, 2s. each; string parts, 15s. 6d.; wind parts, 23s. Full Orchestral Score, £1 10s. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Its music from first to last was intelligible, and charged with the grace and beauty of the school that, having had Herr Gade as a pupil, now claims him as a professor. . . . From beginning to end we are conscious of that happy union of the classic and the romantic which Mendelssohn and Schumann, each in his degree and manner, so conspicuously illustrate. . . . I cordially endorse the enthusiastic verdict of the Birmingham audience, for, though Herr Gade's Cantata does not achieve the oft-times questionable feat of marking 'a new departure,' it is a thing of beauty that should live long to be a joy."

ABRAHAM

AN ORATORIO

COMPOSED BY

BERNHARD MOLIQUE.

Octavo, paper cover, 3s.; paper boards, 3s. 6d.; scarlet cloth, 5s. Full score, 60s.; orchestral parts, 50s.; chorus parts, 15s.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"'Abraham' comes to us a second time with perfectly intelligible and graceful speech; moreover, it is the speech of a master who knows the spirit as well as the form of his artistic language, and can commend himself to the mind as well as the ear. Every number in 'Abraham' vouches for this, and it will be a marvel if the reward of so much merit does not come sooner or later in full measure."

DAILY NEWS.

"It was a step in the right direction to revive an artistic work which has long been unjustly ignored, and which offers to welcome a contrast to the immature and crude manufactures which under the name of novelties so often pass as compositions in these days."

STABAT MATER

FOR SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

COMPOSED BY

ANTON DVORÁK

Paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth gilt, 4s. Full score, 45s.; orchestral parts, 30s.; vocal parts, 5d. each.

TIMES.

"Dvorák's setting of the beautiful old hymn holds its own by the side of its numerous predecessors, identified as these are with some of the most famous names in the history of Italian art, ancient and modern. . . . Besides being adapted to its purpose, Herr Dvorák's music is full of melodious beauty and invention. Melody indeed is its breath of life, and we do not wish to say anything derogatory to the Bohemian composer's merit by owning that Rossini's famous setting of the 'Stabat Mater' was more than once recalled to our minds during the progress of the performance. It need scarcely be added that Dvorák's conception of his subject is infinitely more earnest and reverent than that of his famous predecessor. . . . To sum up, Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' is undoubtedly an original effort of great power, all the more worthy of notice at a time when the clever repetition of musical platitudes is too frequently mistaken for genuine inspiration."

THE SUN-WORSHIPPERS

A CHORAL ODE

The English words adapted from the French of DELAVIGNE by

C. N. SCOTT.

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

A. GORING THOMAS.

Price 1s. 6d.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"The music is bold and free in structure, modulating with frequency, sometimes into remote keys, and changing its rhythm and style at the bidding of the poetry. But this freedom does not convey an idea of licentiousness. Its purport is, for the most part, clear, and its propriety, seeing that genuine musical interest is conserved, unquestionable. . . . Mr. Thomas should be encouraged to persevere. He has a charming fancy and an elegant pen, and both are needed in the higher walks of musical art."

THE PASSIONS

AN ODE FOR MUSIC

BY

WILLIAM COLLINS

SET TO MUSIC BY

ALICE MARY SMITH

(Mrs. MEADOWS WHITE).

Octavo, paper cover, 2s. Full score and wind parts, MS.

String parts, 9s. 6d.

ATHENÆUM.

"A work of great merit, and quite worthy of its position in a festival programme. It should prove an exceedingly useful addition to the repertoire of Choral Societies."

THE SHUNAMMITE

A SACRED CANTATA

COMPOSED BY

GEORGE GARRETT

Octavo, paper cover, 3s.; chorus parts, 8d. each; string parts, 14s.

Full score and wind parts, MS.

MORNING POST.

"The merits of the Cantata are many, and will appeal most successfully to those who are content with the most expressive of a series of musical ideas represented with all respect for the laws of form and order. There is no unhealthy striving after the impossible and the undesirable; all is legitimate and musicianly."

PHILIPPI

A SACRED CANTATA OR CHURCH ORATORIO

THE WORDS BY THE REV. J. POWELL METCALFE

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

F. E. GLADSTONE

Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Octavo, paper cover, price 2s. 6d. Full score and orchestral parts, MS.

MORNING POST.

"Dr. Gladstone's music to the words is learned and clever without being abstruse or unvoiced; on the contrary, the several numbers are so written as to bring their own interest both to the singers and to the hearers. . . . It may, therefore, be recommended to the consideration of church choirs and choral societies with every confidence."

PREFACE.

This work is here given in its complete form, namely, in Three Parts:
Part I.—For Little Players.

Part II.—For more Advanced Players.

Part III.—For more Matured Players.

The last part, though composed some years later than the others, was designed by Schumann as a sequel to them, and is therefore necessary to complete the series, which is one of progressive difficulty intended to promote the development of the mental and technical powers of the Student.

Some misunderstanding as to the form and extent of the "Album for the Young" has arisen through former English Editions, which have omitted the Third Part, substituting the "Scenes of Childhood" (Kinderscenen), Op. 15. This is, however, an entirely distinct work, and is therefore now issued in another Vol., which also contains a set of short detached pieces entitled "Album Leaves," Op. 124.

A source of great inconvenience to students and players is the want of uniformity in the signs used to express fingering. In England the thumb is represented by t, whereas, on the Continent and in America it is marked 1; the figures 1, 2, 3, 4 have a different meaning in an English edition from that which they have in a foreign one, a discrepancy which cannot but cause embarrassment, especially in reading new music. The advantage of having only one set of figures in general use is obvious, and as it cannot be expected that the mode recognised by a majority of countries will be altered to that which is used in England alone, it seems inevitable that what is called "foreign fingering" should ultimately prevail.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. have therefore decided on the important step of adopting this mode (that is, 1, 2, 3, 4 instead of t, 1, 2, 3, 4) in their future publications, and it is accordingly introduced in this edition.

London, July, 1883.

AGNES ZIMMERMANN.

EIGHT HARVEST HYMNS

Words by Rev. S. CHILDS CLARKE; Music by Dr. DYKES, DEAN ALFORD, Mr. LANGRAN, and the Editor, Mr. A. H. BROWN.

Price 2d.; words only, 2s. per 100.

"The hymns, which include a fine Processional, are excellently written, and as suitably set; and if music is ever to win its way, will assuredly become great favourites at harvest festivals. They vary considerably in metre; but gladness and thanksgiving are the twin keynotes of all."—Western Morning News.

"A very excellent set of hymns, and most suitable for country parishes."—Church Times.

"The tunes are much in the current vein of thought, pleasant, tuneful, and having a part-song flavour. Nos. 1 and 3, by the editor, are fresh and effective, and No. 5, by the same composer, is elegant in its melody, and smooth in its harmony. No. 6, by that man of many accomplishments, Dean Alford, has a not unpleasant flavour of mixed antique and modern thought. Mr. Langran's (No. 4) a plain note against note tune, will be found to sing well. Dr. Dykes' (No. 2) is elegant and melodious, and set in the quasi-ecclesiastical measure six-four, a time borrowed by the church from an early period of modern dramatic music. The tunes will not fail to please modern choirs."—Musical Standard.

"We would specially draw attention to the unusually good common metre tune 'St. Angelus,' No. 5, which might well pass for a composition of 250 years ago."—Church Herald.

PROSPECTUS.

The above will comprise musicians of all ages and countries—composers, singers, instrumentalists, theorists, &c.—including many now living. That a work of this nature is pressingly wanted in England cannot be doubted, the last work of any moment upon the subject being a "Biographical Dictionary of Musicians," published about 1824, in two octavo volumes treating of some seven or eight thousand names, and having sketches of about one hundred English musicians then living. Much space was, however, in some cases devoted to people who are now forgotten, while composers of sterling merit were omitted or dismissed in a very few lines; and there were many errors committed in regard to names and dates, several of which were the means of misleading Fétis and other writers. It is hoped that while this little volume will be sufficient to satisfy the desires of that large class of amateurs who merely wish for a little information, more eager students will be stimulated by its perusal to consult some of the larger works upon the subject. In conclusion, the Editor begs to say that he has for upwards of thirty years been compiling material for this work, and as he has paid particular attention to chronology, he trusts it will in some measure supply a long-felt want.

OLD IRELAND

A COLLECTION OF ANCIENT IRISH MELODIES

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY THE
AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN"
THE SYMPHONIES AND ACCOMPANIMENTS BY BERTHOLD TOURS

Price 2s. 6d.

PREFACE.

Some years ago I found, among the Petrie Collection, many rare and beautiful Irish airs, to which from time to time I wrote words. The result is the present publication.

Mr. Berthold Tours has, in his symphonies and accompaniments, done exactly what should be done with national melodies—namely, as little as possible. For Irish music, simplicity is the truest art.

Being myself an Irishwoman, my work has been a work of love; hoping to sing—not sermonise—to the English heart a tenderer feeling towards Old Ireland. I prefer to dwell, not on the faults, but the virtues of my people; their domestic purity, their strong affections, their innate loyalty, courage, and fidelity; also, last, not least, their indomitable gaieté de cœur, which implies neither hardness, shallowness, nor selfishness of heart, yet enables the Celtic nature to tide over trouble in a way which the more sombre Saxon can hardly understand. If I can do this, I shall go on singing. Thus taking up Thoms Moore's harp, I may lay it down, as he did, with his own farewell words—

"I was but as the wind passing heedlessly over,
And all the wild sweetness I waked was thine own."

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AUGUST 1, 1883.

THE LONDON MUSICAL SEASON.

By HENRY C. LUNN.

It could scarcely be expected that the exceptionally active musical season of 1882 would be repeated in 1883, yet it was believed by many that some portion of the German element which formed so important a feature of that eventful year might return to us, so that those music-lovers who consider the welfare of the art rather than the nationality of the artists should find sufficient variety in the surrounding attractions to enable them to exercise the right of choice. With the exception of the Richter Concerts, however, we have during the past season adhered to the usual routine which was temporarily disturbed last year; and, but for the brief season of English Opera under the management of Mr. Carl Rosa, we should have been reduced to one Italian Opera House, with all those conventional characteristics which seem invariably to cling around this exclusive temple of fashionable art. But although the year has been comparatively dull, some good may arise from the fact, for it has given us leisure to think, and already we hear signs of dissatisfaction at the existing state of things. Rumours of German Opera and German Concerts for the coming season are abroad, and that these rumours will be speedily confirmed may be tolerably well assured, for it is not likely that we shall rest content with more than one such season as we have just passed through. We cannot say how long a certain aristocratic section of the public will continue to support the Italian lyrical establishment over which Mr. Gye has this season reigned supreme, but we are thoroughly convinced that its life cannot be ensured by removing all kinds of competition. The Italian Opera, like every other institution, must be in accord with the times, and if the musical education of the people should lead them towards another and a higher form of lyrical drama, whatever exertions may be made to prevent it, the supply will most unquestionably keep pace with the demand.

A very few observations will suffice to chronicle the events of the season at the Royal Italian Opera. The lessee, in abolishing the pit, has entered a protest against the notion that any appeal should be made to such lovers of music as cannot afford to pay for an expensive luxury. We do not blame him for this, in view of the enormous terms which he is compelled to lavish upon popular vocalists; and as the "luxury" to which we allude consists in the admiration of a favourite prima donna, it is quite certain that it must be paid for at a high rate. True to his mission, then, Mr. Gye has this year put forth a list of sopranis almost unexampled in former seasons. Certainly he has produced but one novelty, Ponchielli's "Gioconda," but the prestige of the establishment has been thoroughly maintained, and the subscribers are, we presume, satisfied. Amongst the new-comers, Mme. Durand takes first rank, both as an actress and a singer; and we must also accord warm commendation to the baritone M. Devoyod. Signor Battistini, another baritone, was only fairly successful, and the somewhat harsh voice of Signor Marconi, the tenor, will, we fear, prevent him from occupying the important position to which he evidently lays claim. Ponchielli's "Gioconda" has proved highly attractive. The revival of "La Gazza Ladra" brought us back to the old school of vocalisation, and displayed the voice and style of Mme. Patti to perfection; the well-worn operas to which we have been so long accustomed, however, evidently being more to the taste of the general audience. These works have been, on the whole, well supported, the tenor department being, perhaps, the weakest point in the company. The choir has been especially good during the season, the arduous duties of the conductorship having been ably discharged by Signor Beviniani, occasionally relieved by M. Dupont. It appears that the alliance between Messrs. Gye and Mapleson has been recently severed; but how this may affect the interests of the "Italian Opera Company, Limited," we cannot say. Should Her Majesty's Theatre reopen for Italian Opera next season, it is evident from what we hear that the two rival lessees will not be allowed to fight each other undisturbed by foreign foes.

Although Mr. Carl Rosa's season of English Opera at Drury Lane Theatre extended over only four weeks, the vigour displayed by the lessee rendered these few weeks the most memorable of the year. The production of two successful operas—both placed upon the stage with a completeness which cannot be over-praised—would alone justify us in pronouncing this one of the most remarkable seasons upon record in this country, but it must be remembered that very able performances of many other works were also given, and that in not one of these was there the slightest indication of haste or slovenliness in the preparation. Both Mr. Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda" and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Colomba" were operas of which we have a right to feel proud; but Mr. Mackenzie especially has set us a model which seems to have been warmly welcomed by those who feel that lyrical English works are in a state of transition. We have heard that Mr. Villiers Stanford is writing an opera for Mr. Rosa, and sincerely hope that we may also have new works both from Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Thomas; but, however the two last-named composers may add to their former successes, we trust that both "Colomba" and "Esmeralda" may form part of the répertoire of the season. Mr. Randegger has proved an efficient Conductor—Mr. E. Goossens, however, sometimes officiating—but "Colomba" has on each performance been conducted by the composer.

The system of raising a guarantee fund, adopted by the Philharmonic Society when its very existence was seriously threatened, appears to have been thoroughly successful, for this year the guarantors have not been called upon for any subscription. For the good it has effected in former years, this Society has nobly earned a right to the consideration of the music-loving public, which we are glad to see fully acknowledged; but it must be remembered that, as its fame was made by educating and not by appealing to the taste of the day, the same course of action must be continued in order to ensure its life. The vigour which has ruled its counsels for the past two seasons has not always been tempered with judgment, for novelty has often been put forth without regard to its worth; but it is difficult to rush suddenly into activity after many years of lethargy, and we may hopefully, therefore, look for wiser legislation in the future. The resignation of Mr. Cusins as Conductor opened an important question for consideration by the Directors of the Institution. Unfortunately, however, it has been hurriedly settled by the appointment of six "honorary" Conductors—a proceeding utterly at variance with the result of all experience on this important matter. We have nothing whatever to say against the claims of those elected; they are all excellent artists, and may prove excellent Conductors, but one alone should have been chosen. It is comparatively easy to "wield a bâton," but to make every member of a band feel with the Conductor a composer's meaning, and to inspire confidence as well as to enforce obedience, one ruling power is absolutely necessary; and, admitting this fact as the basis of deliberation, we have little doubt that the right person would have been found, and that the artistic success of the Society might have been dated from his appointment.

The Richter Concerts have been extremely well attended, and may now be said to have fairly gained a position amongst the London musical attractions. The modern German school has been satisfactorily represented in the programmes, but the works of Beethoven—notably his C minor and Choral Symphonies—have also had a place, and other eminent composers have not been treated with neglect. During the season we have had many new readings of the standard works, and to some of these we may perhaps in time get accustomed; but Herr Richter must not suppose that we will tolerate such alterations and interpolations as were introduced in the pianoforte part of Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, all of which we may reasonably presume had the sanction of the Conductor.

In our last year's summary of the musical season we announced with much regret the dissolution of the Sacred Harmonic Society. It is gratifying, therefore, to record that the Association has been reorganised as a Limited Liability Company, but not for profit, and that a series of Concerts has been given this season, under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Hallé. In proof that the works of modern composers will be included in the programmes of the Society, we may say that Gounod's "Redemption" was chosen for the opening Concert, the reception of this masterpiece solving at once the question as to the desire on the part of the audience to hear new compositions of undoubted merit. The manner in which the choruses were rendered in this and other works during the season augurs well for the future of the Association; and we sincerely trust that this new Society may worthily sustain the reputation of the time-honoured institution from which it derives its name, and to which the lovers of sacred art in this country owe a lasting debt of gratitude.

The resuscitation of Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, with Mr. Randegger as Conductor, was effected last year; but one Concert only was then given. This season four Concerts have taken place, at which the high character of the Choir, as far as the materials at present available will allow, has been satisfactorily maintained. It is perhaps to be regretted that solo instrumental and vocal performances should be so freely introduced; but part-singing, however good, evidently wants relief; and we can only hope, therefore, that, whatever may be the other attractions, choral music will be by far the most prominent feature at each Concert. Next year, no doubt, some fresh voices will replace those which have obviously become worn in the service, and the excellent intentions of the Conductor will then be more fully carried out.

The Bach Choir has given some fine performances during the season, although we can scarcely believe that Max Bruch's "Odysseus" is a work upon which the energies of the Association should have been bestowed. Sir John Goss's unfinished anthem, "The God of Jeshurun," completed with much skill and judgment by Sir Arthur Sullivan, was a welcome item in the programme of the first Concert, which was ably conducted by Dr. Stainer, in the unavoidable absence of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt. Although there can be no desire on the part of the best friends of this Society to limit its performances to the compositions of Bach, it would be well that the utmost care should be exercised in the selection of works, especially those by living composers, for the great name which created the Choir should be considered as a guarantee for the worth of those with which it is associated.

The decisive success of Gounod's "Redemption" at the Birmingham Festival induced the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society to inaugurate its season with a performance of this work, the effect created, under the excellent conductorship of Mr. Barnby, being so great as to render a second performance imperative. The choir, in the difficult choruses of "The Redemption," and also in the other important compositions contained in the programmes of the season, has steadily preserved its reputation, and its Concerts are now looked forward to annually with the greatest interest. A performance of "The Redemption" at Westminster Abbey must also be noticed as evidencing the gradual reception of sacred compositions into sacred buildings, and the work has likewise been given in separate parts at the Churches of St. Anne's, Soho (under Mr. Barnby), and St. Margaret Pattens, Rood Lane (under Mr. Stedman), on both occasions appropriately forming part of the service.

The Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace, conducted by Mr. Manns, have, as usual, attracted large audiences and fully sustained their high character. The performance of Berlioz' "Messe des Morts," for the first time in this country, was perhaps scarcely a judicious step, for the limited means at the command of the Conductor prevented anything like a realisation of the composer's intention, but the presentation of the work may perhaps lead others with larger resources to repeat the experiment. We question, however, whether the composition is suited to a concert-room, whatever may be its dimensions, the character of the work essentially fitting it only for such a building as the Chapel of the Invalides, where it was first heard. Amongst the performances at the Saturday Concerts must also be recorded that of Gounod's "Redemption," the warm reception of which led to a second presentation of the work, which was equally successful.

The London Musical Society must be mentioned in the highest terms of admiration, for to this enthusiastic body of amateurs we are indebted for a hearing of one of the finest works of modern times, Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," the execution of which, under the skilful direction of Mr. Barnby, was everything that could be desired. Now that this Society has thrown its performances open to the public, it takes rank as one of the great musical attractions of the season, and we have little doubt that the warm support accorded to it will prove the wisdom of its appeal to a less exclusive audience.

An important event of the season has been the great Handel Festival, the recurrence of which was at first somewhat doubtful, in consequence of the dissolution of the Sacred Harmonic Society. The authorities of the Crystal Palace Company, however, wisely relying upon the support which has been accorded to this national demonstration from its first meeting, determined to accept the entire responsibility of the undertaking, and the result has been a success which must have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. The much-regretted absence of Sir Michael Costa, who has conducted these Festivals from their establishment, would have been a serious impediment to the Directors had they not been able to secure the services of Mr. August Manns, who, although holding so high a position as an orchestral Conductor, had yet to show his power of directing large masses of choralists—a task, however, the triumphant success of which was proved not only by the artistic perfection of the performance, but by the spontaneous acclamations from the thousands of listeners and executants which were showered upon the new Conductor at the termination of the Festival.

The Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts have been more than usually interesting this season, for, in addition to the many standard works to the excellent rendering of which the subscribers annually look forward, the programmes have included a new Pianoforte Trio and a String Quintet by Brahms, and a Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello by Gernsheim, besides several compositions previously unheard in St. James's Hall. All these have been entrusted to the artists so long identified with the "Popular Concerts," and the audiences have been, as usual, both numerous and appreciative.

Amongst the Pianoforte Recitals of the season those of M. de Pachmann stood forth as evidencing an individuality of style which must ever command attention. Especially as an exponent of the compositions of Chopin he was eminently distinguished, although he essayed the works of other composers with more or less success. Madame Menter, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Mr. Charles Hallé, and many other celebrated artists have also contributed several performances of high-class pianoforte works, and Mr. Henry Holmes's "Musical Evenings," given at the Royal Academy of Music, are likewise deserving of very high commendation.

That the visit of the Cologne Choir did not produce that startling effect which was created when this excellent body of vocalists first came to London is, we think, attributable to the fact of our having recently cultivated part-singing so extensively and so carefully as to accustom audiences to listen to choral music from English artists in which every shade of expression is realised to perfection. As doubtless, however, the first spur to this movement was given by these German choralists, they have effectually earned a right to a warm welcome from a country in which they have done so much to help forward the good cause.

The suburban Choral Societies deserve a word of praise, not only for the manner in which the works have been, as a rule, rendered at their Concerts, but for the energy displayed in producing compositions unknown to a London audience. The performance of Gade's "Psyche" by the Highbury Philharmonic Society, under Dr. Bridge, and by the Hampstead Choral Society, under Mr. Willem Coenen; of Gounod's "Redemption" by the Bow and Bromley Institute, under Mr. W. G. McNaught, and by the Tufnell Park Choral Society, under Mr. W. Henry Thomas; of Mr. Goring Thomas's "Sun-Worshippers," "The Bride" (by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie), and Mozart's music to "King Thamos" (for the first time in England) by the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, under Mr. Ebenezer Prout; and of Mr. Alfred Gaul's "Holy City" by the Kensington Choral and Orchestral Society, under Mr. William Buels, may be mentioned as proofs, amongst many others, of this fact. Mr. Willing's Choir and Mr. Geaussen's Choir are fairly advancing their claims to recognition amongst the established institutions in the metropolis, an excellent performance of Gounod's "Redemption" having been given by the last-named Choir during the season.

The Royal College of Music at Kensington Gore has now become an accomplished fact. The quiet opening of the Institution in May, by its founder, the Prince of Wales, seemed to show the desire of his Royal Highness to get at once steadily to work, and to dispense with any form and ceremony unnecessary to the occasion. Subscriptions are still invited in furtherance of the objects of the College and we have now only to wish it every success, and to hope that it will be found all that its promoters desire.

The services rendered to music by Sir George (then Professor) Macfarren received a substantial recognition on his seventieth birthday, by the presentation of a cheque for 800 guineas, which was handed to him, in the name of some of the most eminent persons connected with the art, by Sir Julius Benedict, at the Royal Academy of Music. So well had the secret of this testimonial been kept that the recipient was completely taken by surprise, and his acknowledgment of the gift was as spontaneous and heartfelt as the gift itself.

The tablet to the memory of Balfe erected this year in Westminster Abbey is a worthy tribute to the memory of a composer whose position in this country is to be judged not so much by the abstract value of his works as by the impetus which they gave to the establishment of a definite form of opera, in place of the hybrid entertainment which had so long been accepted by the public. It is absurd to say that Balfe wrote only melodies. Unquestionably he had a natural flow of what is popularly called "tune," but very many of his concerted pieces and several choruses we could name are excellently constructed; and now that we are beginning to honour the representative English musicians of the present, we are glad to find that the only honour we have it in our power to bestow has been given to a representative musician of the past.

The retirement of M. Sainton from public life whilst—as he proved at his Farewell Concert—fully in possession of his artistic powers, must be mentioned as one of the events of the season. For very many years he has been so well known as an orchestral leader, as well as a solo performer, that it will be some time before we shall be able to reconcile ourselves to his absence. As a teacher, too, his presence amongst us has been sensibly felt, many of those who have been his pupils at the Royal Academy of Music holding high positions, both in the metropolis and the provinces—a fact gracefully acknowledged at his Concert by the presentation of a silver wreath as a souvenir from his pupils at the Academy.

The degree of knighthood conferred upon Professor Macfarren and Mr. Arthur Sullivan on the opening of the Royal College of Music proved that Royalty is desirous of acknowledging, not only the claims of art, but of artists; and considering that the Cambridge Professor is also the Principal of the old-established Royal Academy of Music, the bestowal of this honour in his case becomes doubly graceful, as evidencing sympathy with an Institution which has already effected so much real benefit on musical progress in this country. Although not a professor of the art, Mr. George Grove, who was knighted at the same time, has been long known as an earnest worker in the cause, and no more appropriate opportunity could be found for conferring this title upon him than on his appointment as Director of the Royal College of Music.

We regret to record the decease of Mr. Carl Engel, an eminent musical archaeologist and contributor to THE MUSICAL TIMES; of Friedrich von Flotow, the composer of the opera "Marta"; of Léopold de Meyer, a once celebrated pianoforte virtuoso; of Mr. Adolph Gollmick, a well-known composer of pianoforte pieces; and of Mr. William Hutchins Callcott, who devoted a large portion of his time to "arrangements" of the works of classical writers for the pianoforte. But our obituary unfortunately includes a name which will make this a memorable year in the history of the art. The death of Richard Wagner, which occurred on February 13 last, caused indeed a widely spread feeling of regret, for it attracted public attention from the artist to the man; and even those, therefore, who differed from him in theory joined in mourning his sudden decease. Like all great reformers, he had raised up a body of adherents and opponents, the zealous devotion of the former and the unflinching antagonism of the latter gaining such strength by the continuance of a contention for artistic supremacy that neither party could perhaps tell how much of the energy displayed in the cause was traceable to the opposition encountered. The removal of the chief from the scene of action will, however, now give time for calm thought; and all who have a steadfast faith in the ultimate triumph of truth in art may patiently but confidently await the result.

PROFESSIONAL MUSICIANS AND MUSICAL AMATEURS.

By DR. W. POLE, F.R.S.

IN THE MUSICAL TIMES of June appeared an article on the relations between professional musicians and musical amateurs; I venture to think something may be added with advantage. The Directory question is a very insignificant part of the matter; if an obscure and ignorant pretender, by merely advertising himself, can contrive to get, from the people of Liverpool, employment for which he is incompetent, or privileges to which he is not entitled, the fault is surely in the people of Liverpool and not in the medium of his advertisement. It would be as reasonable for the medical faculty to demand the suppression of the Times on account of its constant celebration of the healing virtues of Eno's Fruit Salt or Holloway's Pills. It is, however, quite clear that the real complaint is not against the directories, but against a certain class of people whose names are said to obtain surreptitious admission into them, and it may be well at once to take this broader view of the case.

Let us endeavour to distinguish clearly between the different classes of people who have to do with music. In the first place, there is a very large and meritorious body of persons, deserving of all respect, who make their livelihood solely by occupation in some branch of music, chiefly either by teaching or public performance. These are properly distinguished as "professional" people; though their assumption of the title "Professor" is unfortunate; it has no precedent in other professions, it clashes with the legitimate use of the term, and it has given rise to some ridiculous parodies, such as "Professors" of gymnastics, hair-dressing, or conjuring. "Professional Musician," "Teacher of Music," are honourable and intelligible terms. "Professor of Music" has either a false meaning or none at all.

Then, secondly, there is the great class of the music-loving public, who take interest in the art but do not make any use of it for the purpose of money-making. These are the true "Amateurs."

So far all is simple, but such is the complex nature of our social system that in this, as in all other attempts at statistical classification, we soon come upon anomalous relations which destroy the sharpness of any line of demarcation it is attempted to draw.

Music offers great attractions to minds sensitive to it, and if it happens that persons so constituted are intelligent and persevering, they may, without any intention of making a living by the profession, carry their study and practice so far as to obtain a knowledge and proficiency fully equal to that of many professional men. Some few persons of this class, who have made themselves famous in music, have already been mentioned in connection with this discussion, and we might add various well-known names, such as Sir Frederick Gore Ouseley, Mr. Henry Leslie, Mr. Helmore, and many others. Now, undoubtedly, such persons are not "professional musicians" in the sense that they depend on music for their subsistence; but are they to be thereby debarred from exercising their musical abilities, or from receiving any profit that is obtainable therefrom? The class of persons in question becomes more numerous in lower ranks. A young man, for example, who is a poorly paid office clerk, may by dint of hard practice have become a clever organ-player: is he to be forbidden to take a paid office at a church if he can play well enough to obtain one? Or a man engaged in a shop all the day may have acquired considerable proficiency on the violin: may he not be allowed to take a place in a paid orchestra in the evening? Or a young girl in a Magazin des Modes has learnt how to manage well a naturally fine voice: is it a social crime for her to form the first soprano of a paid choir? These are the people whom the Liverpool musicians courteously describe as "butchers and bakers and candlestick-makers," and whose names are thought to pollute the purity of the musical directories. One can understand that the competition of these "semi-professional" persons, as they may be fairly called, may be distasteful to the bonâ fide professional class, but it is difficult to see any reasonable ground for objection to it, for few people would be hardy enough to assert that an absolute dependence on music for bread and cheese should be a necessary qualification for the practice of any branch of the art. It may have been distasteful to English professional composers that a young German amateur should have been given a large sum for composing "Elijah" for the Birmingham Festival, just as it is distasteful to the Liverpool professional organists that the young man in the lawyer's office should get a small salary for playing the organ at St. Loyola's, Toxteth Park; but if the Birmingham people and the Toxteth Park congregation have been satisfied, one can hardly see in either case an infraction of any rule of justice or propriety. The same thing occurs continually in analogous cases.—It is difficult to draw a parallel with the clerical, legal, or medical professions, as the practising of these is necessarily hemmed in by special restrictions; but in literature and art the parallel exists abundantly. Could we deny the right of anybody to publish a profitable book or a paid magazine article, if he did not depend entirely on literature for his living? or to sell a picture or a bust, if he were not strictly a professional artist? or to take an engagement as an actor, if he had any other means of support?

The regulating check must obviously be the competence of the person for the duty he undertakes to do. The semi-professional must recollect that if he enters into competition with bonâ fide professional men on their own ground, he must expect no favour—on the contrary, he fairly provokes hostile criticism; and if the Liverpool musicians have good reason to complain of the undue encouragement of incompetence in their semi-professional rivals, no one can object to their using strong language, or to their taking any means to expose the injustice. And, again, the semi-professionals should bear in mind that in entering the field against professional musicians they ought to compete with them on equal terms, and not (if I may be pardoned the expression) to undersell them. It is hardly fair for an amateur who is able to do profitable musical work to do it for less remuneration than would be reasonably paid to the professional man whom he supersedes, so taking advantage, to the prejudice of the latter, of his less need of the pay. It is probable that this condition has not always been borne in mind, particularly by amateur organists, who, I fear, are often tempted to undertake duties for remuneration below what ought fairly to be paid. No doubt cases arise where, from scarcity of funds, offers of this kind are encouraged; but the wisdom of the policy is doubtful, and church authorities would do well to recollect that the labourer is worthy of his hire, and that work underpaid is seldom heartily done. I should say that the professional musicians may reasonably demand this recognition of their position, and would be justified in publishing and holding up to reprobation any clearly proved cases, not only of incompetence for musical duties undertaken, but of their being done for obviously inadequate pay.

If these conditions are carried out, it is difficult to believe that professional men have much to fear from their semi-professional rivals. The cases of real competence are rare, and these must be almost entirely confined to performance. One cannot think that teaching can be carried on to any extent by such persons, who would have neither time nor inclination for it, and we know that teaching is the main source of income to professional men.

The often mooted idea of forming a strictly professional body, with the view of excluding all others from undertaking profitable musical work, is a delusion; no such thing would be practicable. It is quite practicable and expedient to promote the issue of certificates of competence, from properly constituted authorities, and to encourage the public to rely on them, or to demand them, before entrusting important work to unknown hands; but it is obvious that this system would in no wise exclude really competent semi-professional men, but would rather improve their position, for no respectable examining body could refuse them certificates for any special branch of music in which they were properly qualified.

A word or two may perhaps be added as to the general relations between professional men and amateurs, properly so called. It would be salutary for the latter class to bear in mind that in the matter of performance, they must of necessity be much behind professional men. Speaking generally, I am afraid the standard of amateur musical performance is, in this country, deplorably low. This cannot be due to want of the necessary mental qualifications: it must arise either from bad teaching or from ignorance, bad management, bad taste, or bad judgment on the part of the learners or their friends—probably more or less from all combined. However, the question of general improvement is far too large to enter upon here. I would refer more to the rarer cases of fairly good performance which an educated musician can listen to with interest or pleasure. The more such cases can be encouraged and multiplied the better for the cause of music in society. But there is always a tendency for the performers to presume too much on their own merits; they should recollect that, notwithstanding all their talent and industry, it is scarcely possible for them to approach the standard of the professional performer, whose life has been devoted to the cultivation, in the most favourable manner, of his technical skill. For this reason amateur performance ought generally to be confined to private society; it would seem to be a mistake to thrust it into public positions, which must provoke invidious comparisons with the members of the profession. Public solo concerts by amateurs are usually got up more for the gratification of the performers than the hearers, and I should say the fewer of them there are the better.

But, granting the superiority which professional men must hold in the matter of performance, this does not justify the tone they are accustomed to take towards amateurs. When we consider that the amateurs are really the supporters of the profession, that they employ all the teachers, pay all the performers, and purchase nearly all the music, we should imagine that the professional men should in return be somewhat courteous to them. But in fact this is not the case; for one cannot but be aware of what is truly called, in THE MUSICAL TIMES' article I have referred to, "the lurking feeling of dislike and of hostility" which the profession entertain towards them, accompanied often by an affectation of general superiority which would be offensive if it were not ridiculous. It is amusing sometimes to see this shown in concert programmes: "The amateur may be informed that this is the third of Beethoven's symphonies"; "It may be pointed out to the amateur that although the signature of this movement has two flats, the key is not B flat but G minor"; and all that sort of thing. The people who are condescending enough to enlighten the poor amateur in this way should recollect that skill of performance and knowledge of music do not necessarily go together; that there are many professional musicians, good performers enough, no doubt, but whose education has been confined almost solely to the technical details of their own work, and whose knowledge of music generally may be said to be almost nil; whereas, on the other hand, there are many cultured amateurs who, though they may be no great performers, have acquired a general knowledge of music to an extent equalling that of the best professional people, and surpassing that of the great bulk of them. And there is one particular in which the amateurs have it all their own way. It is now becoming known that the progress of advanced thought and of modern investigation is working the most important changes in regard to the intellectual views of musical structure and musical theory, and subverting almost entirely the principles ordinarily taught and held—a result which has its parallel in many other departments of knowledge. This revelation has not yet dawned on the polloi of the profession, while those who might understand it set up their backs and sneer at it as impertinent and useless, saying it has nothing to do with "practical music." Be it so: let them enjoy their own opinion and stick to their "practical" work, leaving the intellectual aspects of music to the amateurs.*

There are, however, many right-thinking people who will cordially echo the wish expressed by the writer of the former article in this magazine, that the tone of the musical profession could be raised by the introduction into it of persons of higher culture, of superior social standing, and of broader and more enlightened views. The new Royal College might do much towards this; but, alas! they seem to think the low social origin of their scholars a subject for congratulation, and there is, at present at least, no evidence of an intention to adopt a higher education than mere technical training.

* I may give two edifying examples of the attitude shown towards intellectual views of music. One gentleman assured me nothing should make him believe in the possibility of counting vibrations at the rate of hundreds per second; he thought the whole thing must be a delusion. Another altogether objected to my speaking of the ratio of an interval (the very first thing, he it observed, that a student of theory has to learn) on the ground that "no musician ought to be expected to understand the meaning of the term"! Both these gentlemen are well known, holding high positions in the musical world.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XIII.—CHERUBINI (continued from page 375).

THE death of the Bayard of the Revolution (Hoche) naturally excited in French breasts a desire to honour their lamented hero in a manner the most public and complete. At the Théâtre Feydeau, the idea was to prepare a grand lyrical scene by way of Pompe funèbre, and thus turn the stage into a place of mourning. Accordingly, Chénier received a commission to write the verses, Cherubini being chosen to compose the music. At this distance of time and among Englishmen, the ceremonial retains no significance with regard to the connected event, but it gives a curious idea of the sort of thing which served to keep revolutionary and patriotic fervour at white heat among our neighbours many years ago. It opened with a tableau at once realistic and symbolical. Maidens and Old Men in classical attire mixed with officers and soldiers in the military dress of the period. There was a funeral urn; there were offerings of palms and garlands; hymns were sung, drums rolled, muskets fired, and what not beside of a nature alike stirring and incongruous. The intention was good, no doubt, but the public refused to "take the will for the deed," and one journal said of the piece: "A sort of pantomime; a nullity in point of dramatic merit; it was played simultaneously at two theatres, but did not draw at either." The Hoche Pompe funèbre was not to pass, however, without some effect upon the composer of the music. In the result it made an enemy of a young soldier just then rising into power, one who united to vast capacity the meanest and most belittling spirit of jealousy.

The worse than womanish feeling cherished by Napoleon for all rivals is matter of history, and has been proved up to the hilt over and over again. He could even depreciate brilliant services that helped to lay the foundations of his throne, when they overshadowed his own deeds, or promised to make a hero more popular than himself. Desaix among his subordinates in the campaign of Marengo, and Macdonald among his marshals in the wars of the empire had good reason to know what sort of chief they served. Even the grave proved no barrier to the great man's jealousy. Hoche, though dead, still irritated him, and he was impatient of any praise bestowed upon the pacificator of La Vendée. How this unreasonable pettishness affected Cherubini has been set forth by one of the master's biographers, Raoul Rochette, and deserves quotation:—

"The conqueror of Arcole brought back from Italy a march of Paisiello's, which he wished to hear at the Conservatoire. The director, M. Sarette, thought he ought to profit by the opportunity, and show the young hero, on whom the eyes of all Europe were fixed, the entire resources of the new institution by employing them on a more important composition; so he selected a cantata and funeral march written to words by Chénier by M. Cherubini for the funeral of General Hoche. It is a strikingly expressive piece, containing beauties of the highest order, and had made a prodigious impression on the people of Paris, but failed to do so on the conqueror of Italy. The General felt offended that the performance was not limited to what he had said he should like to hear; he thought there was an intention to give him a lesson by showing that France could do without foreign talent. Perhaps, too, he was wounded at hearing Hoche's praises sung; perhaps, in a word, he already desired hymns for no one but himself. Be this as it may, he appeared displeased. Scarcely was the performance over, when he went up to M. Cherubini, and, without saying a word to him about his march, spoke only in praise of Paisiello, whom he looked upon as the first of all composers, while after him he would hear of no one but Zingarelli, which deprived our composer of the hope of taking even second rank. 'I say nothing about Paisiello,' murmured Cherubini, in a low voice, 'but Zingarelli —!' And that was his only answer."

We may add that that only answer Napoleon never forgave. He had a powerful memory for offences against his self-esteem.

Cherubini's next work was the one-act opera "L'Hôtellerie Portugaise," words by an unknown author named Saint-Aignau, who, somehow or other, had contrived to win the master's confidence. This work, first played in July, 1798, failed completely, owing to the badness of the libretto, but the music met with favour at the hands of connoisseurs, the overture receiving especial praise for reasons which many readers of these words will not fail to understand. On his part, Saint-Aignau would not accept the public verdict as final. He remodelled his book and made another appeal, but again without success. "L'Hôtellerie Portugaise" struggled through four nights, and then there was an end of it. Cherubini proved a little more fortunate with his next opera, "La Punition." Desfaucherets was the author of the libretto, concerning which the Courrier des Spectacles said: "It has not much in it, is uninteresting, and contains striking improbabilities." This, too, was remodelled, but with better results than attended "L'Hôtellerie Portugaise." Subsequently Cherubini, working with Boieldieu, brought out another one-act piece, "Emma, ou la Prisonnière" (December, 1799), success in its case being—according to M. Pougin decided and prolonged, but on the evidence of authorities accepted by Mr. Bellasis entirely non-existent. On which side the truth lies a contemporary newspaper must be allowed to determine. "'La Prisonnière,'" said Les Spectacles de Paris, quoted by M. Pougin, "still draws large numbers to the Théâtre Montansier." All this was mere prelude to an event of genuine importance—the production of "Les Deux Journées."

The book of "Les Deux Journées" was written by Bouilly, the literary colleague of Grétry in some of his most important works, and the betrothed of that master's youngest and most beloved daughter, Antoinette. Bouilly is described by M. Pougin as "the wishy-washy and pompous author, whose pretentious and turgid style might serve as a model for all Prudhommes, past, present, and future." We shall not question the judgment nor censure Bouilly's weaknesses, since his self-importance led him to write a book called "Mes Récapitulations," wherein we read something of the genesis of "Les Deux Journées," and learn that the writer first met Cherubini at the house of Joséphine Beauharnais, afterwards the wife of Napoleon. At that time the composer was in search of a good librettist—one who could command sustained interest in union with new and pleasing situations. "I was happy enough," says Bouilly, "to realise his wish. . . . An act of admirable devotion on the part of a water-carrier for the benefit of a friend of mine, a magistrate, who was saved under the Terror as though by miracle, inspired me with the idea of giving the people a lesson in humanity. In a very short time I wrote my piece entitled 'Les Deux Journées,' and hastened to entrust it to Cherubini. He thought he saw in it something which might afford his rich and fertile imagination all the stimulus he required, and set to work untrumpetedly at composing one of the finest scores of modern times." After a good deal of vain talk about himself, our librettist goes on to tell what happened at the first performance of "Les Deux Journées."

Here he is worth quoting again: "The overture began and met with general approbation. The first act appeared full of matter well planned and characterised by absorbing interest. Then came the finale, that admirable septet cited as a masterpiece of our modern school. Enthusiasm had reached its highest pitch. Scarcely had the curtain fallen at the end of this act ere a large number of the Conservatoire pupils, climbing up over the orchestra, surrounded their master, who wanted to make me share the congratulations showered upon him. . . . But all my attention was taken up by my water-cart; the whole fate of the piece depended on that, and on more than one occasion the public have been known to pass from the enthusiasm produced by a first act to great severity as regards the others. I relied with justice on the irresistible spirit of my actor (Juliet); everything had been regulated and measured in order that the scene of the water-cart containing an illustrious personage proscribed by law might produce all the effect we expected; but a mere nothing might destroy all our hopes: it was necessary that the interest and the comic element in the situation should hit the public at the minute, the second, indicated. The vigilance of a sentinel whose steps were counted had to be eluded. In a word, Count Armand had only a single instant for escape. Everything concurred to make that instant decisive and favourable to the piece. . . . (It) produced on the whole audience one of those outbursts of emotion which cannot be withstood, and which are followed by lasting success. I felt assured from that moment; and, in my turn, pressing Cherubini in my arms with the eager utterance of deep emotion: 'Pardon me, great master; I trembled, and should never have been consoled had I compromised your fine talent.' 'Never,' he answered, returning my embrace—'no, never, perhaps, shall I have a better occasion for developing it; and I owe you my grandest triumph.'"

"Les Deux Journées" is so well known to every amateur that a discussion of its characteristics would take up time and space without just cause, while those who wish to learn what some great masters have said about it can gratify their desire by turning to the pages of Mr. Bellasis. From the historical point of view it is more important to show how the opera was received by contemporary critics. We can do this, thanks to the researches of M. Pougin. Here is what the influential Journal de Paris said: "The music of this work is, without doubt, one of its author's masterpieces. Nothing can be more new, more original, and more majestic than the overture; nothing more dramatic or more finely composed than the finale of the first act; nothing more simple and more tuneful than the elegant airs scattered through the piece." "The subject, the situations, the music, and the playing of the actors," remarked the Courrier des Spectacles, "all interest us, and deserve the unanimity of general applause which crowned the work. . . . Citizen Cherubini's style of composition is so marked that it is impossible not to know it. Force, rapidity, learned and unexpected transitions, and an accent of deep feeling, which reign in all the passionate situations, are so many signs by which, from the very earliest numbers, we recognise the inimitable author." On its part the Année Théâtrale observed: "All the sentiments of surprise, joy, disappointment, gratitude, and hope are, in a word, expressed in the tone adapted to them, and the accompaniment always adds to the expression with which the melody is capable of investing them. The whole is blended into a harmonic effect which is one of the richest ever yet heard on the stage." Taking these opinions in a representative character, it is clear that Cherubini, even in his most individual phase, had not to wait for generous and discerning appreciation. "Les Deux Journées" placed him at once on a pinnacle of the temple of art. The opera, which was produced on January 16, 1800, ran for two hundred nights, and soon found its way out of France into Germany and Italy. In 1801 a much mangled version, bearing the name of Thomas Attwood, was performed in London as "The Escapes," and not till seventy years later did "Les Deux Journées," rise in all its beauty, above our horizon. The opera figured in the Drury Lane season of 1872, recitatives having been written by Sir Michael Costa, but it failed to interest our public. So much the worse, not for it, but them.

A propos to "Les Deux Journées" Bouilly tells a curious story which shows what an impression the work made even upon people far removed from the influence of ordinary operatic doings. One morning twelve water-carriers, one of them bearing a magnificent bouquet, appeared at Bouilly's residence and said, "Beg pardon, sir, if we intrude, but when the heart speaks it cannot be resisted." Asked to be a little more explicit, the spokesman replied that they came to thank Bouilly, "in the name of all the water-carriers, for the honour you have done us by this masterpiece on the stage, where—blood and thunder!—you have drawn us in such a way that it made us cry, neither more nor less than if we had been a lot of little children." The dialogue continued thus:—

Bouilly. I painted you as what you are—worthy and excellent men—and as you deserve to be painted.

Spokesman. Well, it all amounts to this—that, in the first place, I have come to beg you will accept these flowers as a mark of our gratitude, and then give us permission—

Bouilly. Permission to do what?

Spokesman. To supply your house with water for a year, gratis of course. It is settled with all my mates of this part of the town. Each will have his week. It will be kind of you to do so.

Bouilly. I am profoundly touched by your offer, which flatters as much as it honours me. But permit me to accept only these beautiful flowers, which I would not exchange for a crown.

Spokesman. O do not refuse us, confound it! That would grieve us too much. Like a good fellow as you are, do not refuse us.

Bouilly. Let us say no more on the subject, my good friends. If my piece made your hearts beat, believe me your offer makes mine beat quite as much, and will never be effaced from my memory. As for the flowers, I shall deck my wife and daughter with them, but I promise to keep one which will remind me all my life of this charming interview.

Bouilly adds that he and the water-carriers then drank wine together, and that he preserved one of the flowers beneath a glass shade.

Cherubini next collaborated with Méhul in a three-act opera, "Epicure," which decidedly failed, for reasons that may or may not have been those set forth in a contemporary paper, Ecrittes Lyriques et Théâtrales: "Four insignificant personages, opera-like scenes of magic, a hurried ending, the love of a young girl for old Epicurus, and the child's confession before the grave Arcepagus put the spectators in a bad humour and inclined them to laughter. It was time the piece finished when it did. Little interest, but facility of versification; agreeable touches, but buffoonery for comedy; interest without interest, but a tolerably satisfactory development of the character of Epicurus, which is in itself pleasing—such, to our mind, are the beauties and defects of the work. The music is not the music for such a subject: it belongs neither to the buffo nor the terrible style, but makes an infernal noise, produces many orchestral effects, and multiplies difficulties—we do not very well know wherefore. Wishing to surpass each other, the two composers who wrote the music have offered us something scientific for trained ears. The audience were not likely to take this into account." It is fair to add that this opinion was not shared by many critics, who simply complained that, while each master wrote well, the general effect lacked unity of manner—which, indeed was to be expected.

The period of "Les Deux Journées" and the "Epicure" was one of great activity on the part of Cherubini. He did not compose much dramatic music, it is true, for some time after the failure of his collaboration with Méhul, and this has deceived some of his biographers into a belief that he was despondent and inactive. M. Pougin gives ample proof to the contrary. We find that Cherubini became connected with a concert speculation at the Théâtre Louvois, in conjunction with Citizens Lefebvre and Garat. This failed ignominiously, only two performances taking place. A little later the master is discovered in the midst of a hot fight waged between the professors of the Conservatoire and their ex-colleague Lesueur, while about the same time he appears as part editor and proprietor of the Journal d'Apollon. M. Pougin has disinterred the advertisement of this publication, and here it is: "Journal d'Apollon, by Citizens Cherubini, Boieldieu, and Jadin. This periodical will appear under the title of the Journal d'Apollon. It will contain new compositions by the three musicians; each will supply two a month, which, collected, will form six pieces, consisting alternately of French romances, rondeaux, duets and airs, and Italian duets and cavatinas, or canons for three or four voices. The first number will appear on the 1st Floréal next." M. Pougin adds, in further proof of Cherubini's activity: "It was also shortly afterwards that Cherubini was mixed up in a commercial scheme, started, doubtless, by several composers to defend their author's rights, disregarded somewhat, probably, by the publishers. One thing, at any rate, is certain—Berton, Boieldieu, Nicolo, Méhul, Jadin, Kreutzer, and Cherubini combined to found a musical publishing firm, in which they traded personally with their own works. The house was situated in the Rue Richelieu, then called the Rue de la Loi; it is the same which Boieldieu's younger brother afterwards took on his own account. The trade-mark of the firm was a star, with the name of one of the associated composers appearing between a couple of the rays."

One of the stories connecting Cherubini with Napoleon comes in about this time, and may be taken with as many grains of salt as the reader pleases. It is said that among the deputations which went up to congratulate the future Emperor upon his escape from Fieschi's infernal machine was one from the Conservatoire. Cherubini belonged to it, but, knowing Napoleon's prejudice against him, kept in the background. If he hoped thus to avoid remark, he reckoned without his host. The Corsican soldier never forgot anybody, and he soon exclaimed, "I do not see Monsieur Chérubin," using the French rendering of the composer's name. On this Cherubini stepped to the front, and the two men looked at each other but neither said a word. Another tale follows upon this. Napoleon soon after gave a dinner at the Tuileries to a number of distinguished men, and Cherubini was amongst the guests. On adjourning to the salon the First Consul singled out our master and began, in his restless manner, to walk him up and down the room. He meant to be "nasty," and Cherubini must have detected it, wondering, perhaps, where the blow would fall. "So," said the lord of many legions, "the French are in Italy!" As the Florentine musician was not a very patriotic Italian this did not hurt him much, and he had no difficulty in turning a compliment out of it. "Where would they not go, led by such a hero as you?" Napoleon seemed pleased, but soon relapsed into his disagreeable humour, and brought up the name of his favourite, Paisiello. "I tell you I like Paisiello's music immensely; it is soft and tranquil. You have much talent, but there is too much accompaniment." Cherubini answered: "Citizen Consul, I conform to French taste; 'paese che vai usanza che trovi,' says the Italian proverb." Napoleon persisted: "Your music makes too much noise. Speak to me in that of Paisiello; that is what lulls me gently." The master's reply showed how unfit he was to figure in courts. Already discerning men saw at what a glittering prize the fortunate soldier was aiming, and Cherubini very plainly hinted it when he replied: "I understand; you like music which does not stop you from thinking of State affairs." The conqueror's brow darkened; the hard, stern expression which often made nations tremble settled upon his face, and, turning away, the conversation ended.

The First Consul soon made a practical retort upon Cherubini. Having re-established religion in France, he revived services at the Tuileries, and, sending for Paisiello, made him director of the music at a salary of 12,000 francs per year. This step naturally irritated the French musicians, and excited their ill-feeling to such an extent that even Cherubini became its object. Napoleon, we may be sure, was not affected by anything they said or did. Retaining Paisiello, as long as that composer would stop—the master returned to Naples in 1804—he revelled in the soothing music of his predilection. Speculation has often concerned itself with the real reasons why Napoleon disliked Cherubini's music and preferred Paisiello's. One writer (Picchianti), quoted by Mr. Bellasis, goes very far afield in search. He argues that the great soldier's nerves, accustomed to the "confused noise" of great armies, could not have found the Florentine's works unbearable by reason of sonority; and then proceeds: "It is rather to be believed that in Cherubini's music . . . Napoleon discovered the impress of an exalted spirit, and a certain republican austerity, which he did not at all relish, and would have been glad even to eradicate . . . there perhaps arose in him some fear lest such music should produce results clashing with his chief objects, which were to extinguish in the French people all excitement opposed, as he thought, to his particular aims, and for that very reason he wished, on the other hand, to maintain, by means of Paisiello's and Zingarelli's compositions, the reputation of the old school of Italian music, the quiet and suave style of which seemed to him calculated to lull the popular mind." In our opinion, there is no reason to speculate after this fashion about a fact so perfectly natural as Napoleon's love of soft and soothing music. The man who spends his days amid the whirl of a great city's business loves to retire at night to some quiet suburban retreat, and with equal reason this soldier, accustomed to the din of military bands and the uproar of popular enthusiasm, sought relief in unexciting strains.

In October, 1813, Cherubini appeared for the second time on the stage of the Grand Opéra, where was produced his "Anacréon, ou l'Amour Fugitif." Again he suffered through a bad libretto, his indifference or want of judgment having led him to accept a book from an obscure writer named Mendouze. One might have thought that the master had had experience enough of obscure writers; but no; he went on trying to draw a prize blindfold, and always getting a blank, or worse. Castil-Blaze says: "The Anacreonic libretto struck the public as very wearisome and icy cold. They received certain scenes, however, with transports of merriment, especially one in which Anacréon, when speaking to his favourite Odalisque to ask her for something to drink calls her 'Esclave intéressante.' For five minutes shouts of laughter prevented the actor from going on." That musicians admired the beautiful overture—played, by the way, at the first concert of our own Philharmonic Society, and twice encored—as well as many of the solos and concerted pieces, goes without saying, but the public would not have "Anacréon" at any price. For the first time in the annals of the Grand Opéra, they hissed, and the alarmed manager withdrew the work after a run of seven nights.

In December of the following year (1804) Cherubini tried his luck again on the same stage, and once more failed. This time he produced a ballet, "Achille à Seyros," having, however, written only a part of the music himself. Ill-fortune attended him in other ways. Paisiello, tired of Paris, left and went home, whereupon Napoleon invited Méhul to take the vacant post at the Tuileries. The French master, it is said, declined in favour of Cherubini; but several versions of the story are told, and we cannot decide whether he was thus magnanimous or not. According to one authority, the following conversation took place between the Emperor and the composer of "Joseph"— Méhul. I can only accept the place on condition that you will allow me to share it with my friend Cherubini.

Napoleon. Don't mention him; he is a man of snappish disposition, and I have an utter aversion to him.

Méhul. It is certainly his misfortune to have failed in securing your good opinion, but in point of sacred music he is superior to us all; he is straitened in his circumstances, has a numerous family, and I should feel happy in reconciling you to him.

Napoleon. I repeat, I will not have him.

Méhul. Well, then, I must positively decline; nothing can alter my determination. I belong to the Institute; he does not. I will not allow it to be said that I take advantage of the kindness you show me in order to secure every place for myself, and deprive a celebrated man of what he is so justly entitled to claim at your hands.

Castil-Blaze describes all this as pure invention, and the only thing certain is that Napoleon requested Paisiello to name his own successor. Lesueur was the fortunate man.

In 1805 Cherubini organised and conducted a great performance of Mozart's "Requiem." This was his last engagement before quitting the French capital for Vienna, attracted thither by a liberal offer for two operas, to be produced under his personal superintendence. A certain Baron von Braun came from the Kaiserstadt expressly to arrange this affair, and with him Cherubini, his wife, and infant daughter left Paris, travelling by way of Frankfort, Berlin, Dresden, and Prague. The master wrote full details of this long roundabout journey, but little would be gained by quoting from a narrative no more interesting than an ordinary traveller's diary. Enough that the party reached Vienna safe and sound, on July 27, and that Cherubini lost no time in making the acquaintance of the venerable Haydn, then nearing the close of his career; of Beethoven, whose star was rising towards the zenith; and of Hummel, then in the glow of his popularity. He soon brought out "Les Deux Journées" and "Lodoïska," and was beginning a new opera for the Vienna stage, when the dark and gigantic shadow of Napoleon fell upon the Austrian capital like an eclipse. Every one knows that in September, 1805, the conqueror broke up the camp of the "Army of England" at Boulogne, and, after one of the most astonishing marches on record, hurled that splendid and irresistible host full at the heart of the Austrian Empire. With magical rapidity he captured Ulm and poor unfortunate Mack, swept on to Vienna, crushed Austria and Russia at Austerlitz, and then returned to the trembling city on the Danube as its master. There he met with Cherubini once more, sending for him and graciously saying, "Since you are here, Monsieur Cherubini, we will have some music together. You shall direct my concerts." This the master did, so pleasing the Emperor that his Majesty one day observed, "I hope that you are here only for a holiday, and intend returning to Paris." A courtier would have known how to "improve the occasion" of this speech, but Cherubini was as proud as Napoleon himself, and made no sign. Otherwise, perhaps, the Florentine, and not Paer, would soon after have enjoyed 50,000 francs a year, with the compound title "Composer and Director of the Private Musical Establishment of the Emperor, and Singing Master to the Empress."

COPYRIGHT WITH AMERICA.

THE question of copyright between England and the United States has entered upon a new phase; that is to say, the publishers of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and the Eastern cities generally are beginning to agitate for the negotiation of a treaty. At first sight this appears astonishing, since it has always been understood that America, comparatively a non-producing country in the matter of literature and music, benefits all round by the liberty of appropriating, without payment of any kind, the literature and music published in other lands. The matter, however, is simple enough when looked into, as we hope to show.

In order to illustrate the present state of opinion in the Eastern cities, we quote an article that appeared recently in the Boston Musical Record:—

"The recent ruling of Judge Lowell, of the United States Court, that Gounod's 'Redemption' could not be performed in this country with orchestration arranged from the published pianoforte score was a decision which surprised those who had believed that any work published abroad could—in the absence of an international copyright law—be produced or published by any American manager or publisher. It is understood that Judge Lowell's willingness to grant an injunction against the performance of 'The Redemption' without the use of the composer's score arose from his opinion that the work would suffer by an imperfect representation. Be that as it may, his decision has caused a renewal of the agitation upon the subject of an international copyright law which shall not only protect the works of foreign and American composers as regards artistic completeness, but which shall guarantee them an adequate financial remuneration as well. It is a well-known fact amongst those interested in this subject—and one that we have taken the pains to substantiate while contemplating the publication of this article—that our leading book-publishers and authors are strongly in favour of the passage of an international copyright law. There is no doubt that the music-publishers and composers are also anxious to secure such an obvious protection for their publications. It is understood that the opposition to the passage of an international copyright law comes from England, and for this reason: English publishers insist upon retaining the publications at home, thus securing to their own printers, binders, paper-makers, &c., the manufacture, to the great injury of American industries. In this lies the true cause of the delay. English authors and composers are very prolific in brainwork, and it seems strange that they should not unite to protect their interests in this country, and secure additional income from their works. In conversation with a Boston manager who has within a few days returned from London, he said: 'I heard several new operas which I very much wished to bring out in Boston, but, knowing that there is no international copyright law to protect me, I declined to purchase them. Any unprincipled manager could have them "memorised" and produce them here in advance of my authorised presentation of them. This, of course, keeps a good many dollars out of the pockets of English writers, and deprives our public of the pleasure of hearing the new English operas presented as they should be.' This opinion is corroborated by the various other responsible managers, who would all be glad to assist in the bringing about of a law that shall protect them in their ventures, and shall give the public the benefit of thoroughly first-class representations. It is to be hoped that the authors, composers, and publishers will make a renewed and combined effort to secure the making of the law. The American operatic managers are arranging to test the right to use the pianoforte scores of foreign copyright musical publications as a basis for an orchestral score. As before stated, Massachusetts has already established a precedent (by the ruling of Judge Lowell), but the corresponding court in New Jersey has ruled exactly opposite to Judge Lowell's decision. It is probable that a subscription fund will be raised among the managers for the purpose of conducting the test case, in order that the whole matter may be definitely settled by the Supreme Court at Washington. It is difficult to imagine a reason why English authors and composers do not memorialise Parliament to pass an international copyright law. So obvious a benefit to all would, it is believed, have but to be presented in its proper shape in order to secure their prompt and emphatic approval. The present agitation must, it seems to us, result in the framing of a law that shall by just provisions guarantee the brain-workers of either country a reward for their labour.'

We can fancy the reader rubbing his eyes in doubt of their truthfulness after perusing the above remarks. It has always been an impression in this country that authors, publishers, and every class interested in literature are most desirous of arranging a treaty between the two nations, but that the Americans firmly oppose themselves to the idea. The reverse is the case, it appears. It is the Americans who want copyright, in justice to authors, publishers, and public, and it is we who selfishly resist. What underlies this curious case of topsy-turvy? In the first place, does the cry from the Eastern cities signify an awakened conscience, and is it raised in the interests of justice? We have no desire to speak uncharitable words, but some considerations arise here which no man of the world would think of ignoring. It has long been the practice of firms in the great cities of the Eastern States to secure advance sheets of forthcoming English works, and by publishing them almost simultaneously with their issue in England, enjoy a monopoly of supply for a limited time. They have, of course, paid for this privilege, and so far the author or his assigns, have profited by it. Till some two or three years ago the American publishers agreed amongst themselves to respect the advantage thus bought, but since then the "great West" has had a voice in the matter. More enterprising than their fellows, and seeing no reason to be scrupulous, the publishers of Chicago and other towns in that region have flooded the country with issues of new English works at prices which leave the Eastern man out of the market. And now the Eastern man demands a copyright law! Is it harsh or illogical to apply the "Post hoc, ergo propter hoc" here? Perhaps it is, but at any rate a suspicious connection seems to exist between the action of the Chicago firms and the outcry of those in the Atlantic towns.

It may be said: "What does it matter how the demand arises?" The query is pertinent, and it really would not matter if there were no occasion to ask what particular sort of copyright law the demanders have in their minds. Here's the rub, for the reader will quickly see that the Eastern men have not the smallest idea of being just and generous at any sacrifice to themselves. These gentlemen want, in effect, a special treaty made to further their own interests. They are not satisfied with the copyright law that suits France and Germany, and has been found, on the whole, to work well for both of the contracting parties. No; the Anglo-American law must be as one-sided as the proverbial Bridge-north election, with, of course, all the advantages flowing west of the Atlantic. It is demanded in the first place that every book affected by the copyright shall be printed, bound, and so on, in America; and next that it shall be so issued within three months of the publication in England. Observe how these two regulations are sure to operate when made law, as we venture to think they never will be. The first works against the author, by restraining his liberty to secure as large a return as possible for his genius and skill. Under it he cannot dispose of his work to, say, an English publisher for all countries, because that publisher, unless he have an establishment in America, or makes a costly arrangement there, cannot satisfy the copyright law. The author is thus driven to a separate bargain for the United States, under the conditions of the second regulation, which is specially adapted to give every advantage to the American. Let us suppose, for instance, that B, an unknown writer, issues a work in England, and after three months finds that he has made a "hit." He cannot, by the rule aforesaid, obtain copyright for it in America. It is the property for the United States of any publisher or publishers who choose to print it. Again, suppose that C, a well-known author, also brings out a work, and demands for the American copyright a considerable sum. The United States is the land of "rings," and is it not conceivable that a publishing "ring" would operate to keep down author's profits, backed, as it would be, by the law, which demands an agreement in three months, and prohibits the introduction of copies printed abroad? The whole matter is clear. Indeed the man must be very blind who cannot see, in the demand for such a copyright treaty as the Americans ask, a barefaced attempt to cover with the cloak of legality a position as profitable as that now occupied in defiance of common justice. Why should the Americans exact more than the French or Germans? There is no answer to this question, but the source of all the trouble lies in refusing the idea that an author should be at perfect liberty to dispose of his work where, when, and how he pleases. The law should regard him, not as a man to be hampered and plundered, but as one to be protected against thieves of every kind. In this respect the law has a simple duty, and the honesty or dishonesty of the case is so clear that we are astounded at the complications which self-interest coils around it.

FROM time to time efforts have been made to establish an uniformity in printed music, so that it shall become in truth an universal language. We do not now speak of such reforms as the introduction of a sign for the "bind" which shall be distinct from that used for the "slur"—initiated by the late Sir Sterndale Bennett—but we do think that it would be an inestimable boon if composers were to indicate precisely how they wish their music to be engraved, and, what is of equal importance, if engravers would obey them. For want of definite rules with regard to the directions to performers, we very often see slurs extending to the end of a bar, instead of to the end of a phrase, "a tempo" over a passage when the time in the preceding bars has been neither accelerated nor retarded, and accidentals to contradict notes which have been altered from the signature about four or five bars previously. Then our instruction books tell us that an acciaccatura is distinguished from an appoggiatura by having a line drawn through it; but we quite as often meet with this note without as with a line. In a piece now before us three notes of a phrase are marked "con fuoco" and the remainder "con passione"; and in another we have a "rallentando," and no other direction of any kind for twenty bars, when a "rall. molto" occurs, so that what time we are expected to play the intervening bars in remains a mystery. The fact is that these sins of omission and commission are often due to the composer, who hurriedly throws off his music with the expectation that the engraver will put it all right. For their own sake, however, authors should see that their manuscripts are correct in every particular before they are engraved, and then if the doubtful points we have drawn attention to should occur, it will be at once known with whom the fault lies.

THE subject of "Programme Music" has been tolerably well debated; but opinions still differ as to the limit beyond which compositions of this kind should not overstep. We can scarcely think, however, that there can be a question as to the artistic incongruity of illustrating a musical work during its performance by the action of the scenes and events which the composer has intended to depict. Some time ago an attempt was made in London to heighten the effect of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony by a moving panorama; but the enterprise had, as might be expected, a brief life, and was speedily forgotten. The latest development of this idea seems to have been made at Cleveland, Ohio, and, strangely enough, in oratorio, for in an account of a performance of Haydn's "Creation," we read "In the beginning the audience-room was in literal chaos and darkness, and at the words 'Let there be light,' the electric lights flashed forth with such effective brilliancy that the audience were near breaking forth into wild demonstrations and deafening applause. But the climax was reached at the conclusion of the Oratorio, when Eve came forth and sang 'Home, sweet home,' accompanying herself on the piano." We have copied this notice precisely as it appeared; but the facts appear too startling to be true. Whenever we have heard of accompanying music with scenery or action it has been in connection with a secular work; but realism in Oratorio is a novelty. The newspaper from which the above paragraph is quoted seems somewhat to favour this innovation; and if the idea should grow, we cannot say what other "effects" may be attempted in Cleveland, where it is evident that a sensational violation of the sacred character of a composition has already been received with "deafening applause."

THE Musical Association was founded in May, 1874, for the investigation and discussion of subjects connected with the art and science of Music. This object has been steadily kept in view; and certainly some of the papers read at the meetings have been amongst the very best of modern musical essays. But we are often asked the question—and, indeed, it is one which has frequently occurred to ourselves—why these well-considered articles should be virtually lost to the general public. True it is that at the end of each session a little volume is issued under the title of "Proceedings of the Musical Association," but the very notice on the cover, "Price (to non-members) Four Shillings," proves that the perusal of the book is known to be mainly confined to those connected with the Society. Now, considering the great importance of many of the subjects treated of in these papers, it certainly appears strange that the Association should not print and publish them monthly at a price within the reach of all music-lovers. We happen to know that several practical suggestions contained in this volume of "Proceedings" have excited the deepest interest amongst the few who, by chance, have seen the book; and it seems but fair to those who have taken the trouble to prepare such elaborate papers that they should be read by all whom they really concern. Of course some small fund would be necessary to carry out the idea we have suggested; but if the Association is to do any real good, we are convinced that it must not confine its operations to the reading and discussion of papers in its own meeting-room, and the printing of a yearly report of its "Proceedings" evidently intended chiefly for circulation amongst its members.

IN the March number of THE MUSICAL TIMES we drew attention to the annual report of the Orphan School for the daughters of musioians, carried on in Bath by the founder, Miss Helen Kenway; and we then mentioned that she was desirous of taking a house in which the education of these children, with special opportunities for the study of music, could be provided on extremely moderate terms. We have now much pleasure in announcing that she is about to secure suitable premises for this purpose in London, and that in all probability the school will open under her superintendence in September next. Two definite promises of money for furnishing have already been made, several small presents have been received, and kind volunteers are making linen requisites for the establishment. It is stated that all fees are to be used for the benefit of the charity. Subscriptions and applications are to be addressed for the present to Miss Kenway, South Hill House, Bath. Musicians, indeed, owe a deep debt of gratitude to this lady for her untiring exertions in the cause; and we sincerely hope that her efforts will be amply rewarded. As we said in our former remarks, so far from placing herself in opposition to any existing musical charities, she is earnestly endeavouring to supplement their usefulness; and even the many subscribers to other funds, therefore, may extend the good work in which they have already shown their sympathy by giving donations, if not of money, at least of standard books and music to Miss Kenway's Orphan School.

IT is satisfactory to find that in all parts of the world the taste for good bells is on the increase. A fine carillon of twenty-five bells is now on its way to Philadelphia to be placed in Holy Trinity Church. The bells were cast by Severin van Aerschodt, the celebrated founder, of Louvain. Before leaving the foundry they were examined by Dr.

Stainer on behalf of the Philadelphia committee, and he expressed a very high opinion of their merit, both as to workmanship and beauty of tone. The carillon is a gift to the church by Mr. Joseph E. Temple, in memory of his late wife. Each bell is ornamented with a medallion-portrait of both Mr. and Mrs. Temple in bas-relief. There will be a keyboard acting upon the bells, constructed on the Belgian principle. The weight of the largest bell is rather more than one ton and a quarter, its diameter is four feet four inches, and it gives the note F of the old organ pitch, nearly E flat concert pitch. The smallest bell weighs half a hundredweight. The whole of the bells are designed with great taste, and, according to the custom of the country, have been carefully polished.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE revival of Rossini's Opera "La Gazza Ladra," with Madame Patti in the principal character, was an interesting event, for it proved that audiences, although by no means desirous of going backwards for a model lyrical drama consonant with their taste, have not lost their love for pure and simple melody. This was abundantly testified by the applause which was liberally bestowed upon the once popular airs with which the work abounds; but the general impression was that the Opera was a curiosity, and would scarcely live as long in the estimation of the public as the prima donna for whom it was evidently resuscitated. In addition to the exquisite vocalism of Madame Patti as Ninetta, Madame Scalchi's acting and singing in the part of Pippo won the warm applause of a crowded house; but the rest of the characters (perhaps Signor Cotogni excepted) scarcely recalled the palmy days of Italian Opera. The only other performance of any importance was "The Flying Dutchman," which was revived for one night. The charming impersonation of Senta by Madame Albani is too well known to need comment; but a good word must be said for M. Devoyod in the part of the Dutchman, which is admirably suited to his voice and style, although it must be said that he scarcely looks the ideal being revealed to Senta in her dreams. The Daland of Signor de Reszké was one of the finest realisations of this part we have yet seen, and the applause with which he was greeted showed that the audience fully endorsed our verdict. The establishment closed on the 21st ult. with Rossini's "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," the prime donne having each had, as usual, a "gala night," which we presume is the modern word for a "benefit."

RICHTER CONCERTS.

THESE Concerts came to an end for the season on the 2nd ult., and closed well, St. James's Hall being crowded with amateurs, who recognised in a generally fine performance an earnest of continued effort leading to much future usefulness. The programme contained—as usual when it is the last—Beethoven's Choral Symphony, that great work having an entire "part" to itself. Herr Richter's reading of the "Ninth" is now too well known for discussion, and, as a good rendering will be taken for granted, our remarks need not occupy much time and space. Let us, however, emphasise the impression made by the three orchestral movements, especially by the Adagio, which was played best. The loveliness of this embodiment of all that in music is purest and most beautiful never had, we should say, a fuller exposition. It alone might have served to make the final Concert memorable. The rendering of the Allegro and Scherzo was not so free from blemish, but all faults were, to use a trite figure, no more than spots on the sun, which do not appreciably lessen the splendour of that luminary. We must, of course, place the Finale apart by itself, and, in noting the fact that the voices were not perfect, add an expression of regret that Beethoven so completely ignored the limit of their capacity. The Symphony was received with enthusiasm, something that may really be described as furore marking the applause bestowed, at its close, upon Herr Richter and his subordinates. Schubert's unfinished No. 8, in B minor, was the companion work, and Herr Richter made its worthiness in that capacity felt by all. The beautiful music, in which strength and grace are so exquisitely blended, laid a spell upon the audience. It afforded at once an emotional and intellectual feast, while exciting the imagination to an orderly exercise which restrains its powers within the limit of the artistic domain. Max Bruch's Violin Concerto (No. 1) also figured in the programme, giving Herr Schiever, the chef d'attaque of the orchestra, ample occasion to prove himself a solo violinist of considerable means. He played the slow movement with great expression and taste, and there was reason to believe, having regard to the entire performance, that Herr Schiever shines more in such music than in that requiring brilliancy and dash. He was much applauded—on many accounts deservedly. Wagner's "Kaiser" March made up the balance of the programme.

HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

THE first season of this Society in its reorganised form was brought to a successful conclusion on June 28 at St. James's Hall, and we may once more regard the Leslie Choir as one of the permanent musical institutions of the metropolis. An interesting feature in the programme of the final Concert was an unpublished Motett for double choir, "Thou wilt content them," by Gounod. The manuscript score of this piece is in the library of the Choir, and it appears to be a fragment of a setting of "Athalie." It is dated January 15, 1851, and is dedicated to Mr. John Hullah. There is also a memorandum to the effect that the original words, "D'un cœur qui t'aime, mon Dieu," were translated by Mr. H. F. Chorley. The music is neither elaborate nor original in any way, which, considering its date, is by no means surprising. As a curiosity, however, the trifle was quite worthy of performance. A new part-song, "Kind words," by Mr. Leslie secured a favourable reception, and the composer, who conducted it, was received with enthusiasm. A cleverly written humorous glee, "Little Jack Horner," by Mr. Caldicott completed the list of novelties. Among the pieces in which the Choir maintained its supremacy by excellent singing were the madrigals "In going to my lonely bed," by Edwardes, and "In the merry spring," by Ravenscroft. Miss Clara Samuelli, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley were the principal vocalists; Mr. Lazarus played a clarinet solo and Mr. Hollmann two solos for the violoncello. Mr. Randegger may be congratulated on the result of his first season as Conductor of this Choir.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

A STUDENTS' Orchestral Concert was given on the afternoon of June 27, at St. James's Hall, before a large and highly appreciative audience, the admirable system of instruction pursued at the institution being well displayed both in the executive and creative department. A Motett, "Blow ye the trumpet of Zion," by Mr. J. Cullen, shows much aptitude for vocal writing and a sympathetic appreciation of the words; and an Introduction and Allegro from a Symphony in D minor, by Mr. F. K. Hattersley, exhibits the possession of an inventive faculty, with good knowledge of orchestral effect, which augurs well for the young composer, and encourages us to hope for excellent work in the future. An Orchestral Romance in E flat, by Mr. C. S. Macpherson, although in parts over-elaborated, gives very decided promise; and a Pizzicato orchestral movement, by Mr. German Jones, is a charming little trifle, its warm reception, indeed, amounting almost to an encore. High praise must be awarded to Miss Alice Robinson, who gave the "Moderato" from Hiller's Concerto in F sharp minor with much success; to Miss Mary B. Sanderson, who performed Mendelssohn's Rondo in B minor with good execution and precision; and to Miss Dora Bright, who played the Andante and Rondo from Chopin's Concerto in E minor so well as to make us almost forget that it was the performance of a student. Miss Winifred Robinson won well-deserved applause for her rendering of the "Adagio and Rondo" from Spohr's Violin Concerto in D minor; Miss Thudichum showed marked improvement by her singing

The musical score is written for four voices (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and organ. It is in G major and 4/4 time. The lyrics are: "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works, in wisdom hast Thou made them all; the earth is full of Thy riches, full of Thy riches." The score includes dynamic markings such as p (piano), mf (mezzo-forte), and *mf . There are also performance instructions for the organ, including a note about the manual extending up to G and playing the right hand part between two asterisks on a soft four-foot stop.

ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE AND ACADEMY OF MUSIC FOR THE BLIND.

THE annual Prize Festival of this noble Institution took place on the 18th ult. with great success. It was in the nature of a double event, there being two places of ceremony and two ceremonials—the Festival of the "Royal Normal College" being held in the grounds of the establishment at Upper Norwood, while that of the "Academy of Music for the Blind" was celebrated in the concert-room of the Crystal Palace. These two, of course, are one, but the division gave variety, and was a pleasing element in the day's proceedings. The musical doings came first in order. They consisted of vocal and instrumental solos by the blind pupils, together with choral performances; the orchestra of the Crystal Palace, under Mr. Manns, lending aid in works requiring such help. We need not insist upon the pathetic interest that necessarily attached to the efforts of the students, whom misfortune had placed under the most cruel disadvantages. Indeed, the sight of those blind youths and maidens was infinitely pitiful, and, from one point of view, so full of pain as to be hard to bear. There was, however, a cheerful side to the spectacle, since it showed obstacles overcome, disadvantages well-nigh counterbalanced, faculties educated to a high standard, and sources of enjoyment so opened up as to place the blind almost on an equality with those to whom the precious sense of sight is not denied. Thus looked at, the Concert became a real "festival"—an expression of gladness that human ingenuity and human benevolence possess the will and the means substantially to repeat in these later times the miracles which, of old, opened the eyes of those who were born blind.

The Concert began with Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D major for organ, played by Mr. F. Turner, a youth obviously of uncommon qualities, which find on the "king of instruments" a congenial field for exercise. Mr. Turner did his work both upon manuals and pedals with dexterity and, generally speaking, with entire precision. His pedalling was particularly good—that is to say facile, neat, and accurate. For this and comprehensive mastery of his by no means easy task he obtained loud applause. Next came Mendelssohn's Psalm "Lord, how long wilt Thou forget me?"—a piece very rarely heard, and, sooth to say, not up to the highest standard of the master, but interesting, like everything from that accomplished pen. The solo part was taken by Miss Reece, an intelligent young lady, who used her good mezzo-soprano voice with considerable skill and taste, besides giving the music with touchingly fervent expression. As for the singing of the blind choir, it was excellent and most remarkable in that, without seeing the Conductor, they kept together perfectly, and took up every point with a precision that would have been creditable under the most favourable conditions. From Mendelssohn's Psalm to Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto was a step that showed how high is the aim of the instruction given in the College. The name of Mr. Alfred Hollins has been heard before in connection with these blind students. He it was who played at Windsor Castle before the Queen and made himself famous. On this occasion he essayed the greatest of all classical works for his instrument, and executed it to the wonder of an audience who gave him flattering tokens of their admiration. We shall draw no comparisons between Mr. Hollins and others free from the disadvantage under which he labours, but it is only fair to say that his playing in Beethoven's work had qualities of a high order. Rarely did the pianist touch a wrong note, while the passages were given with fire as well as facility, and the general sense of the music was so brought out as to prove that in this young man we have a really artistic and sympathetic nature. After the Concerto came Ambroise Thomas's "Connaiss-tu le pays?" feelingly sung by Miss Campbell, and then the choir gave two concerted pieces, "In going to my lonely bed" and an arrangement by Otto Goldschmidt of a song, "Lokkende Toner," by Kjerulf. The second of these pieces is very curious and characteristic, and its singing was a triumph of skilful training. Rarely has anything better been heard, so perfectly did the voices blend, such was the unity of their expression and the finish of their execution. This blind choir should certainly be more heard in London, since no better proof could be given of capacity on the one side and finished education on the other. Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia in E, played by Miss Jeannie Gilbert, brought the Concert to an end as far as the blind students were concerned, and the whole performance made upon all who heard it an impression not easily effaced.

The doings in the College grounds hardly come into the province of this journal; but we may state that they deepened the impression made by the Concert in respect of the thorough and healthy training which the students receive. Gymnastic exercises, drill, and various games followed each other in quick succession, and were performed with as much enjoyment as the spectators felt in witnessing them. The free action of the pupils, their confidence and vigour, were especially admired. It was as though training had given them another sense to make up for the one lost. At the close of the outdoor display a meeting was held in a large marquee, presided over by the Duke of Westminster, with the Right Hon. John Bright, M.P., as principal speaker and distributor of the prizes. The great orator made a touching speech in his simplest and most "Saxon" style, especially praising the work done at the College, and holding it up as worthy of liberal support. In that he was right. The Royal Normal College for the Blind is one of the most striking examples of "man's humanity to man" that "makes countless thousands" glad; and we felicitate its blind founder and conductor, Dr. Campbell, upon the success that has attended his labours.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S MUSICAL SOCIETY.

A very interesting amateur Concert was given in the large hall of St. Bartholomew's Hospital on Thursday, June 28. That the institution should possess a Musical Society is not so surprising in these times of musical development in every direction; but more than ordinary zeal is apparent in this instance, for, in addition to a male-voice choir of thirty vocalists, there is an orchestra of twenty-eight players. The former is directed by Mr. F. H. Carter, and the latter by Dr. F. E. Gladstone. As may be supposed, there are peculiarities in the proportions of the band. The violins, violas, and cellos number seventeen, but there is only one double-bass, and we find three clarinets, but only one oboe, and no bassoons. These inequalities are, of course, inevitable in an amateur orchestra and can only be redressed by professional assistance, which is not always an unmixed advantage. With so excellent a musician as Dr. Gladstone at the helm the Society is certain to be guided in a right direction. The instrumental portion of the programme consisted of works of the highest class, including Mozart's Symphony in D, No. 5; Boieldieu's Overture, "The Caliph of Bagdad"; and Mendelssohn's "Cornelius" March. Mr. N. Rushworth played the finale of Beethoven's rarely heard Piano-forte Concerto in B flat and, with Mr. F. Rushworth, a movement of Rubinstein's Piano and Cello Sonata in D, Op. 18. It would be invidious to particularise, more especially as the programme and its performance were alike creditable throughout. The rendering of some part-songs and glees gave evidence of good training on the part of Mr. F. H. Carter, who may also be complimented on his own part-song "Waken, lords and ladies gay." The audience was very large, and included a large number of the hospital nurses, whose picturesque attire heightened the appearance of the assemblage.

CHOIR BENEVOLENT FUND.

UNDER favourable circumstances and with the approval and co-operation of ecclesiastical and municipal authorities, a very successful Festival in aid of this Fund was held in Canterbury on the 16th ult. After rehearsing in the Cathedral the assembled choirs, numbering about seventy, and consisting of members of her Majesty's Chapels Royal, Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's, Rochester and Canterbury Cathedrals, Eton College, and St. George's Chapel, Windsor, partook of luncheon at the Fountain Hotel—the Dean of Canterbury being in the chair, supported by the Mayor, Archdeacons Farrar and Harrison, and other influential gentlemen. The service commenced in the Cathedral at 3 o'clock, when the following music was successfully rendered: "Lift up thine eyes" (Goss), tenor solo by Mr. Kenningham; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Elvey in A—continuation of Croft); "O give thanks" (Croft—generally attributed to Boyce), the verses sung by Masters Hodsdon and Nutter (Westminster), Messrs. Plant (Canterbury), Gawthrop (Windsor), and Kempton (St. Paul's); "The Lord hath chosen Zion" (Dr. Bridge), solo by Master Roper (Westminster); and "I will lay me down in peace" (H. Gadsby). The sermon was preached by Archdeacon Farrar, who gave a most eloquent discourse on Music, taking for his text Isaiah i. 3. Dr. Longhurst, Organist of the Cathedral ably presided at the organ. The choir, aisles, and transepts of the Cathedral were filled by a very large congregation, amongst whom were the Mayor and Corporation, who attended in state.

In the evening a Concert was given at the Music Hall, when a selection of madrigals, glees, and ballads was performed. Morley's "My bonny lass," "The Vikings" (Faning), Bishop's "Now tramp," and Horsley's "Nymphs of the forest" (male voices), were sung with excellent effect by the full choir, under the direction of Mr. W. Winn and Mr. J. A. Birch. Mr. Kempton in "The Bedouin's Love-Song" (Pinsuti), Mr. R. de Lacy in "Anchored" (M. Watson), Mr. Kenningham in Balfe's "Good Night," and Mr. Oldroyd (Rochester) in "The Sailor's Grave" (Sullivan) were received with the utmost favour by the audience, each vocalist gaining a well-merited encore. Messrs. Plant, Moulding, Higgins, and Rhodes (Canterbury) sang "This pleasant month of May" and "Come, gentle zephyr" with much success, and a very marked impression was created by the rendering of Goss's glee "Ossian's Hymn to the Sun" by Messrs. Frost, Kenningham, Gawthrop, Kempton, and Winn. The singing of the choirs of Westminster Abbey and the Chapels Royal in "O'er the starlit waters" (Campana) was a special feature in the programme, the young vocalists being warmly encored. The choir had the assistance, on this occasion, of Miss Jessie Griffin, whose rendering of "My mother bids me bind my hair" and "She wandered down the mountain side" was received with marked approval by the audience, an encore being awarded in each instance; and of Miss Marian Mackenzie, whose first appearance in Canterbury created a most favourable impression, her pure vocalisation and artistic singing of Bache's "Farewell" especially proving her to be worthy of the reputation she has already achieved in the metropolis and elsewhere. Dr. Longhurst accompanied throughout the evening. Much credit is due to the local secretary, Mr. J. Plant, for the excellence of the arrangements. We understand that the proceeds of the Festival are over £130.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

IT may fairly be said that there is but one event at present which has any special interest for the musical amateurs of the West Riding, and that is the preparation for the forthcoming Leeds Musical Festival. The first series of rehearsals, some thirty in number, was concluded with the past month, and the chorus will now be allowed a rest of four weeks before being again called upon. The works already rehearsed include Beethoven's Mass in D, Macfarren's "King David," Raff's "The End of the World," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," the Handel Selection, Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," Cellier's "Gray's Elegy" and some minor pieces. Beethoven's Mass has naturally occupied the greater portion of the labours of Mr. Broughton and his chorus, and the result is that the enormous difficulties of the work are clearly understood, if not successfully overcome as yet: that they will eventually be overcome is the firm belief of those who best know the capabilities of the Yorkshire singers. The choruses of the second and final part of Macfarren's new work have been received from the publishers (Messrs. Stanley Lucas and Weber) and carefully rehearsed: they contain more than one excellent specimen of the composer's characteristic skill in musical dialogue, and the concluding number is conspicuous for a fine fugue on the words "Glory be to the Father," in which the augmentation of the theme affords a grand passage for the bass part. Raff's Oratorio is already a favourite, although no idea can be formed of the important orchestral numbers from the condensed score already published; the choruses are, however, generally pronounced to be very fine, and are in themselves sufficient to secure for the work a place among the very best compositions of modern times. We are sorry to notice some serious defects in the translation from the German; the remedy, however, is fortunately easy in most cases. The Handel Selection has been just published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., and contains several well-known masterpieces. Barnby's "The Lord is King" (Psalm 97) has just arrived, but at the time of writing had not been put into the hands of the chorus.

Sir Arthur Sullivan paid a visit to Leeds on the 20th and 21st ult., when he directed two rehearsals of the chorus, at which Beethoven's Mass and Raff's Oratorio were satisfactorily gone through. He expressed himself highly pleased with the singing, and complimented Mr. Broughton upon the success which had already been reached.

Considerable difference of opinion exists here as regards the refusal of the Committee to engage Madame Albani as principal soprano. It seems to be agreed that the terms demanded by Mr. Gye were undoubtedly high, but there are not wanting those who assert that the decision of the Committee was somewhat hastily arrived at, and that their wishes might have been gained if further opportunities of negotiation had been allowed. It is, however, tolerably certain that no better substitute for Madame Albani could be found than Madame Valleria, whose singing at the Handel Festival seems to have given the greatest satisfaction. The other artists engaged are Miss Anna Williams, Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Patey, Miss Damian, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Henry Blower, Mr. Frederic King, and Mr. Santley. The skeleton programme is as follows: Wednesday, October 10—Morning: Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; Evening: Cellier's Cantata "Gray's Elegy," Beethoven's Second Symphony, Mozart's "Zauberflöte" Overture. Thursday, October 11—Morning: Raff's Symphony-Oratorio "The End of the World," Handel Selection; Evening: Barnby's "The Lord is King," Mozart's Third Motett, Bach's "O Guide of Israel," Rossini's "Stabat Mater." Friday, October 12—Morning: Macfarren's "King David"; Evening: Gade's "Crusaders," Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture, Wagner's "Tannhäuser" March and Chorus. Saturday, October 13—Morning: Beethoven's Mass in D, Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang."

The following circular to inspectors of schools in England and Wales has been issued from the Education Department: "1. In consequence of representations made to them by some of your colleagues, and supported by Dr. Stainer, Inspector of Music, my Lords have decided to prolong for another year the period during which each standard in a school may be presented for examination in singing in the division lower than that assigned to it in the instructions dated February 14 last. 2. September, 1884, may therefore be substituted for September, 1883, in the paragraph numbered N.B. 1 in Circular 219. 3. My Lords also agree that if a small school (with an average attendance of sixty or under) is taken in two divisions for the purpose of instruction in singing, it may be similarly divided for the purpose of examination in that subject; provided that, in the higher division, a fair proportion of the scholars are examined in the work of Division III. or (after September, 1884) of Division 4. (Circular 219, N.B. 2, 3)."

THE ordinary evening service at the Parish Church, Croydon, on Wednesday, the 11th ult., was made the occasion for introducing as an anthem a selection from "The Redemption," by Gounod. A very large congregation attended, and appeared to be deeply impressed with the grandeur of the service. The Parish Church choir obtained the assistance of about twenty-five boys and men from well-known London choirs, as well as several members of the local choirs, in all numbering between sixty and seventy voices. The shortened form of evensong was adopted. The Magnificat was splendidly sung to Dr. Stainer's fine setting in B flat. The Vicar explained the nature of the service, pointing out that great as was the value of congregational singing, it was not the only element in the praise of God, and briefly introduced the subject of "The Redemption," which was about to be sung. The selection commenced with the March to Calvary, well played by Mr. W. S. Hoyte (Organist of All Saints', Margaret Street), who presided at the organ throughout the service. This leads to the hymn "Vexilla regis," borrowed from the Catholic Liturgy. The rest of the numbers included the best and most popular parts of "The Redemption"—i.e., "From Thy love as a Father," "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," "Lovely appear," and the Hymn of the Apostles, "The Word is Flesh become." The whole was rendered with a precision of attack and quality of tone never heard in Croydon before, except perhaps at the meeting of the Cathedral Choirs some few years ago. The treble solos were sung with great feeling by Masters S. G. Smith, A. Harrington, Toop, and Walenn, and the tenor solos by Mr. Price. After the service Mr. Hoyte gave an attractive selection on the organ.

THE chief feature of interest in the fête of the London Board Schools at the Crystal Palace, on the 14th ult., was the Concert given on the Handel Festival Orchestra by a choir of 5,000 Board School children and teachers, under the direction of Mr. J. A. Birch, of her Majesty's Chapels Royal. The remarkable precision with which the youthful choristers sang the music allotted to them—notwithstanding the fact that they had not before been massed together, although, of course, each division had been rehearsed separately—reflected great credit on the patient training of the Conductor. The most noteworthy efforts were Mendelssohn's "Skylark's Song," Dr. Stainer's "Boys and girls of England," Thomson's "Boat Song," and Dr. G. C. Martin's "England, dear England," several trios being also very warmly received by the large and enthusiastic audience, amongst whom were Mr. Mundella, Mr. E. N. Buxton, and many other prominent members of the Board School system.

MR. W. S. HOYTE'S annual Morning Concert was given on Wednesday, the 27th ult., at Messrs. Collard and Collard's concert-room in Grosvenor Street, in the presence of a crowded and fashionable audience. Mr. Hoyte had the able assistance of Mdme. Edith Wynne, Miss Clara Samuelli, and Mr. Harper Kearton as vocalists, together with that of Mr. Victor Buziau (violin) and Mr. Charlton Speer (pianoforte). The feature of the Concert, aptly termed a "Pianoforte Recital," was naturally the pianoforte-playing of Mr. Hoyte, who at different parts of the programme contributed no less than fourteen solos, large and small, all save one (the "Maid of Orleans" Sonata, by Sterndale Bennett) performed from memory, as the term "Recital," if used correctly, implies. Few leading organists are also brilliant and accomplished pianists, but among these few Mr. Hoyte may certainly claim a prominent place.

THE annual Dedication Festival of St. Peter's, Regent Square, was held on Thursday, June 29. The services were full choral throughout, with high celebration, and the choir was augmented for the occasion. The Anthem at the evening service "Then Peter, fill'd with the Holy Ghost," composed expressly for this Festival by the Organist, was ably rendered. The service concluded with an Organ Recital by Mr. E. West, the Organist. The music was repeated on the following Sunday, when the Rev. J. Hill (Minor Canon of St. Paul's) preached an eloquent sermon. The trumpet obligato to the Anthem was well rendered by Mr. Solomon, R.A.M.

DR. STAINER acted as adjudicator at the Temperance Choir Contest held on the occasion of the National Temperance fête at the Crystal Palace, on the 10th ult. Fifteen Choirs competed, each singing G. W. Martin's prize glee, "All hail, thou Queen of Night," and a piece of their own selection. The first prize was awarded to the Cardiff Choir (Conductor, Mr. J. Davies), and the second to the Manchester Choir (Conductor, Mr. G. W. Lane), the Bradford and Portsmouth Choirs being bracketed for equal third prizes. Certificates of merit were also awarded to the Leeds, South London, and Swansea Choirs. The other Choirs were from Leeds (Wesleyan), Reading, High Wycombe, Streatham, Walthamstow, Tower Hamlets, Finsbury, and Kent Road. At the Brass Band Contest, Mr. A. J. Phasey was the adjudicator, and he awarded the first prize to the South Nottingham Band (Conductor, Mr. G. Hames), the second to the Wyke Band, and the third to the West Houghton Band. The first prize in the Drum and Fife Band contest was won by the Caroline Street (S.E.) Band (Conductor, Mr. J. A. Butcher), the second by the London Telegraph Temperance Institute Band, and the third by the Rastrick Band. Mr. J. A. Smith was the adjudicator. During the day, three great choral concerts (5,000 different singers in each choir) were given under the conductorship of Mr. F. Smith. Three good choirs also sang at the great Blue Ribbon Meetings held in the Opera Theatre; the Canadian Jubilee Singers gave a Concert, and the Royal Holdfast Handbell Ringers a Campanological Entertainment. Performances on the great Organ were given by Messrs. Alfred Rhodes, W. H. Jude, and Frederick G. Edwards.

It is with much regret that we announce the decease of Mr. H. F. Turle, the editor of Notes and Queries, who expired very suddenly of heart disease on the evening of Thursday, June 28, the first anniversary of his father's death. Mr. Turle was the fourth surviving son of the well-known Organist of Westminster Abbey, and was born in York Road, Lambeth, on July 23, 1835. In September, 1841, the family went to live in the cloisters of the Abbey, and Turle was educated at Westminster School, under Dr. Williamson, and afterwards under Dr. Liddell. His health being delicate, he was obliged to leave Westminster for a time and went to a private school at Lyme Regis. From Lyme Regis Mr. Turle returned to Westminster, and shortly after, having completed his education, he was appointed a temporary clerk in the War Office. But his tastes lay in a different direction, and in a few years he found more congenial occupation in the work on which he was engaged to the day of his death, first as assistant to Mr. Thoms and then to the late Dr. Doran, and finally as editor himself, he succeeding, on the death of Dr. Doran, in the year 1878. The service held in the chapel of the Savoy over his remains marked in a befitting manner the termination of a career which, short comparatively though it was, was long enough for his amiable qualities to earn for him a large number of friends in all stations of life, who will not soon forget the kind, considerate, and self-sacrificing man who has prematurely gone to his rest.

THE Grosvenor Choral Society gave its 137th Monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall on Friday, the 20th ult. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous, consisting of glees, songs by Mr. S. Noble, Mr. M. Frost, and Madame Helen Stark, and a pianoforte solo by Miss E. J. Davies. The second part comprised Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea," the solo parts being sustained by Madame Helen Stark and Mr. W. C. Burridge. The choruses were well sung. Amongst the other items may be mentioned an excellent rendering of Gaul's part-song "The Children's Hour." Miss Florence Hartley presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. E. R. Egerton conducted.

At the recent competition for the Sterndale Bennett Prize (purse of ten guineas), at the Royal Academy of Music, the examiners were Messrs. W. Dorrell, John Jay, and Oliver May (chairman). There were thirty-three candidates, and the prize was awarded to Frances E. Smith. The competition for the Heathcote Long Prize (purse of ten guineas) also took place with the same examiners. There were nine candidates. The prize was awarded to G. F. W. Crowther.

A MEETING was held at Grosvenor House, Park Lane, on the 11th ult., in furtherance of the movement for introducing the National Anthem into India. In the temporary absence of the Earl of Shaftesbury, the chair was taken by Sir William Andrew. Canon Harford delivered an address, in which he pointed out the advantages that would result from familiarising the natives of India with the strains of the National Anthem of Great Britain. The programme included the singing of the National Anthem in some of the Indian vernaculars—Hindustani, by Mirza Muhammad Bakir Khan, of Persia; Sanscrit, by Professor Max Muller; Bengali, by Rajah Sourindro Mohun Tagore, Mus. Doc., of Calcutta; and Guzerati, by Kaikhosro Kabraji, Esq., of Bombay. The music used was by Dr. Bull, Dr. Arne, Beethoven, Sir Julius Benedict, Sir Michael Costa, Gounod, &c. The performance was conducted by Dr. Bridge, Organist of Westminster Abbey, assisted by Mr. John Thomas, harpist to the Queen. The vocalists were H.H. Princess Hellen Rundhir Singh, of Kapurthala; Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Alice Lakey, Miss Carrie Brown, Miss Helen D'Alton, Miss Clara Myers, Miss Braham, Miss Constance Dunn; Mr. Percy Blandford, Mr. D'Arcy Ferris, Mr. George Colville, Mr. R. Hilton, Mr. W. Fletcher, Mr. R. Griffin, Mr. Frederick Dunn. A resolution expressing decided approval of the proposal for the introduction of the National Anthem into India was moved by Lord Mark Kerr, seconded by Professor Ramuswami Raju, B.A., of Madras, and unanimously carried.

On Saturday, the 21st ult., the fifth annual Festival of the Church Sunday School Choir took place at the Crystal Palace. The choir consists of teachers and scholars belonging to church Sunday schools and adult Bible classes within the metropolitan area. Its object is to promote a knowledge of vocal music, especially with the view of improving church and Sunday school psalmody. The choir, which occupied the Handel orchestra, numbered nearly 6,000 voices, eighty-five schools being represented, including contingents from Windsor, Croydon, and East Grinstead. The Concert consisted of two parts, sacred and secular, and both the staff notation and the tonic sol-fa notation were represented in the choir. Mr. W. Roston Bourke was the honorary Conductor, assisted by Mr. G. Hare, and Mr. R. Stokoe, Mus. Bac., Cantab., presided at the organ.

The members of St. George's Glee Union gave their usual monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on the 6th ult., when a good miscellaneous programme was well rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Woodhatch, Miss Nellie Watts, Miss Helen Heath, and Mr. Chaplin Henry. Two pianoforte solos were contributed by Mr. C. J. Richardson. The part-songs by the choir included "Softly fall the shades of evening" (Hatton), "Sir Knight" (Macirone), "The Carnevale" (Rossini), "The stars that above us are shining" (Weber), &c.; the Concert concluding with "Good night, farewell" (Garrett). The solos were taken by Miss Watts and Mr. Hannant, and the accompaniments were played by Miss Edith Mahon and Mr. F. R. Kinkee. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

"YE LONDON GLEE MEN," under the direction of Mr. Richard Mackway, gave a most successful "Ladies' Concert" at the Guildhall Tavern, on Thursday, 21st June. The programme consisted of glees, part songs, madrigals, &c., by Mellon, Cooke, Sullivan, Benet, Weekes, Beale, Goss, and Hatton, the various items being admirably rendered, and evidencing the result of careful practice under an able Conductor. The most noteworthy were "Flow, O my tears," "Crown'd with clusters" (Solo, Mr. C. Bishop), "Come let us join," and the "Steersmen's Chorus" from Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." Songs were also contributed by Mr. Richard Mackway, Mr. Frank Ward, Mr. Arthur J. Kestin, and Mr. Charles Bishop, and two pianoforte solos were performed by Mr. William Horsey, and encored.

Mr. T. ALBION ALDERSON announces that the first meeting of his Amateur Choir at Newcastle-upon-Tyne for the season 1883-84 will take place in the Church Institute on September 18. The works selected for the session are Goring Thomas's "Sun-Worshippers," Cowen's "Rose Maiden," Cummings's "Fairy Ring," and Mackenzie's "Jason."

THE arrangements for the Gloucester Festival are now complete. The list of works and names of singers were announced in our June number, and in addition it has been decided to represent (for the first time for many years) the old Cathedral writers by the performance of Gibbons's "Hosanna" and Bird's "Bow Thine ear." A very fine effect may be expected to be produced by the rendering of these works by the choir of 250 voices. The leadership of the band, held for so many years by M. Sainton, will this year be taken by Mr. Carrodus. Mr. C. L. Williams, Mus. Bac., the Cathedral Organist, will be the Conductor.

THE annual Distribution of Certificates to successful candidates at the Local Examinations of the Royal Academy of Music in Manchester took place on the 5th ult., in the large room of the Town Hall—Alderman Bennett in the chair. A selection of classical music, performed by some of the recipients of the certificates, gave great satisfaction to a large audience. Miss E. H. M. Hochstetter (one of the junior candidates), a rising young pianist, played Weber's Polonaise, Op. 72, with so much brilliancy as to secure an encore, and responded by playing Handel's Fantasia in C. Miss Biddolph, one of the Senior Honours candidates, also received a well-merited encore for her artistic performance of Chopin's Nocturne, Op. 27, No. 2.

WE understand that Concerts will be given by the Bach Choir next year on Wednesday evenings, March 19 and May 14, at which will be performed Palestrina's Mass, entitled "Assumpta est Maria," for six voices unaccompanied (which has been edited for the Society by Mr. W. S. Rockstro); S. Wesley's motett, "Exultate Deo," for five voices and organ; an unaccompanied motett, "Nunc dimittis," by Joh. Eccard (1598); a hymn, "Awake, my heart," for bass solo, chorus, and organ, by Mr. C. Villiers Stanford; Mozart's Requiem; Schumann's New Year's Song; and also important works by Sebastian Bach, and a selection of madrigals and part-songs. The Musical Director of the Society will be, as heretofore, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt.

THE post of Organist of Salisbury Cathedral, as to which we made some remarks in our May number, has been filled up, as many of our readers may be already aware, by the appointment of Mr. C. F. South, of St. Augustine and St. Faith's, Watling Street, E.C. Mr. South has been well known in London for many years, both as an excellent player and an earnest choirtrainer, his late church being noted for its choral service (which is fully cathedral, including choral celebration every Sunday) and its charming organ. This instrument, one of Willis's happiest efforts, although not quite the largest, is certainly one of the very finest in the City of London. Mr. C. E. Miller, of Lambeth Parish Church, has succeeded Mr. South at St. Augustine's.

ON Sunday, the 1st ult., a new Mass, by Signor Mazzoni, was performed, with full orchestral accompaniments, at the morning service at the Italian church, Hatton Garden. The numbers chosen on the occasion were the Kyrie, Credo, and Gloria, which although of a secular character, show the hand of a talented and experienced musician, who writes effectively for the voices as well as for the orchestra. Signor Frapoli, of the Royal Italian Opera, sang the principal tenor solos. Some numbers of Haydn's Mass in D completed the service, and at the conclusion Costa's March from "Eli" was played by the orchestra.

THE anniversary Festival of the Croydon Church Choirs took place in the Parish Church of St. John's, on Tuesday evening, June 26. The singing of the choir was excellent, showing a considerable advance on former years. Mr. Cambridge conducted and Mr. A. J. Eyre presided at the organ during the service, giving a Recital before and after the Festival. In the afternoon, Mr. F. Cambridge and Mr. C. J. Wood also gave Recitals on the organ.

MR. COWEN has accepted an invitation to conduct his Oratorio "St. Ursula" by Dr. Damosch's Choir in New York, on November 22, and he will probably remain in the United States during the winter, to direct performances of his compositions in different cities. Mr. Cowen has also been commissioned to write a new choral work for the next Birmingham Festival.

ARRANGEMENTS have been concluded by which Wagner's last Opera, "Parsifal," will be performed for the first time in England at the Royal Albert Hall this winter. The Opera will be produced in its entirety, but will be sung as a sacred Cantata, without scenery, costumes, or dramatic action. The objection to the representation of religious subjects on the stage will, it is assumed, not apply to the concert-room. The choruses will be sung by the Albert Hall Choir, and the performance will be conducted by Mr. Barnby.

The Directors of the Crystal Palace have arranged with Mr. Faulkner Leigh to give a second series of twelve grand Operas, commencing the 21st inst. The following artists are already engaged: Madame Rose Hersee, Miss Emily Parkinson, Madame Cave-Ashton, Miss Josephine Yorke, Miss Helen Armstrong, and Miss Palmer; Messrs. J. W. Turner, Walter Bolton, Lansmere, Aynsley Cook, and Faulkner Leigh. The following Operas are to be performed: "Maritana," "Faust," "Lurline," "Rose of Castille," and "Favorita" (first time at the Palace). Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," and Benedict's "Graziella" are to be placed on the stage for the first time in England. The chorus has been engaged from the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, and the band will consist of the Crystal Palace Orchestra; the series will be conducted by Mr. August Manns.

AN excellent rendering of Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" was given, under the direction of Mr. W. M. Sergison, at the evening service at St. Peter's Church, Eaton Square, on the Dedication Festival, Thursday, the 6th ult. The choir was only very slightly augmented for the occasion—a circumstance, however, which did not detract from the good effect of the service; the accompaniments were admirably rendered on the organ by Mr. Sergison. Barnby's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat (written for the Sons of the Clergy Festival in 1881) was the Service used.

THE Wolverhampton Triennial Musical Festival is announced to be held on Thursday and Friday, September 13 and 14. Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," Hummel's "Alma Virgo," Macfarren's "Lady of the Lake," and Mackenzie's "Jason" will be performed, the vocalists being Miss Anna Williams, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Miss Emilie Lloyd, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. J. Maas, Mr. F. King, and Signor Foli. The band and chorus will number 300, and will be under the direction of Dr. Swinerton Heap.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT presented medals on Saturday evening, the 21st ult., at St. George's Hall, Regent Street, to the successful students of the London Academy of Music. Previously to the distribution a musical performance was given to a crowded audience, under the direction of Signor Romilli. Sir Julius expressed himself highly gratified with the progress of the pupils, and wished the Academy every success in the future, paying at the same time a well-deserved compliment to the Principal, Dr. Wylde.

A SHORT time since a prize of five guineas was offered by the Council of the Hibernian Band of Hope, Lower Abbey-street, Dublin, for the best musical setting—song and chorus—for some verses written by an Irish lady, and originating in the Blue Ribbon movement. Sir Robert P. Stewart, Mus. Doc. (organist of Dublin Cathedral), who was the judge, has just awarded the prize to Mr. T. Simpson, organist and music-seller of Burnley. The song, which is being printed, will be sung at a forthcoming fête of the above Union.

MADAME HELEN HOPEKIRK gave a very successful Pianoforte Recital in Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, on Thursday, June 28. The programme was selected from the works of Handel, Beethoven, Schubert, Chopin, and Liszt, the various items displaying to advantage the brilliant and refined playing of the concert-giver. Madame Hopkirk's interpretation of Chopin's Fantasia in F minor and Schubert's Fantasia in C were received with the greatest favour.

WE understand that the numerous admirers of Sir Michael Costa are desirous of showing, by the presentation of a testimonial, their high appreciation of his many years' labours in the cause of art. As yet, we believe, the nature of this testimonial has not been decided upon; but there can be no doubt that as soon as it assumes a definite form the response to an appeal for subscriptions to such an object will be both ready and sincere.

THE Rector and Churchwardens of St. George's, Hanover Square, have lately acknowledged the ability of their organist, Mr. W. Pinney, Mus. Bac., Oxon., by devoting the offertory a few Sundays ago to the augmentation of his salary. The amount was about £40. For two or three years past this plan has been adopted, following the usual Easter Offertory for the Assistant Curates' Fund.

MISS DELIA HARRIS gave an Afternoon Concert on the 2nd ult., at Grosvenor Street, by permission of Messrs. Collard. The young lady possesses a contralto voice of beautiful quality and great compass, and exhibited excellent training in her solo and ensemble singing. Special mention may be made of her performance of Handel's "Lascia ch'io pianga." Miss Harris was ably assisted by Madame Edith Wynne, Madame Frickenhaus, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and Signor Carozzi.

MR. SINCLAIR DUNN gave his Entertainment "The Life and Songs of Burns" at the Birkbeck Literary and Scientific Institution, on the 11th ult., before a large and attentive audience. The vocal selections were extremely attractive, Mr. Dunn's voice being admirably suited for the sympathetic rendering of the thoroughly Scottish songs chosen for the occasion, and he was warmly and deservedly applauded. The lecturer was assisted by Mr. Archibald Henderson and a select choir. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Cecil Goodall and Master M. Dunn.

AT a meeting of the Scottish Musical Society it was decided to postpone the opening of the Academy of Music for another year, when it is hoped that the sum required to carry on the Institution for at least the first four years of its existence will be forthcoming. It is announced that subscriptions and applications for membership will be received by the acting secretary and treasurer, Mr. Robert A. Marr, 30, Hanover Street, Edinburgh.

A STUDENTS' Orchestral Concert was given at Trinity College, London, on the 3rd ult., under the direction of Mr. George Mount. The programme included Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor and "Rosamunde" Overture, Barnett's "Lay of the Last Minstrel," Mendelssohn's Concerto in D, and Weber's Concertstück for pianoforte and orchestra.

MR. J. S. CURWEN, President of the Tonic Sol-fa College, is, we understand, about to publish a Report of his recent tour undertaken with the object of studying the condition of music in elementary schools on the Continent. He has pursued his investigations in Cologne, Munich, Vienna, and Basle.

MR. CARL ROSA has acquired the sole right of representing Bizet's opera of "Carmen," in English, and has entered into an engagement with Mr. Mapleson for Madame Marie Roze to play the title rôle. The English libretto is written by Mr. Henry Hersee, and the first representation will take place on August 20.

WE understand that the service at Gloucester Cathedral on Wednesday afternoon will in future be sung by the lay vicars only, thus allowing the choir boys a weekly holiday. This change has been adopted on the recommendation of Mr. C. L. Williams, the Organist.

MISS MINNIE GOLDSMITH, pupil of Mr. George Mount, gave her first Pianoforte Recital at the Marlborough Rooms on the 12th ult. The compositions, selected from the works of Beethoven, Weber, Chopin, Prudent, Schulhoff, and Moszkowski, were interpreted in a highly efficient manner.

WE read in the Times that, matters having assumed a practical form, work at the new Italian Opera House, Victoria Embankment, will be shortly resumed, so that it may be completed, if possible, in time for the Italian Opera season of 1884.

MR. JAMES LOARING, F.C.O., has been giving Organ Recitals on Mondays and Thursdays at the Fisheries Exhibition. The programmes, which were of an interesting character, attracted large audiences.

MR. MACKENZIE'S Dramatic Cantata "Jason" will form the chief novelty at the forthcoming Wolverhampton Festival; it is also to be given in the composer's native city, Edinburgh, in February next.

REVIEWS.

The Life of George Frederick Handel. By W. S. Rockstro. [Macmillan and Co.]

MR. ROCKSTRO has succeeded in producing an eminently taking book; although extending to over 400 pages the reader's interest is never allowed to flag. The author has a very happy mode of conveying the contagion of his own enthusiasm for Handel and his works to those whose good fortune it is to peruse his life of the great musician. Other writers have supplied ample material for a biography of Handel, notably Chrysander and Schöelcher, and to their labours Mr. Rockstro owns himself indebted; but neither of their works fulfilled all that could be desired. Chrysander's splendid biography is incomplete, and Schöelcher's book lacks method and chronological arrangement. Profiting from the errors as well as the excellencies of his predecessors, Mr. Rockstro has in manner and method been highly successful, and it is not saying too much to affirm that at present his "Life" stands alone for completeness and accuracy. Not that Mr. Rockstro is always correct; indeed, he has made some serious misstatements, which shall be glanced at presently; and, notwithstanding the comprehensiveness of Mr. Rockstro's book, there is still much to be said and elucidated respecting Handel and his works. Mr. Rockstro warmly defends Handel from many of the charges of borrowing from other composers which have recklessly been promulgated. So far as our present information goes he is in the right, and we heartily sympathise with him in his endeavour to show the noble man and musician's character at its true worth.

Enough has been said to prove our warm admiration of Mr. Rockstro's book, and we can therefore now point out some of its defects. At p. 442 he devotes a whole page to arguments respecting the true date of Handel's birth, all thoroughly conclusive; but he does not seem to be aware of evidence absolutely incontrovertible printed and published by the Handel family in January, 1731—a document forwarded to Handel, the receipt of which was acknowledged by him in August of the same year. Both these interesting relics are in the possession of Mr. W. H. Cummings. Mr. Rockstro prints the letter of acknowledgment, and erroneously says it is in the possession of Handel's great-great-niece, Frau Prof. Senfi. On p. 13, speaking of the six Sonatas for oboes and bass, he says: "Burney afterwards saw this volume in the Royal Collection, but we have sought for it in vain amongst the MSS. at Buckingham Palace." If the volume is not there, it ought to be; for Dr. Chrysander transcribed the Trios from this very copy, and published them for the German Handel Society in 1870.

Mr. Rockstro is also mistaken in speaking of the Duke of Chandos's chapel at Cannons as being "now the Parish Church of Whitechurch, Middlesex." The belief is a popular one, but none the less erroneous. The chapel attached to the Duke's residence was pulled down when the palace was destroyed; its painted windows went to Great Malvern Church, and its organ to Trinity Church, Gosport, having been purchased at auction for £117 12s.

The curious story of the Goupy caricature is dismissed by Mr. Rockstro in three lines. He speaks of Goupy as "the scene-painter"; but he was a man in good position, drawing-master to Prince Frederick of Wales, and evidently of an amiable disposition, if the story of him related by Pasquin may be credibly received. Miss Hawkins, in her "anecdotes," tells us how Goupy's susceptibilities were wounded by Handel, and we must admit that he received provocation. Moreover, it is doubtful whether Goupy was responsible for the publication of the prints known as "The Charming Brute," which are distorted copies of his original drawing.

In Mr. Rockstro's analysis of "The Messiah" he twice refers—pp. 236-247—to the omission of two bars from one of the Ritornelli of "Every valley." He says, "the bars omitted by Arnold are the sixth and ninth, which in the original are filled with a twofold reiteration of the first group of quavers in the seventh and tenth bars respectively. In the Dublin MS. these two bars were once pasted over—certainly not by Handel, who, had he wished to eliminate them, would assuredly have done so by a couple of strokes of his bold lead-pencil." Now, unless our memory is very false, the autograph manuscript in Buckingham Palace has these very strokes of bold lead-pencil, and has also a long Cadenza at the end of the air. The pencil marks in the autograph are not reproduced in the lithograph facsimile published by the Sacred Harmonic Society, so that our assertion can only be tested by reference to the original. On p. 256, speaking of the series of short choruses commencing "Since by man," Mr. Rockstro says: "The organ part given by Arnold is an impertinent addition to the score. Handel has given, in each case, a single crochet at the beginning, to start the voices, that is all." This is not correct; in the second instance the starting note is a minim, not a crochet, and we are inclined to surmise that Arnold, who had frequently heard Handel perform in "The Messiah," simply indicated an organ part where Handel had been accustomed to play one. It must be remembered that the starting-notes referred to by Mr. Rockstro form part of the orchestral bass. Only a few pages later Mr. Rockstro gives us the anecdote respecting Joah Bates's additional accompaniments on the organ. Can any one affirm that Bates did not accompany these choruses?

With regard to the date of Handel's death, we incline to the 13th of April. The evidence of Dr. Burney and Dr. Warren are surely of more value than that of Mr. James Smyth, who took his last leave of Handel at 7 p.m. on Friday, and possibly called at 8 the next morning in Brook Street and was told by the servant that Handel was just dead, from which he inferred that he died on the 14th. On the other hand, Dr. Warren, who was with Handel at his death, stated it to have taken place before midnight on the Friday. Mr. Rockstro makes frequent reference to Handel's will. "This document," he says, "is preserved in the Registry of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury at Doctor's Commons"; but, as a matter of fact, it is at Somerset House, much the worse for wear, we are sorry to say. The first draft of the will, in splendid preservation, with all Handel's alterations and signatures, passed from Handel's executor, Amand, to the late Mr. Snoxell, and is now in the collection of Mr. W. H. Cummings.

To Dr. Chrysander belongs the merit of having rescued the fair fame of Zachau, Handel's first master; and now that Mr. Rockstro has placed the facts concerning Zachau before English readers, we may hope that the charges of idleness and drinking will no more crop up. Mr. Rockstro has some judicious remarks on the subject of additional accompaniments, and sighs for performances of Handel's works as he heard them himself. Such a rendering is simply impossible. Granted that we had a tradition of the filling-up played by Handel—and, alas! this we have not—where are the harpsichord-players or the instruments necessary for the realisation of the idea? We know that a Broadwood pianoforte of even twenty years of age would be scouted by a modern pianist for a public performance. How, then, can we imagine that in listening to a harpsichord made 100 or 150 years ago we are getting an approximation of the tone Handel produced on his harpsichords?

Album for the Young. Fifty-five Pianoforte Pieces. Composed by Robert Schumann, Op. 68 and 118. Edited and Fingered by Agnes Zimmermann. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS charming collection of pianoforte pieces is here issued in its correct form, namely, in three parts, the first intended for "little players," the second for "more advanced players," and the third for "more matured players." Schumann's original design is thus preserved, although the last part was written some years later than the others, the "Kinderscenen"—in English editions taking the place of the third part—having no real connection with the work. This is the first of a complete edition of Schumann's works for the pianoforte to be published by Messrs. Novello, and Miss Zimmermann tells us in her preface that the only pieces which Schumann has fingered in detail are Op. 3 and 7. These are left precisely as they appeared in the original edition. In all the other works he has only occasionally supplied any fingering; but in some instances his method appears so difficult that an easier system has been indicated by the editress, who, however, has invariably separated her own from that of Schumann. We are glad to find that Messrs. Novello have decided in their publications henceforth to adopt what is termed the "foreign fingering," the present being the first English edition of pianoforte music in which this appears. As Miss Zimmermann truly says, "It cannot be expected that the mode recognised by a majority of countries will be altered to that which is used in England alone"; and it is certainly better, therefore, that we should yield gracefully and at once in this important matter. It is almost unnecessary to enlarge upon the many beauties to be found in the volume before us, for most of the pieces are well known to pianists. For juvenile performers the group of little gems, including "The Poor Orphan," the "Hunting Song," and "The Merry Peasant," must always be acceptable; and in the two other parts the compositions are so excellent for practice, as well as so attractive from their melodious character, that we can scarcely imagine a more valuable book for young students, or one that will be more highly prized. The German terms and directions have been carefully translated by Miss Zimmermann, who has also rendered into better English than we have yet seen Schumann's "Musical Rules for Home-Life and Art-Life," which are appropriately placed at the commencement of the volume.

Zwei Clavierstücke. (a.) Walzer; (b.) Bourrée. Composit von Carl Reinecke. Op. 175.

Schelmstüchlein für Piano. Componirt von Fritz Spindler. Op. 340.

La Rose d'Espagne. Valse Espagnole, pour le Piano. Par E. Paladilhe.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

HERR REINECKE's two pieces, which head our list, are light in character, but instinct throughout with that artistic feeling so apparent in all he writes. The Waltz has a flowing subject, graceful, and lying well under the hand; but the Bourrée has a remarkable theme, the unusual skip of the seventh, so prominent through the movement, investing it with a piquancy which cannot fail to arrest the attention of the listener. The second subject too, with the murmuring accompaniment, affords an excellent contrast, and is an agreeable relief before the recurrence of the principal motive. Both these compositions are inscribed to "Fräulein Agnes Zimmermann." Herr Spindler's name is sufficiently well known as a writer of "drawing-room music" to ensure a welcome for any addition to his already large store of compositions of this character; and certainly the piece before us will take rank amongst the best of these. It is melodious, popular in character, and contains no passages to perplex even an ordinary amateur. "La Rose d'Espagne" is a piece thoroughly national in feeling. The Waltz, in A minor, is tuneful enough to catch the ears even of those who cannot appreciate the many other merits of the composition, and the changes of key give much life to a piece which from its nature might otherwise prove monotonous. This is one of the best of the many sketches we have yet seen from this composer.

The Morning and Evening Service, with the Communion Office, in G. By Gerard F. Cobb.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of this setting of the sacred offices is one from whom we should naturally look not only for musicianly but scholarly work, and it may be said at once that Mr. Cobb's service is worthy of attention by all who are interested in the history of the English Prayer Book. The first point for notice is the inclusion of the word "Holy" in the clause concerning the Church in the Nicene Creed, the omission of which in our prayer book version Mr.

Cobb believes to be due, in the first instance, to a mere printer's error. He also calls attention to the redundant section in the "Gloria in excelsis," which does not appear in Tallis's Service, nor in any of the early versions of the hymn. The composer sets forth the evidence in his favour on these and other points in an interesting preface which is well worth perusal by church musicians. A careful examination of the Service reveals other matters in which the ecclesiastical learning of the author has impressed itself on the music; such for instance as the stress placed on the word "one" in the clause "Being of one substance," and the correct division of the sentence, "The Lord, and giver of life." Enough has now been said to indicate the importance of Mr. Cobb's contribution to liturgical music, and it only remains to consider it in an abstract musical sense. In general the style is simple, homophonic and tuneful. There are no elaborate contrapuntal episodes, and though the harmonic progressions, like the melodic phrases, are essentially modern, they are never complex or difficult to sing in just intonation by an ordinarily well-trained choir. The idea of unity is imparted to the morning canticles by an oft-recurring figure which the composer has occasionally some difficulty in fitting to the words, as in the verse "Day by day," where the accent occurs on the last syllable of the word "magnify." In the Jubilate the "Old Hundredth" tune is introduced, first antiphonally with the melody afore-mentioned, and then as a canto fermo. The association of the tune with the canticle justifies this method of treatment. The Benedictus is set in free unisonal chant form, and most of the Communion Office is also in unison. The evening canticles are the most elaborate portion of the Service, the voices being frequently divided into six parts. We cordially recommend Mr. Cobb's thoughtful and effective Service to the notice of preceptors and choirmasters.

Original Tunes to Popular Hymns, for use in Church and Home. Composed by Joseph Barnby. Vol. II.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE spread of well-defined Anglican principles in church matters during the past quarter of a century has not only given an enormous impetus to hymnology, but has led to conspicuous reforms in the musical department of congregational worship. Earnest musicians began to take advantage of the reaction against the florid barbarisms of the eighteenth century, and by example rather than precept proved the applicability of modern art to the hymn tune without any sacrifice of that simplicity which is the chief essential in metrical sacred song. Among those to whom the thanks of churchmen are especially due for their labours in this field, Mr. Joseph Barnby occupies a foremost place. There is always danger of excess in reforming zeal, and it would be easy to point to instances of popular hymn tunes in which the composers have sacrificed devotional feeling to mere secular prettiness. Such an accusation cannot be brought against Mr. Barnby. While thoroughly modern in spirit, his lyrics never err on the side of secularity. The best of them are fresh in melody yet never trivial; expressive to the utmost of the words to which they are set, but chastened by religious sentiment and the requirements of congregational singing. In the first volume of his "Original Tunes" Mr. Barnby adopted certain changes from the ordinary method of notation, discarding the use of double bars between the lines, and making the crochet instead of the minim the unit of time measurement. The arguments in favour of these reforms must be irresistible, except to those ultra-conservative minds to whom the old is synonymous with the good. It was notorious that the double bar favoured the introduction of a pause at the end of every line, irrespective of metre or sense. For example, in the refrain of Hymn No. 15 of the present collection we should have had under the old system "Yet, Father, in the multitude—(pause)—of Thy compassions, hear," and similar absurdities in almost every example. In his preface the composer tells us that some of the tunes were written for the "Hymnary," "Church Hymns," the "Church Psalter," "Carols new and old," and the "Methodist Sunday-School Hymn Book." As the book purports to be a collected edition of his contributions to hymnology, it was only right to include every composition of importance since the issue of his first volume, nearly fourteen years ago, irrespective of the fact that they had appeared elsewhere. But the main attractiveness of the series will of course consist in the large number of tunes which are here printed for the first time. About thirty in a total of ninety belong to this category. As an acknowledgment for the favour with which his first collection was received in America, Mr. Barnby has set nearly twenty hymns from the "Lyra Sacra Americana." It would be impossible, within reasonable limits, to speak of the whole of the series as they deserve. A few examples must be selected, not so much because of their superiority to the rest as illustrative of the general merit of the book. The tunes are not numbered, neither are the names given of the authors of the hymns, so we can merely quote the first lines of those to which reference is made. In "Now the light of heaven is stealing" an excellent example is afforded of a six-line tune in the solid style, quavers being only introduced in the last line. "Lead us, O Father," is a worthy companion to Mr. Barnby's familiar setting of "Lead, kindly light." "O walk with God," double 8.7's, is bright and dignified, and next to this come two of the gems of the collection, "The radiant sun declining," double 7.6's, and "Still, still with Thee," 11.10's. The former, in E flat, has some striking, yet perfectly defensible, changes of key in the fourth and fifth lines, while the latter bears some resemblance to "The Pilgrims of the night," as set by the composer in the "Hymnary," with which it will compare in beauty. It has been remarked of the typical modern hymn-tune that it partakes of the nature of the part-song. The distinction is perhaps not always fully observed, and the setting of "He that goeth forth with weeping," from which we quote the opening lines, would certainly be more effective if sung by a well-trained choir than by a large and hearty congregation:—

This is an extreme example, and indeed not more than three or four of the new tunes are open to the charge to which we have referred. Among those which have appeared in other collections, a high place is due to the second in the volume, "O world! behold upon the Tree," in which the composer has happily caught the spirit of the old German Choral as it appears in the sacred works of Bach. A perfect inspiration is the setting of the Stabat Mater, taken from the "Hymnary," and, therefore, doubtless familiar to most of our readers. Anything more beautiful than this simple six-line tune in F minor can scarcely be imagined within similar limits. On the other hand, it must be confessed that Mr. Barnby is somewhat too fond of using chromatic chords where plain progressions would do as well or better. A conspicuous instance of this occurs in "When God of old," where a fine bold tune commencing thus—is injured by this effeminate close:—

In many cases, however, the end crowns the whole as in the ten-line hymn "O God the Lord," which has an exquisite refrain, worthy to close our list of quotations:—

It will be noted that the title of the volume states that it is intended "for use in church and home," and it will certainly be welcomed as a delightful addition to the repertory of Sunday music in the domestic circle, not less than by those who have authority in choirs and places where they sing.

2. The School Hymnal Tune-Book. Edited by John Adcock. [E. Marlborough and Co.]
3. Sacred Songs and Solos. Compiled and sung by Ira D. Sankey. [Morgan and Scott.]
4. Hymns of the Eastern Church. [J. T. Hayes.]
5. Hymns for the Church Catholic. [Hodder and Stoughton.]
6. The Church of England Hymn-Book. Adapted to the Daily Services of the Church throughout the year. Compiled and edited by the Rev. Godfrey Thring. [W. Skeffington and Son.]
7. Anthems for use in King's College Chapel, Cambridge. [Cambridge: Macmillan and Bowes.]

We have here a series of kindred publications, various in character, and unequal in merit.

1. This large collection of tunes (533) appears to us to be well chosen and adapted to its purpose. The Evangelical fervour of the hymns is matched by the music appropriated to them. Standard compositions, which have won their way to lasting popular favour by their intrinsic merits, are amply represented in the book, and the power of living writers to produce expressive and tasteful hymn-tunes is also very fully exemplified. It is of favourable omen for the real union of Christians of all denominations that no source has been neglected from which really good tunes can be drawn, and we cordially wish the collection a prosperous career.

2. This book purports to supply tunes for the many hymns in "The School Hymnal" and some other hymnals, for which none suitable are to be found in ordinary collections. The tunes, 207 in number, are chosen on the principle of including any that are appropriate, without limiting the area of selection; and this principle, which, as we have already remarked, prevails in the excellent "Methodist Sunday-School Tune-Book," has led, in the present instance, to the compilation of a volume which, as far as it goes, is comprehensive.

3. The preface to the "Christian Year" opens with these words: "Next to a sound rule of faith, there is nothing of so much consequence as a sober standard of feeling in matters of practical religion." This sentence we commend to the thoughtful consideration of all who take up this collection.

4. We are glad to give a cordial welcome to this interesting volume. The words of the hymns are the well-known translations by the late Dr. Neale of the "Hymns of the Eastern Church." The tunes have been partly adapted from ancient Greek ecclesiastical melodies by the learned editor, the Rev. S. G. Hatherly, Mus. B., and partly selected by him from modern Anglican composers. Such a collection must necessarily have somewhat of an eclectic character, but Mr. Hatherly has done his best to present what is unfamiliar, and what to some ears no doubt will sound strange and even uncouth, in an acceptable dress, likely to attract and retain some measure at least of general approval.

5. There is nothing specially remarkable about this collection, which contains 570 hymns. Most of the hymns usually to be found in modern compilations are included in it, but where hymns less well known are introduced, the choice does not appear to us to be generally happy. We notice also that the heads under which the hymns are ranged seem sometimes to cause what is called a cross division. In one or two instances we doubt whether the author's name is correctly given. But on the whole the collection is neither better nor worse than a score of others.

6. Mr. Thring claims to have produced a critical edition of hymns distinguished by sound doctrine and literary excellence, and we are bound to say that in both respects his book, which is large and well arranged, containing nearly 700 hymns, is worthy of the aims he has set before him. He has taken great pains to ascertain the authorship and the original text of every hymn he has thought worthy of being included, and we ought not perhaps to complain of the frequency of the recurrence of the word "altered," although it seems to savour of concession to modern usage such as we should scarcely have expected to find in a book compiled on Mr. Thring's principles. Mr. Thring has had the advantage, we observe, of the co-operation of Prebendary Hutton, and of that keen and indefatigable seeker after truth, Major Crawford. The collection should have a future before it full of praise and profit.

7. A comprehensive collection, clearly and cleverly arranged, giving full information with respect to the setting of more than 1,000 anthems, with economy of paper and print.

O may I join the Choir Invisible. Poem by George Eliot. Composed for Chorus, Solo-Quartet, and Orchestra. By Edward Hecht.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This charmingly sympathetic setting of George Eliot's beautiful poem adds one more to the many excellent works of Mr. Hecht which have already come before us. The opening chorus, in E flat major—commencing with a graceful and appropriate subject for the alto, and imitated in turn by the other voices—leads to a second chorus, well-contrasted in character, and evidencing the power of the composer to attract by the melodiousness of his phrases, as well as to interest by the skill of his counterpoint. The solo-quartet which follows, unaccompanied, is not only good as abstract music, but expresses with remarkable fidelity the words of the text; and the final chorus—opening with the symphony which begins the work, but now in the tonic minor—is admirably written throughout, an effective point being the repetition of the initial theme of the first chorus in the original key, thus giving a completeness to the composition which shows that the plan has been well designed before committing the notes to paper. The orchestral effects will no doubt materially enhance the beauty of Mr. Hecht's work; but even with the pianoforte accompaniment we cordially commend it to the attention not of choral Societies but of all high-class vocalists.

Ballade (dediée à Mlle. Teresa Russel) pour Piano. Par Oliver King, Pianiste de S.A.R. la Princesse Louise, Marquise de Lorne. [Schott Frères.]

This is an elaborate composition of very considerable difficulty, Mr. King having, in the act of composing it, given the rein to his fancy for crowding as many notes as possible into his score. On several occasions we have pointed out to the young composer that his advantage does not necessarily lie in the multiplication of details, but as he continues the process we must assume the existence of a good reason if we fail to discern its nature. The work before us opens, Moderato, in A flat, with a leading subject treated in polyphonic style. This is followed by an episode of a bravura character, in good contrast with a second theme, more simple than the first and having more distinctiveness. Both subjects are repeated in due form and the whole closes with an energetic and showy Coda. Some of the passages are very effective, and the piece in its entirety reveals earnestness combined with ability, but, not through such works will Mr. King achieve the end of his ambition. He must learn to make his art speak in plainer language.

Original Organ Music for Church and Concert use. By Edwin Allwright. [F. Pitman.]

We have only the first number of this work before us. It contains two surprisingly short and easy pieces, intended, we presume, for the Church. It cannot be said that they are not melodious, but the melody is of a commonplace order, and characterless. We note that this number of the "Original Organ Music" is catalogued as Op. 3, Nos. 1 and 2 in the composer's works. We shall be curious to see the Concert pieces when they are ready.

The Morning, Communion, and Evening Service. Set to music in the key of G major. By W. Claxton, B.A., Mus. Bac., Oxon. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The style of this work shows a distinct leaning towards the modern school of service writing, in the way of obligato, organ part, unison passages for the voices, frequent changes of signature, &c. It is not, however, an ambitious work, and it cannot be said to be strikingly original, but it is a useful and in many respects a commendable addition to this class of composition.

FOREIGN NOTES.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Boston Herald has interviewed Gounod in Paris, and reports the following: Gounod, after stating that it will be difficult for him to accept the numerous invitations which he has received from the United States, said: "I shall write no more for the theatre. The work which you see on my piano, and which occupies me now, is one of the most important works which I have ever composed. It is intended for the next Birmingham Festival, and is an Oratorio combined with a Requiem. The subject is 'Death and Life.' The motifs from the first part, which will be the Requiem, will be repeated in the second, but altered so as to express the joy of the souls of the saved in a new Jerusalem of the saints. It is a subject on which I have long meditated. I work seriously at it, and it interests me more and more every day. According to my idea music finds its noblest and most exalted forms in religious ideas and sentiments. You will find a religious vein running through all my Operas and larger works. Think of the cathedral scene in Faust and of Polyeucte, which is an entirely religious Opera. For this reason I have given up writing for the theatre."

The first—after the death of the great master—of the contemplated annual performances of "Parsifal" took place at Bayreuth, on the 8th ult., and, in spite of the expected falling-off of general interest now that Wagner's own personality does not attract the curious (many of whom did not mind travelling hundreds of miles to have a look at the great master), was very well attended. The caste was very much the same as last year, Herr Scaria and Frau Materna deserving special mention for the excellent performances of their most difficult parts. Herr Kapellmeister Levi acted, as before, as Conductor.

The celebrated Passion-Plays of Ober-Ammergau have found an imitation in a similar undertaking which has been instituted by a private society formed amongst the peasants of the village of Brixlegg. The plays, which are of the same character as those of Ammergau, are given every Sunday during the months of June, July, and August, and are said to be very well acted. The representations promise to be a great success, the more so as Brixlegg is conveniently situated in the vicinity of Innsbruck.

Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer" was performed for the first time with orchestra at Leipzig, on the 8th ult., by the celebrated choir of St. Thomas's Church and a select number of the Gewandhaus Orchestra. Dr. W. Rust, Organist and Choirmaster of this renowned institution of Church music, writes to us that the instrumentation (up to this time entirely unknown in Germany) proved highly effective, and was considered by all musicians present worthy of the best inspirations of the composer.

Franz Liszt has been presented by Messrs. Mason and Hamlin, of Boston, U.S., with a fine chamber organ, which is said to be worth 6,000 dollars. Liszt has transferred the present, as he always does on such occasions, to the Music School at Weimar.

At the Royal Opera House of Vienna 303 performances took place during the last season, comprising a répertoire of 78 different works. Of these 42 evenings were devoted to Meyerbeer, 41 to Wagner, 31 to Verdi, 23 to Mozart, 21 to Gounod, 16 to Donizetti, 15 to Adam, 14 to Boito, 10 to Gluck, and 9 only to Weber. Beethoven, with his "Fidelio," had to content himself with two performances.

The Directors of the reconstituted Italian Opera at Paris, which is to commence operations next autumn, are in negotiation with Mr. Gye to secure the services of Madame Albani. Other artists said to be engaged are Mesdames Fidès-Devriès, Tremelli, and Donadio, and Messieurs. Gayarre and Reszké. The celebrated baritone, M. Maurel, is the soul of the undertaking.

Massenet's new Opera, "Manon Lescart," is to be put into rehearsal at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, next October, and it is hoped that it will be produced about the end of the year. The principal part is to be "created" by Madame Heilbronn. It will be remembered that Auber has written an Opera on the same subject to a libretto by Scribe.

Our worthy contemporary Le Ménestrel revives the canard that the much-talked-of opera-house on the Embankment is going to be completed, but we will give our readers the singular quotation untranslated: "M. Mapleson fait en ce moment terminer le théâtre de l'Embankment (!) aux bords de la Tamise. Les 1,500,000 frs. nécessaires sont souscrits," &c., &c.

Signor G. Gariboldi has just finished the score of an Opera-Bouffe in three acts, entitled "The Three Hunchbacks."

Professor Dr. Hermann Zopf, a talented composer and one of the most eminent musical theorists in Germany, died at Leipzig on the 12th ult. Besides numerous instrumental and vocal works, he composed several Operas, but none of them have found a lasting acceptance on the German stage. The deceased was for a long time co-editor of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (formerly edited by Schumann). Many an aspiring young musician will regretfully miss the well-known matinées and soirées which were held at Dr. Zopf's house in Leipzig, and where all the artistic haute-voix of that musical town assembled weekly to listen to performances which were principally devoted to the production of works by unknown but talented composers.

We regret to announce the death, at Combs-la-Ville, near Paris, of M. Adrien Boieldieu, son of the celebrated composer of "La Dame Blanche," and himself the composer of several Comic Operas which have been played in France with some success. M. Boieldieu was sixty years of age.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I was pleased to read your correspondent's letter in the current number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, as it happens to be a subject in which I am much interested at the present time. Four months ago I started congregational practices here, on the first Sunday in the month, after evening service. Notices were posted on the church doors, and the Rector also publicly invited the people to remain and practise the hymns with the choir for the following Sunday. The consequence was some 200 people retained their seats, and although we have only had four practices, the congregation is now able to take verses of certain hymns entirely without the aid of the choir. But now comes the question—is the congregation to be asked to sing in unison or harmony? In my opinion unison is the best for a general congregation. The harmony that would arise from such a mixed body of voices would only prove of a very questionable kind, if not altogether distracting. With regard to the Psalms I do not think we should look to the S.P.C.K. or any other Society to supply us with Psalters, as Mr. Exley suggests in his letter; but I believe many would purchase copies for themselves, if they thought they could be taught to sing the Psalms from them.

I trust that some of our leading Church musicians will come forward with practical suggestions on this most important subject.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

WILLIAM E. ROGERS.

Whitchurch, Shropshire, July, 17, 1883.

THE COMPOSER VINCENZE MARTIN, OR MARTINI.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The omission of the name of the composer of "La Cosa Rara" in Grove's Dictionary is, no doubt, a mere oversight. There could hardly have been any relationship between Padre Martini and the Spanish Martin. Both names are common in musical history. I have before me a list of sixteen musicians named Martin, eleven named Martini, one named Martinn, and three Martino. A quartet from "L'Arbre di Diana," a Cavatina from "La Cosa Rara," and a Round, by V. Martin, will be found in the third volume of the Musical Library. G. A. C.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BERRY POMEROY.—The Annual Festival of the Totnes Deane Choral Union took place on Thursday evening, June 28. The whole of the choirs belonging to the Deane were present. The service was full choral. Mr. Newman Torquay, conducted, and his pupil, Master C. Edwards, presided at the organ.

BRADFORD.—An Organ Recital was given in the Church of St. Mary Magdalen, on the fine organ built by Messrs. Hill and Son, on Wednesday, the 11th ult., by the Organist of the church, Mr. F. A. Sewell. The programme included Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata No. 2, the St. Ann's Fugue (Bach), a Minuet by Smart, and an Andante by Ouseley. A special feature was the performance of Raff's Cavatina for Violin, which was finely played by Mr. W. B. Sewell. A selection of Anthems was contributed by the choir.

CATERHAM, SURREY.—The opening of the new organ in the Parish Church on St. James's Day was made memorable by the excellence of the services rendered by an admirable choir, consisting of twenty-five of Mr. Stedman's Choir Boys and a number of gentlemen of the first rank as exponents of Church Music, under the direction of Mr. Stedman. The solos in the Magnificat (Hopkins in F) "Praise the Lord" (Goss) and Wesley's "Wilderness" were taken by Masters Roy, Walen, and Willie Hull, Messrs. Frost, Kenningham, Stanley Smith, Hutchinson, and Ralph Hutchinson. Mr. J. E. Street presided at the organ with very great ability. Large congregations attended both services.

CHELMSFORD.—An Organ Recital was given by Mr. F. R. Frye, F.C.O., at St. Mary's, on Wednesday evening, the 18th ult. The programme was selected from the works of Batiste, Rossini, Guilmant, Mendelssohn, Bach, and Handel. A few collects were read before and at the conclusion of the Recital by the Rector. There was a large congregation, and the pieces were much appreciated.

COVENTRY.—The new organ erected by Porritt, of Leicester, in the Church of All Saints, was opened by Dr. C. J. Frost, of London, on Wednesday evening, the 4th ult., when his masterly performance of an excellent programme was much appreciated by a large congregation.

DUDLEY.—The reopening of the Parish Church took place on Wednesday and Sunday, the 18th and 22nd ult. Sermons were preached by the Rev. Lord Alwyne Compton, Dean of Worcester, the Rev. L. B. Penley, the Rev. Mr. Blair, of Worcester, and the Rev. Mr. Ross. The processional hymn was "We love the place, O Lord," and the recessional "The Church's one foundation"; Dr. Cosens, Vicar and Rural Dean, intoning the service. Master Reginald Graham Margetson, of Mr. Stedman's Choir, London, sang the solos "How beautiful are the feet" and "He shall feed His flock," from The Messiah, excellently; he has a splendid voice, and promises to take high rank as a soloist. The choir sang Dr. Stainer's anthem "Awake, awake," the quartet being efficiently rendered by Master Margetson, Mr. Bate, Mr. R. A. Hartley, and Mr. T. H. Goodwin. On Sunday morning Dr. Stainer's anthem was again sung, and in the evening selections from The Creation, the recitatives being taken by Messrs.

Hartley, Timmins, and G. H. Mainwaring, members of the Choir. The trio "On These each living soul waits" was finely sung by Messrs. Margeson, Messrs. Hartley and Mainwaring; the chorus "And the heavens are telling" was given with grand effect. Mr. F. S. Garton, the Organist of the Church, played the Chaos music excellently, and accompanied throughout like a thorough musician.

DUNCOM.—The members of the Greenock Orpheus Club gave a Concert in aid of the Cottage Homes, in the Burgh Hall, on Friday, June 29. The programme was well selected and highly appreciated. Mr. Middleton conducted.

HASTINGS.—The opening of the new Roman Catholic Church, St. Mary Star of the Sea, took place on the 2nd ult., in the presence of a large congregation. The processional and dedication hymn was "Ave Maria, Stella," played by the composer, Mr. Gordon, Organist of the Italian Church, London. The Mass was Haydn's N. 4, which was sung by the St. Mary Star of the Sea choir, supplemented by some singers from the Italian Church. The offertory piece was Gounod's "Ave Maria," excellently rendered by Master Albert Hannagan, from the Oratory, Brompton. Mr. F. Thomson, Organist and Choirmaster of the church, directed the whole of the musical arrangements.

KEIGHLEY.—The Dedication Festival in connection with St. Peter's Church was this year very successfully celebrated on St. Peter's Day, June 29. Besides other services during the day, there was full choral evensong, the Service being Field in D, and the Anthem "Praise the Lord," by Sir George Elvey. On the Saturday following an Organ Recital was given by Mr. R. H. Moore, of St. John's, Ingham, amongst the pieces performed being Mendelssohn's Sonata in D minor, No. 6, Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C, and Handel's Sixth Concerto in B flat. The Recital was highly appreciated, and the organist displayed to advantage the variety of stops the organ (erected last year by Messrs. Driver and Lupton, of Keighley) contains. At intervals during the Recital, Mr. Harry A. Marriner, the Organist and Choirmaster, conducted the voluntary choir (which was strengthened for the occasion) in a selection of sacred music, Mr. H. Waddington, of Bradford, singing "If with all your hearts," from Elijah. At the service on Sunday morning Dyke's Te Deum in F was sung, the Anthem in the evening being "My soul truly waiteth," by William Rea.

KENDAL.—The new organ, erected in St. George's Church by Messrs. Wilkinson and Sons, was opened on Thursday, the 5th ult., by Mr. Smallwood, who displayed the power and many beauties of the instrument to the greatest advantage.

LADOCK, CORNWALL.—In our last month's issue the name of the Rev. S. Raffles-Flint, in connection with the recent Concert, was omitted. This gentleman was the sole originator of the entertainment, and his efforts as Choirmaster and Conductor of the choir were fully appreciated.

LIVERPOOL.—A very handsome and artistic illuminated address was recently presented to Mr. James J. Monk, in the presence of a large gathering of ladies, at the Philharmonic Hall. The subscribers consisted of past and present pupils who wished to show their esteem and respect for Mr. Monk in some tangible form. Major R. G. Stewart was in the chair, and the address was presented by Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. Bac., Oxon., visiting examiner to Trinity College, London.

MOSSLEY.—On the 15th ult., at St. Joseph's Catholic Chapel, the annual sermons on behalf of the Day and Sunday Schools were preached by the Rev. Father Sherman, Pastor of the Liverpool Catholic musical portion of the service consisted of Haydn's No. 2 Mass, with the Credo from the same composer's "Imperial." The solos were excellently rendered by Mrs. Berry, Miss Kane, Mr. Tom Maude, Mr. Meredith, and Mr. Leahy. The singing of the Qui tollis by Mr. Meredith was worthy of the highest praise, and the other soloists gave great satisfaction. At the evening service a special feature was the singing of Zaccarelli's Laudate by Mr. Tom Maude and the choir. Mr. Kane conducted, and Mr. James Kane presided at the organ. The congregations were large at both services, and the offertory amounted to £40.

NEWPORT, ESSEX.—The eighth Annual Festival of the North-West Essex Choral Association was held on the 10th ult. At the evening service Dr. Stainer's Cantata The Daughter of Jairus was very effectively performed, the tenor solos being taken by Mr. Kenningham, of St. Paul's Cathedral. The choruses were well rendered and very successful, owing chiefly to the energy and care expended in training the choir by the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. R. Lemaire, and Mr. R. M. Tappin presided at the organ, which has just been enlarged.

NORTH BERWICK, N.B.—On Wednesday, the 15th ult., the first Organ Recital of the season was given at St. Baldred's Church by the Organist, Mr. T. S. Guyer. A well-selected programme was admirably rendered and highly appreciated by a large audience.

OLDHAM.—The usual Monthly Concert was given in the Tit-Bits Coffee Tavern on Wednesday, the 15th ult. The members of the Apollo Musical Society were the artists, Mr. J. Greaves accompanying; and solos on the flute and violin were contributed by Messrs. Smith and Hall respectively.

ST. AUSTELL.—The Sunday School Teachers' Festival was held in Holy Trinity Church on the 5th ult. There was full choral service. Mr. C. E. Juleff presided at the organ, and gave at the conclusion of the service one of Batiste's grand Offertories.

SCARBOROUGH.—At the Aquarium the performances of the band, under the direction of Mr. Victor Buziau, continue to be a powerful attraction, and the solos of Mr. Buziau (violin) and his daughter Mollie (piano-forte) are received with the warmest marks of approbation. Recently the singing of Miss Essie Holt has been an important feature in the Concerts, both her voice and style being much admired.

TWYDREDALE, CORNWALL.—The annual assemblage of the District Association of Church Choirs, now augmented to about 300 voices, took place at the beautiful Parish Church on the 19th ult., and the result was in every respect most praiseworthy, reflecting credit on Mr.

C. E. Juleff, the Director of the Choirs, who conducted from the lectern. The processional hymn was "Disposer supreme." The confession and responses were sung in harmony, unaccompanied, and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, arranged by Dr. Stainer, was most striking. Amongst the hymns which followed special praise must be given for "O, Love, how deep" (harmonised by Bach), the tenors and basses rendering their parts with due precision, and with the full observance of light and shade. The Rev. H. N. Wheeler acted as Precentor, and Miss Heaton judiciously accompanied on the organ.

WATFORD.—The students of the Watford School of Music gave a Concert, on the 16th ult., in the large Hall of the Public Library, before a numerous audience. Much talent was shown in every department, Miss Kingham, the Misses Ray, Miss E. Barnes (only nine years of age), Miss Plews, Miss Alice Wilson, Miss K. S. Burns, and Miss Goodson exhibiting good executive power and careful training as pianists; Miss Alice Wilson, Miss K. S. Burns, Messrs. W. J. Brooks, C. Healey, and G. Young contributing several solo vocal pieces to great decided success, and a violin duet being ably rendered by the Misses Roy. The Concert was conducted by Miss Alice Brooks, hon. secretary to, and Mr. Henry Baumer, head master of, the School.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. W. Donne Smith, Organist and Choirmaster to Holy Innocents' Church, Hornsey.—Mr. Thomas E. Leete, Organist and Director of the Choir to Hovingham Church, Yorkshire.—Mr. John S. Brown, Organist and Choirmaster to St. John's Church, Ballinacree.—Mr. Frederick W. Lacey, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Saviour's Church, Walthamstow.—Mr. C. C. Caird, to Llandewi Skirrid Church, near Aberystwyth.—Miss Brook, to St. George's Church, Tredegar.—Mr. Stretton Swann, Organist and director of the choir of Holy Trinity, Gray's Inn Road, W.C.

CHOIR APPOINTMENT.—Mr. Charles Blagbro (Principal Tenor) to Leeds Parish Church.

SONGS FOR SAILORS

WRITTEN BY
W. C. BENNETT

SET TO MUSIC BY

J. L. HATTON.

ONE VOLUME, OCTAVO, CONTAINING FORTY SONGS:

Trafalgar.	Saturday night at sea.
Would you be a sailor's wife.	Duncan at Camperdown.
A fisher-wife's song.	Run.
Nay, never cry, lass.	Rodney and De Grasse.
A kiss to take to sea.	From sea.
Homeward bound.	A wife's song.
The Nile.	The winds, inconstant ever.
The apparition.	Old Benbow.
The Dutchman's broom.	There's nothing like a smoke.
Take me, lass, for life.	The seaby's dream.
The fine old English admiral.	A song of the sea.
Ring, happy bells.	The wife for a British sailor.
The forsaken.	We roam and rule the sea.
The sailor's dream.	The homeward watch.
To sea.	Off to sea.
Rooke in the Bay of La Hogue.	A mother's song.
A thousand leagues away.	Here we sit by our Christmas fire.
Strike, and strike hard.	A Christmas song.
Were I that gull.	Outward bound.
Hawke in Quiberon Bay.	Herrings are in the bay.

With Illustrated Cover and Engraved Portrait of H.R.H.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

NEW PART-SONG. PRICE 3D.

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

This Part-Song, written for, and dedicated to, the Kyrie Society, is laid out in Mr. Gaul's very best manner, and while recalling, for its beautiful effects, his elegant Part-Song, “The Silent Land,” the resemblance begins and ends there. Mr. Gaul knows to the very letter the capabilities of the voices he writes for, and one is perfectly safe, even after a single experience only, in predicting a widespread popularity to “The Children's Hour.”—Birmingham Daily Mail.

(The usual discount allowed to the Profession.)

BOOK I. of Herr A. HOERING'S NEW METHOD FOR THE PIANOFORTE on an entirely new principle, complete in Six Books. It is quite impossible for us to learn to play the Piano well unless we learn to understand what we play. A mere parrot-like performance may be good enough for the uneducated, but is quite unworthy of intellectual beings who strive for something higher. By the above method musical students are trained from the very beginning, in a systematic course of 120 lessons, to become thorough musicians, by learning to understand what they play at the same time as they are trained to become clever performers on the Piano. All conscientious teachers of music who are anxious about the sure and rapid progress of their pupils ought to send for a specimen copy of Book I. and a Prospectus, containing full particulars, from the Author, 1, Cambridge Road, Teddington, or may be ordered from the publishers, NOVELLO, EWER and Co., London.

A few testimonials out of many:—

"Dear Sir,—Book I. of your New Method to hand this morning. I like it immensely, and when Book II. is ready please send it to me. I shall introduce it to my pupils, &c."

"Yours faithfully,"

"N.—Road, Middlesbrough, July 6, 1883."

"Dear Sir,—Many thanks for sending me your Method for perusal. I must say it is an excellent method and worthy of all teachers' notice, and I will introduce it to all my pupils. You may send me another copy of Book I., for which I enclose stamps."

"B.—House, Margate, July 10, 1883."

"Sir,—I find your method excellent."

Important to all who are anxious to become First-class Performers on the Piano.

WHY WASTE your TIME and your MONEY by paying high fees for MUSIC LESSONS by the Old Method, by which you will never become intellectual and first-class Players, when a single Lesson for 10s. 6d. from Herr A. Hoering, 1, Cambridge Road, Teddington, either by correspondence or personally (where possible), will be sufficient to point out to the intellectual and earnest Student of Music the only correct and reasonable way for making the most rapid progress in the shortest possible time? An incredible amount of time, labour, and talent (and money too) is wasted annually with the old Method, that can never effect what it pretends to do, and thousands are misled by its ostentatious pretensions. The mere mechanical Training of the fingers for brilliant execution might do for the uneducated and the indolent, but is unworthy of intellectual beings, who strive for something higher. With Herr A. Hoering's new Method, the Technical Training goes hand in hand with the Intellectual Training of the Students, whereby an immense amount of time and labour is saved. Write for Prospectus, containing Terms and numerous Testimonials from pupils, to the above address.

Now ready.

OFFERTORY SENTENCES

SET TO

TUNES FROM "THE HYMNARY"

BY

J. POWELL METCALFE.

Price Fourpence.

PREFACE.

There is an ever increasing conviction that decency and order are better promoted by the singing than the saying of the Offertory Sentences—and that not only in our larger, but in our smaller churches as well. In the latter the adoption of the desired use is to a great extent prevented by the anthem character of the music employed in the usual offertory setting.

The following arrangements are more especially intended for the use of those choirs who, not being regularly trained in anthem-singing, are accustomed to rely on the tunelessness, form and compactness of the hymn-tune for aid in fittingly rendering the words they sing.

A consideration of the prevalent theoretical and practical defects in its construction, with Plans and Suggestions for their removal, by THOMAS CASSON, Denbigh.

34 Pages, with 20 Lithographic Illustrations. Paper cover, 1s. 6d. Cloth, 2s. Postage, 14d.

Published by the Author; also by W. REEVES, 185, Fleet Street, E.C. Cae Derw, Denbigh.

WAGNER'S OLD ABBEY MARCH for Piano or Organ. "Is very grand."—Church Review. "Will be played with mingled feelings of pleasure and delight."—Brighton Review. "Well written and inspiring."—Graphic. "We can confidently recommend it."—Brighton Gazette. Post-free 18 stamps. W. CZERNY, 211, Oxford Street.

The Rev. THOMAS HELMORE begs leave to call attention to the following NOTICE:—

ACCOMPANYING HARMONIES, from Orlando di Lasso, to the "MAGNIFICAT" in the CANTICLES NOTED; numbers vii. to xv. inclusive. vii. and xv. were published some years since, as also number viii. to music by Palestrina. It is purposed to add the other six, as referred to in the CANTICLES NOTED, SECOND SET; and to publish the nine in one 8vo. vol., as soon as a sufficient list of purchasers can be secured. The friends of the Editor, and all persons interested in the cultivation of the Canto Fermo, and Canto Figurato, of true Church Music, are requested to send orders for the work to Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., without delay. The price will be 3s. 6d., and the work will be published as soon as warranted by the encouragement thus afforded. N.B.—About 35 copies must be sold to cover the cost of publishing at the price named above.

THE HOLY CITY

A SACRED CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen. "A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The Holy City" is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

THE ONLY PATENT ACTION

FOR ATTACHING

ORGAN PEDALS

TO A

PIANOFORTE

PATENT LEVER ACTION

HER MAJESTY'S ROYAL LETTERS PATENT HAVING BEEN GRANTED ONLY TO THE LEVER PRINCIPLE.

Members of the Musical Profession and Trade are requested to note that Ainsworth holds the exclusive right of this "the only Patent Pedal Action."

J. AINSWORTH

Inventor and Patentee of the above, also Sole Proprietor, begs to draw the attention of the musical profession and trade to the fact that (having access to the finest and most improved machinery of the present day) the workmanship of Pedals and Action supplied by him is that which is sure to command favour.

PRICES OF PATENT ACTION AND ORGAN PEDALS:

A.O. Set of Straight Pedals and Patent Action,

£6 15s. 0d.

B.O. Set of Radiating Pedals and Patent Action,

£7 15s. 0d.

C.O. Set of Straight Concave Pedals and Patent Action, as recommended at the Organ Conference,

£7 15s. 0d.

D.O. Patent Action only,

£4 4s. 0d.

EXTRA FOR IMPROVEMENT, on above prices, whereby the Organ Pedals can be Disconnected, Removed, and Replaced Instantly,

15s. 0d.

SPECIAL C.O.

Special C.O. A Set of Straight Concave Pedals and Patent Action with all improvements complete, price £12. Those who desire a really SPLENDID SET OF ORGAN PEDALS should procure the Special C.O. They are made from solid Mahogany through highly French polished, and of superior finish. The Springs of all Ainsworth's Pedals are adjusted to an equality by a new process, which ensures an accuracy hitherto unattained.

NOTE.—Should at any time a new invention for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte receive Her Majesty's Royal Letters Patent the legal definition, "The only" &c. shall at once be changed.

TESTIMONIAL.

"Mr. Ainsworth,
"Dear Sir,

"I was exceedingly pleased with the inspection of Pedals and action you kindly invited me to at your establishment previous to purchasing a set for one of my pupils at Burnley. I am now glad to say my pupil is highly pleased with them, and I must confess that the Pedals are much less noiseless in working than any I have seen. The Patent Action I consider a model of perfection, and I feel sure it will establish itself as the Perfect Pedal Action for Pianofortes. Several organists have made inspection and express themselves thoroughly satisfied. The disconnecting movement is most simple and useful, and the removal of pedals being instantaneous is a very desirable accomplishment. I remain, yours truly,

"JAMES HACKING,

"Organist, Parish Church, Padiham."

"Padiham, June 22, 1883.

HIGHEST TESTIMONIALS HAVE AND ARE BEING

CONTINUALLY RECEIVED.

The want of means for adequate Organ Pedal Practice has invariably retarded the progress of almost every anxious Organ Student. In support of the above statement it is only necessary to mention the fact that an Organ Student very rarely makes any progress until he has secured for himself means for adequate pedal practice, and it is often seen that a more talented person is left far behind through lack of such means.

THE UNPARALLELED SUCCESS WHICH HAS ATTENDED AINSWORTH'S "THE ONLY PATENT PEDAL ACTION" IS DUE TO ITS SUPERIORITY AND THE FACT THAT IT FULLY SUPPLIES A LONG-FELT WANT—viz.,

A PLEASANT AUXILIARY FOR ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS ABSOLUTELY FREE FROM ANNOYANCES.

"The extreme simplicity of the action renders the attachment most easy."

PEDALS ATTACHED TO HARMONIUMS AND AMERICAN

ORGANS. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED.

TRADE AND PROFESSIONAL TERMS LIBERAL.

Letters Patent from the French Government have also been received by the Inventor.

Members of the Musical Profession and Trade are requested to apply to the Inventor and Patentee for the Drawings, full Explanations, and Prices of this the latest and most improved

PATENT ACTION

FOR

Attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte

WHICH ACTION HE HAS, AFTER CONTINUED STUDY, BROUGHT TO PERFECTION, and GAINED THE APPROVAL OF HER MAJESTY'S COMMISSIONERS OF PATENTS.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE says:—

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. WM. CHINNOCK DYER's Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ. "It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils."

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, is easily attached to any Pianoforte. £ 8.

Those who already have a set of Pedals can be supplied with the PATENT ACTION only, price £4 4s.

ADDRESS—WM. CHINNOCK DYER,

INVENTOR AND PATENTEE,

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

To show the popularity gained by this invention, and the way it is making in the houses of organists and students, the last Patent Action sent out previous to March 1 was numbered 2,024; thus it will be seen that the turn-out for six months as above will give a total of over 4,000 per annum.

Agents are required in every Town. Apply to the Inventor and Patentee as above.

CAUTION.—This being the latest Patent Pedal Action, intending purchasers should note that it is the most perfect and reliable, as it contains every improvement; and being manufactured solely of well-seasoned mahogany, carefully bushed with red cloth, will continue to give the very best Pedal practice to Organists and Students.

Kindly read the testimonial above.

Before purchasing send to the Inventor for the drawings and prices of this the most recent Patent Pedal Action.

Organists should recommend these Pedals and Patent Action to their Pupils.

OLD IRELAND

A COLLECTION OF ANCIENT IRISH MELODIES

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY THE
AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN"

THE SYMPHONIES AND ACCOMPANIMENTS BY

BERTHOLD TOURS

Price 2s. 6d.

PREFACE.

Some years ago I found, among the Petrie Collection, many rare and beautiful Irish airs, to which from time to time I wrote words. The result is the present publication.

Mr. Berthold Tours has, in his symphonies and accompaniments, done exactly what should be done with national melodies—namely, as little as possible. For such music, simplicity is the truest art.

Being myself an Irishwoman, my work has been a work of love; hoping to sing—not sermonise—into the English heart a tenderer feeling towards Old Ireland. I prefer to dwell, not on the faults, but the virtues of my people; their domestic purity, their strong affections, their innate loyalty, courage, and fidelity; also, last, not least, their indomitable gaieté de cœur, which implies neither hardness, shallowness, nor selfishness of heart, yet which the Celtic nature to tide over trouble in a way which the more sombre Saxon can hardly understand. If I can do this, I shall go on singing. Thus taking up Thomas Moore's harp, I may lay it down, as he did, with his own farewell words—

"I was but as the wind passing heedlessly over,
And all the wild sweetness I waked was thine own."

THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

MUSICAL BIOGRAPHY, by DAVID BAPTIE.—NOTICE TO THE TRADE AND PROFESSION.—In consequence of the many personal applications and of the numerous letters received by nearly every post from subscribers and others requesting copies of Musical Biography at once, Messrs. W. MORLEY and Co. beg to publicly announce that, owing to the unexpected daily demand and the large number of orders now on hand (nearly 3000), which has necessitated the printing of a much larger first edition, a few days' delay in the issue of copies is unavoidable. The binders have now an extensive staff of workmen finishing the volumes, and copies will be sent to some of the earliest subscribers on Thursday, the 6th. Limp cloth, 36 stamps; handsomely bound, 48 stamps. W. MORLEY and Co., 269, Regent Street, W., and 70, Upper Street, N.

To Choral Societies.

HANDEL FESTIVAL SELECTION, 1883.

MESSRS. NOVELLO, EWER & CO., having some copies remaining of the Selection of Music performed at the Handel Festival of this year, are prepared to supply copies at SIXPENCE EACH.

An opportunity is thus afforded to Choral Societies of acquiring an excellent selection of favourite Choruses, Solos, &c., from Handel's Works at a merely nominal price.

THIRTY SONGS WITH PIANOFORTE ACCOMPANIMENT

COMPOSED BY

ROBERT FRANZ

The English version by FRANCIS HUEFFER

PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

CONTENTS:—

On the hidden wood-path.	A lifetime wasted.
Sunset.	Lo! he has come.
Not a star.	Autumn sorrow.
Sunset.	Will she come to-day?
Breathlessly the Lake reposes.	Love in May.
In the forest, moonbeamed-brightened.	Yea, thou art blighted.
The Swiss Soldier's complaint.	The last tear.
Rest on me, thou eye of darkness.	Love song.
At night I see thee with dreaming eyes.	When my despair is deepest.
Dreams.	Sweetest maid with lips like roses.
The rose and the lily.	Thinking of thee.
On the sea.	The rose has made sad moan to me.
Gently through my bosom flow.	In Rhine's broad rolling waters.
Omnipotence.	Forgotten.
Thou art far.	Good Night.

JASON

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

THE POEM WRITTEN BY WILLIAM GRIST

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

A. C. MACKENZIE.

Octavo, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s. Vocal parts, 1s. each. Full score and wind parts, MS. String parts, 16s.

TIMES.

"Mr. Mackenzie is in every sense a modern composer. There is in his music no trace of the slavish imitation of Mendelssohn which, for years after the death of that great composer, impeded the progress of any national or independent growth of musical art among us. . . . How the composer has accomplished his task of illustrating the action I cannot for the present explain at such length as the music deserves. I may, however, say in summary fashion that Mr. Mackenzie's 'Jason' contains more clever writing and more genuine inspiration than are to be found in any English Cantata produced during recent years, with the sole exception, perhaps, of Mr. Cowen's 'St. Ursula.'"

THE BRIDE

A CANTATA

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF R. HAMERLING

AND SET TO MUSIC BY

A. C. MACKENZIE.

Octavo, paper cover, 1s. 6d. Vocal parts, 6d. each. Full score and wind parts, MS. String parts, 6s. 6d.

STANDARD.

"There is revealed in the Cantata so much power, and such a command over the means of musical expression, that 'The Bride' will endure, not only for its own sake, but as an earnest of the able work which we may confidently look forward to from the same pen. . . . The brightly scored and spirited bridal march and chorus were immensely encored."

DEDICATED TO HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS OF WALES.

PSYCHE

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

COMPOSED BY

NIELS W. GADE.

Octavo, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s. Vocal parts, 1s. each; string parts, 15s. 6d.; wind parts, 23s. Full Orchestral Score, £1 10s. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Its music from first to last was intelligible and charged with the grace and beauty of the school that, having had Herr Gade as a pupil, now claims him as a professor. . . . From beginning to end we are conscious of that happy union of the classic and the romantic which Mendelssohn and Schumann, each in his degree and manner, so conspicuously illustrate. . . . I cordially endorse the enthusiastic verdict of the Birmingham audience, for, though Herr Gade's Cantata does not achieve the oftentimes questionable feat of marking 'a new departure,' it is a thing of beauty that should live long to be a joy."

ABRAHAM

COMPOSED BY

BERNHARD MOLIQUE.

Octavo, paper cover, 3s.; paper boards, 3s. 6d.; scarlet cloth, 5s. Full score, 60s.; orchestral parts, 50s.; chorus parts, 15s.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"'Abraham' comes to us a second time with perfectly intelligible and graceful speech; moreover, it is the speech of a master who knows the spirit as well as the form of his artistic language, and can commend himself to the mind as well as the ear. Every number in 'Abraham' vouches for this, and it will be a marvel if the reward of so much merit does not come sooner or later in full measure."

DAILY NEWS.

"It was a step in the right direction to revive an artistic work which has long been unjustly ignored, and which offers so welcome a contrast to the immature and crude manufactures which under the name of novelties so often pass as compositions in these days."

ANTON DVORÁK

Paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth gilt, 4s. Full score, 45s.; orchestral parts, 30s.; vocal parts, 9d. each.

TIMES.

"Dvorák's setting of the beautiful old hymn holds its own by the side of its numerous predecessors, identified as these are with some of the most famous names in the history of Italian art, ancient and modern. . . . Besides being adapted to its purpose, Herr Dvorák's music is full of melodious beauty and invention. Melody indeed is its breath of life, and we do not wish to say anything derogatory to the Bohemian composer's merit by owning that Rossini's famous setting of the 'Stabat Mater' was more than once recalled to our minds during the progress of the performance. It need scarcely be added that Dvorák's conception of his subject is infinitely more earnest and reverent than that of his famous predecessor. . . . To sum up, Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' is undoubtedly an original effort of great power, all the more worthy of notice at a time when the clever repetition of musical platitudes is too frequently mistaken for genuine inspiration."

THE SUN-WORSHIPPERS

A CHORAL ODE

The English words adapted from the French of DELAVIGNE by

C. N. SCOTT.

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

A. GORING THOMAS.

Price 1s. 6d.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"The music is bold and free in structure, modulating with frequency, sometimes into remote keys, and changing its rhythm and style at the bidding of the poetry. But this freedom does not convey an idea of licentiousness. Its purport is, for the most part, clear, and its propriety, seeing that genuine musical interest is conserved, unquestionable. . . . Mr. Thomas should be encouraged to persevere. He has a charming fancy and an elegant pen, and both are needed in the higher walks of musical art."

A SACRED CANTATA

COMPOSED BY

GEORGE GARRETT

Octavo, paper cover, 3s.; chorus parts, 8d. each; string parts, 14s. Full score and wind parts, MS.

MORNING POST.

"The merits of the Cantata are many, and will appeal most successfully to those who are content with the most expressive of a series of musical ideas represented with all respect for the laws of form and order. There is no unhealthy striving after the impossible and the undesirable; all is legitimate and musicianly."

A SACRED CANTATA OR CHURCH ORATORIO

THE WORDS BY THE REV. J. POWELL METCALFE

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

F. E. GLADSTONE

Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Octavo, paper cover, price 2s. 6d. Full score and orchestral parts, MS. MORNING POST.

"Dr. Gladstone's music to the words is learned and clever without being abstruse or unvoiced; on the contrary, the several numbers are so written as to bring their own interest both to the singers and to the hearers. . . . It may, therefore, be recommended to the consideration of church choirs and choral societies with every confidence."

PROSPECTUS.

The above comprises musicians of all ages and countries—composers, singers, instrumentalists, theorists, &c.—including many now living. That a work of this nature is pressing wanted in England cannot be doubted, the last work of any moment upon the subject being a "Biographical Dictionary of Musicians," published about 1824, in two octavo volumes treating of some seven or eight thousand names, and having sketches of about one hundred English musicians then living. Much space was, however, in some cases devoted to people who are now forgotten, while composers of sterling merit were omitted or dismissed in a very few lines; and there were many errors committed in regard to names and dates, several of which were the means of misleading Fétis and other writers. It is hoped that while this little volume will be sufficient to satisfy the desires of that large class of amateurs who merely wish for a little information, more eager students will be stimulated by its perusal to consult some of the larger works upon the subject. In conclusion, the Editor begs to say that he has for upwards of thirty years been compiling material for this work, and as he has paid particular attention to chronology, he trusts it will in some measure supply a long-felt want.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1883.

THE DRAMATIC ELEMENT IN MUSIC.

It is not very long since that amongst a few representatives of an old-fashioned English musical criticism, the opera was a subject of ridicule. To notions contracted in the routine of a country professional career, or amidst the narrow culture and uneventful life of a cathedral town, the impassioned expression of the opera may have appeared meaningless and even absurd. Even from the higher and technical point of view of many experienced musicians, the subordination of accustomed musical forms to the exigencies of the drama offends preconceptions born of an education too exclusively confined to technicalities, or founded on a particular selection of models. In spite of recent controversies which have widened the public vision in regard to the possibilities of the music-drama, and when the strains of a nascent English art are now haunting our imaginations, the opera is still looked upon by some of our critics as a low form, if not the lowest amongst serious efforts in musical composition. Such opinions are perfectly intelligible. But to those whose fancies lean towards complex sensations, not the result of some limited combination of exciting causes, such as a stately procession of so-called "beautiful musical forms," or the complicated but mechanical effects of mere tone-weaving, the disparagement of the opera seems to be at least in direct contradiction to the present and recent tendencies of all music. These tendencies are undeniable, and must have some natural and sufficient cause. To return in our day either to absolute music in instrumental composition, or to rely solely, or mainly, on the technical resources of the art itself, would be to place ourselves in hopeless rivalry with the masters of another period, and subject our era to artistic annihilation. We may be reminded that this comparative annihilation has literally occurred in other arts, and it may be asked, why should it not occur in music? The best answer is to refer once again to a very ancient and elementary dogma in æsthetics, and one which is almost too trite for repetition although generation after generation it is ever forgotten. There is no similarity between music and the arts of architecture, sculpture, and painting. It may be conceded that since this dictum was formulated modern music has developed points of resemblance to the sister arts that could not have been foreseen by the ancients; but the essential truth remains that music amongst the arts is in the same category only with poetry and the drama. Even the plastic arts themselves derive little aid from one another. We think it is still an effort with the painter to emancipate himself from the trammels of the "art for art" school; whilst for the musician it has been, and is, comparatively easy, owing to the intimate connection of his art with the unbounded resources of language. If in the plastic arts the moderns are resigned to the hopelessness of rivaling their predecessors, the same humility cannot be predicted of poets and dramatists. Herein is the hope, the only hope, we see for music. Our pessimism in this respect extends almost to the belief that the "new symphonies" which so favourably exhibit the technical capacities of young composers, and receive so many vapid compliments from critics, are a mere waste of power, except as exercises—as stepping-stones towards the final aim of modern musical art: the setting of poetry in one dramatic form or another. These views will not find much acceptance amongst English musicians who allow themselves to be overwhelmed by the traditions of classical and instrumental music. They will not find acceptance amongst all the supporters of what with great justice may be called the existing English school of musical æsthetics; which, new as it is, already gives higher promise than the art itself. We do not intend to worry our readers with any profound quotations that have no practical bearing on the matter in hand; but, to our notions, the following passage from a cultivated and voluminous writer on music, Mr. Edmund Gurney, precisely describes the general views of the majority of English musicians and dilettanti. He tells us that the "central conception" of music is "that its primary and essential function is to create beautiful objective forms, and to impress us with otherwise unknown things, instead of to induce and support particular subjective moods, and to express for us known things."

In accordance with this central conception, Mr. Gurney divides music into "impressive" and "expressive." By the former term we understand Mr. Gurney to mean the general impressions we derive from ordinary musical composition inspired by indefinite sentiments, or by the mechanical sequence of merely musical ideas and reminiscences. "Expressive music" is, on the other hand, the portrayal of particular emotions, or of the reflected sentiments suggested by external images and sensations; the expression being sometimes made more definite by the aid of absolute imitations. We shall not attempt to controvert Mr. Gurney's views, with which, in regard to other and crucial points, we sympathetically agree. His central conception, however, appears to us strangely misapplied to what on all sides is acknowledged to be the most subjective of the arts; and his view may, after all, be a question of terms. We cannot fully comprehend what is meant in musical æsthetics by the words "objective forms." The objectivity can only refer to symmetrical qualities; but the essence of musical forms, as melodies, and independently of constructive and merely technical design, is not in their shapes, even as inflections of continuous sound, but in their expression; and this latter term includes all that is implied in the word "subjective." We are rather inclined to reverse the application of the terms Mr. Gurney employs. The words "objective forms" can refer only to the technical and mechanical means that occupy the skill rather than the genius of the composer. His genius is the quintessence of his subjective powers. Apart from the dangerous word "form," borrowed from the imitative arts, it seems to us that in music the real application of the "objective" is to those very sources of inspiration that are supplied as "known things" to the composer, either as emotions already defined by the poet or dramatist, or as external sensations derived from natural phenomena, such as storm or sunset. In this sense the objective element in music is the dramatic element; for whatever may have been the "subjective moods" that inspired the music of "Don Giovanni," it was induced and coloured by scene, situation, and objectivities that distinguish it from what we should define as that merely subjective abandonment to the development of musical ideas we find in other compositions by Mozart.

There are certain obvious causes of error in the examination of musical phenomena. The æsthetician, whose business is analysis, is apt to take a scientific or outside view of them; and musicians are liable to judge them as they appear to the eye visibly as "forms" in the modern notation; and finally we are all influenced by the habit of contemplating musical forms as they have been presented to us at certain periods in the development of the art. The latter cause Mr. Gurney notices. When Wagner alludes to the higher value of melodic ideas which spring from "harmonious relations," Mr. Gurney replies: "It is not an uncommon notion that harmony is at any rate the most fundamental, if not the sole originating source of impressive musical effects in our age; a misconception far more disastrous in its results than the old idea of phantom harmonies and basses as an essential ingredient of melody to which Helmholtz gave the coup de grâce." Mr. Gurney might have gone further, and quoted from Wagner the following passage, characteristic not of the great reformer, thinker, and music dramatist, but of Herr Wagner, German, chauvinist, and musician of his period. He says: "Italian opera melody has remained satisfied with an harmonic basis of such astounding poverty, that it might exist without any accompaniment whatever." Why astounding? The special virtue and merit of Italian melody consist in its independence of such support. The Italian composer of the period Wagner refers to could afford to treat his orchestra as a "guitar"; just as a person endowed with powers of expression and a voice of fine quality can venture to sing unaccompanied. Italian opera melody is at once "impressive" and "expressive." Bellini's air, for example, "In mia man al fin tu sei," is not only exquisite as melody—it is intensely dramatic in its expression of the scene in which it occurs. It is doubtful if Wagner himself, whatever he may have theoretically conceived or intended, has ever musically accomplished anything comparable to that melody, considered purely from a dramatic point of view. No splendour of orchestration could improve it. It grandly represents the dramatic element in melody alone, as a means of concentrated expression, and as the antithesis of what critics intend to signify when they talk of "logical development." "Rational thought," says Wagner, "existing and moving in reasons and consequences, finds no hold whatever" in the symphony of Beethoven. Nor does it in any music whatever. The canon itself is not logic, but simply orderly arrangement. When Wagner, in his marvellously clear exposition of his ideas, in his letter to M. Villot, lays it down as a law that the only form of music is melody, he utters a scientific and æsthetic common-place; but when he proceeds to explain his ingenious and fertile conception of infinite melody, we see how dependent are his notions of melody on "harmonious relations." In fact, his conception is so mixed up with the "changes of expression" we all know are imparted to melody by "an harmonic turn," that it appears to be a direct outcome of the mere technical devices of his day. Harmonic effects in any shape are evanescent. When united with fragments of melody they are but shining ripples without the roll of the billow—without the whole strength and intrinsic musical power of motion. Infinite melody, combined with large outlines—not necessarily known forms—may be the ultimate completion of the Wagnerian theory. It was another and less fortunate idea of Wagner's that the orchestra should not only illustrate the action of the drama, but the motives of the action as well. This he attempted by a purely melodic and symbolical device. Melody is in some sense to harmony what articulate speech is to sound; but the limits of definiteness in music are impassable. To overstrain them is to deliver ourselves bound hand and foot to the upholders of "impressive music." The orchestra in the opera should, as Voltaire said of le spectacle in tragedy, have a share in the interest. In the infancy or early youth of the opera, Quinault is reported to have placed tragedy under the apprenticeship of music. The result was that he eliminated complications in the action of the drama, and in the motives of action, to adapt his pieces to a musical setting. M. Gounod has said lately that "it is difficult to get people to listen to a piece of music that is only a portrait of character." We are afraid it is; but it is "character" people most seek in painting, because it is there definable. The often-quoted dictum that whether adoration in music is addressed to the Deity or to a mistress is immaterial, is usually attributed to Cusin; but it was said almost in the same words long before he was thought of, by Chabanon, a Gluckist, and one of the precursors in his time of Wagnerism. We need not depend on the intense and penetrative criticisms of Wagner, or on his theories or musical illustrations, to show that the dramatic element is not an incidental quality, but the beginning and end of music. We might take advantage of a certain Darwinian hypothesis, of the inconvenience of which Mr. Gurney himself seems conscious, to show—were that hypothesis anything like the truth, and practically acknowledged even as a phase of common heredity—that the origin and being of music are not only "expressive," but deeply dramatic. Again, the most elementary technicalities of music, the modes, are distinctly "expressive," and differentiations if not precise definitions of subjective moods; and in this latter sense they seem to have been employed by the ancients. The earliest musical efforts of any artistic merit, and apart from organised cries and exclamations, have in all nations been expressive of particular subjective moods and from the beginning dramatic. Mediæval music was allied to the solemnities of an imposing church ritual, and to the words of hymns such as the "Stabat" and the Requiem, in their spirit and origin dramatic. The modern symphony itself, the purest representative of independent music, was, in the hands of him who most glorified it, dramatic in its tendency; and weaker efforts in the same direction have since had, and have still, similar pretensions. The culmination of these tendencies is in the theatre. The discipline and requirements of the stage, from a musical point of view, induce condensation and concentration of thought and expression. The stage is intolerant of technical amplifications and the recasting of reminiscences. It demands that every stroke shall tell, and be at the cost of inventive power. In some regards it demands the sacrifice of the ideal, and at least of vague musical impressions. The new mental trajectory, more on a level with ordinary surroundings, widens if it lowers the vision of the composer. The objective clearness of scene, action and situation, stirs the mind in new directions. Ultimately it reacts subjectively, provoking the unity, intensity, and glow which characterise what we call originality; a complex quality, resulting in a certain mental focus and vividness as apparent in a Balfian strain as in the elaborated exordium of a symphony. Musicians as a rule acknowledge the essentiality of genius in writing for the stage. After dabbling in symphony and chamber music, their hope is to clench and extend their fame by writing an opera. This they often attack in middle-life and without success. History, however, records many instances of success under such circumstances; but it may be said generally that the musically dramatic genius is specific, and born with the possessor, who takes to the stage early and naturally. It is a curious sign of the times, that composers evince a desire to adapt their cantatas—even sacred cantatas—to the stage. The attraction is easy to comprehend. The theatre, in the highest sense of the word, is a Pantheon, where the votaries of all the arts can unite. The audience is thus wider in its views, and in every respect nobler, than a congregation of specialists in some one art, pursued in selfish independence.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

CHERUBINI's visit to the Austrian capital, though not unattended by success, could scarcely have equalled his expectations. Everything was upset by the campaign of Austerlitz. For a time the whole fabric of society became disorganised, and this, no doubt, had something to do with the failure of a commercial enterprise in which, according to Picchianti, the master was associated with Steibelt. Lured by the temptations that so often draw artists out of their proper path into bogs and all manner of unpleasant places, the two composers started a music-printing establishment. Of course they did not know how to manage it amid the prevailing confusion, and collapse soon put an end to their anxieties. Cherubini's share of the debts seems to have been a heavy one, but he met it manfully and for some time had to fight the battle of life with crippled resources. Amid all that was disagreeable in Vienna, Cherubini had some consolation, his "Faniska" being well received and played for twenty-eight nights. The Allgemeine Musikzeitung of Leipzig, which had so many curious things to say about Beethoven at this period, noticed the work in due course, remarking:—

"The music is in every respect worthy the great master who wrote it; with the exception of certain passages where he may be reproached with being too artificial; it is profound, full of warmth and power, and thoroughly characteristic. Rich in harmony—sometimes even too much so—it is truly striking and strongly dramatic. But a person must hear it several times to understand and seize it thoroughly."

For reasons already pointed out Cherubini did not remain in Vienna to produce the second of the two operas he had engaged to write. In his autobiographical sketch we read: "After giving my opera of 'Faniska,' which was performed for the first time February 26, 1806, I started from Vienna on March 9, and arrived in Paris on April 1, after an absence of nine months and four days." It is right to add that "Faniska" was not the only work written at Vienna by our master. In his own catalogue is entered, under date 1805: "March for wind instruments, composed at Vienna for Baron von Braun's private band. A Sonata for barrel organ belonging to Baron Baum."

A great many stories are told about Cherubini's relations with Beethoven, Haydn, and the other less illustrious musicians who then made Vienna a "city of the masters." We shall not here concern ourselves with them. A large proportion is mere fancy, and the game of sifting the chaff from the wheat would not be worth the candle.

Cherubini was received back in Paris with open arms. Especially did the professors and pupils of the Conservatoire greet him who conferred so great a lustre upon the institution he had helped to found. They even organised a musical entertainment of an impromptu sort, whereat was performed sundry selections from his works. A propos to this, M. Pougin has placed himself in direct opposition to Fétis on a point which has more than one form of interest.

Referring to the extemporised entertainment, Fétis says:—

"This protestation on the part of all the distinguished musicians then in Paris, and of the young and warm-hearted students against the imperial disfavour manifested for a great artist, far from being useful to the latter, could only do him harm. The same neglect continued to weigh him down, and his discouragement is marked very significantly in the catalogue of his works, for the years 1806-7-8 mention only fragments of a few pages each. During all this period a frivolous occupation grew to be a passionate pursuit with him, and caused him in some degree to forget music. It consisted in making pen and ink sketches, on playing cards, of figures and scenes of which the clubs, spades, hearts, and diamonds formed integral parts. He sometimes used to devote to this work seven or eight hours in a single day. These drawings, which frequently exhibited original fancy, were in much request among his friends, and enabled him to forget his sorrows."

Ferdinand Hiller, writing in Macmillan's Magazine, has told us something more of Cherubini's craze for drawing on cards:—

"On entering his rooms, the visitors beheld, hung in frames against the walls, a number of pictures of all sizes. Red and black spots were more or less visible here and there, and an attentive examination was needed to account for them. These paintings were the strange productions of a taste that had then become a mania with Cherubini. They represented the most fantastic figures, groups, and scenes, produced by the aid of the hearts and diamonds of playing-cards, either entire or divided, according to circumstances. There were dancers with red jerkins, singers with red hats, edifices and landscapes with strange specimens of vegetation, the cards being employed either horizontally, perpendicularly, separately, or in groups, with a greater or less number of pips effaced. It was a means of spending or, perhaps, wasting his time. And yet these combinations of invention and calculation, this victorious search for the solution of voluntarily imposed difficulties, were very curious; and it was impossible not to discover in them a certain analogy with his musical combinations, in which every operation was destined to furnish the secret of a particular phrase, of an effect, or of a long-sustained harmony."

M. Pougin refuses to see in this neglect of music for a fantastic pursuit any sign of discouragement caused by imperial hostility. He holds that the Conservatoire people would not have dared to fêter Cherubini as a demonstration against Napoleon—which is perhaps true—and he contends that the Emperor's dislike of the composer was not of so pronounced a character as is often represented. In support of this view he quotes a letter from Cherubini's granddaughter, Madame Clémentine Duret, in which that lady, referring to the skirmishes between the Corsican and the Florentine, says:—

"Their conversations, studded with pungent and witty remarks, have been often reproduced, but exaggerated and even misrepresented. In his old age I have heard my grandfather express his surprise at the manner in which phrases, interchanged without any afterthought on either side, between the Emperor and himself, had been reported. 'Napoleon was not fond of music,' he said, 'because he did not understand it, and because the sensation it caused him resembled the effect of a noise which attacked his nerves and was disagreeable to him. The obligation he was under of listening to it made him reproach me for the power of the orchestras I directed. . . . He asked me for music without common sense, and as I was responsible for the organisation of the concerts I would not yield to him. He used then to get impatient at meeting with resistance on my part, and made cutting remarks which I affected not to take." M. Pougin further argues that Cherubini's inaction during the years 1806-8 arose from the cause that operated to the same end in 1801-2—namely, nervous disease: "The nervous affection to which he was always subject, and which frequently exerted a baneful influence, not on his disposition—for he was at bottom good and kindly—but on his temper, sometimes manifested itself in painful and cruel paroxysms."

All these observations are worth taking into account, but, on considering the whole matter, we are inclined to think with Fétis rather than with the later biographer. On the one hand, the evidence of Napoleon's prejudice against Cherubini is too strong to be much weakened by testimony like that of Madame Duret, while the nervous sensitiveness of the master's organisation would cause him to feel with special keenness a slight like the preference of Paër over his head. The devotion of Cherubini to absurd card-drawings favours a belief that he suspended musical work out of sheer disgust. A man whose nervous system has broken down does not take to labour of any kind for seven hours a day—he is usually restless and aimless; whereas a man who feels that serious exertion meets with no reward is apt to take up with odd and useless pursuits as a kind of protest against the injustice that declines to recompense any other. That Cherubini fretted himself into a state of nervous disorganisation is likely enough. The card-drawing was only occupation for his fingers, and his soul rebelled against the very relief it sought. Happily, a way of escape out of the Slough of Despond was opened up. In 1808 our master accepted an invitation to spend a holiday with the Prince and Princess of Chimay, at their castle in Belgium. From this mere accident, so to speak, sprang great and enduring results.

Cherubini's health soon began to improve under the influence of country air and change of scene; but no one pressed him on the subject of music, and for a while he continued to keep aloof from his art, preferring to study botany when rambling about the estate. Matters stood thus as St. Cecilia's Day drew near, and the heads of a musical society in the village were debating what work should be performed at the festival of their patroness. Some one of those heads—we wish his name was known since the world is his debtor—suggested an application to the great composer at the castle. The idea was a bold one, but the simple villagers acted upon it at once. They found Cherubini, and humbly begged him to write a mass for Chimay church, he listening, though all the while busily arranging some botanical specimens. The answer was "short, sharp and decisive"—"No; it's impossible." More than this he refused to say, and the deputation, after standing awhile in painful confusion, silently retired with no very high opinion, it may be, of Cherubini's good manners. Perhaps Cherubini had no very high opinion of them himself, and hastened to make atonement; but, anyhow, the interview quickly bore fruit. On the morrow the master seemed preoccupied, took a longer walk than usual, and, on returning found a sheet of music-paper on his desk, placed there by the watchful princess. In this case it might be said, "Full oft the sight of means to do good deeds makes good deeds done." Cherubini at once sat down and wrote the "Kyrie" of his Mass in F, only getting up now and then to take a turn at the billiard table. This was the beginning of that wonderful series of masterpieces which he gave to the Church. "Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth!"

Auber was staying at Chimay, and at his suggestion the new "Kyrie" was at once tried, himself presiding at the pianoforte, while Cherubini sang bass, the Prince tenor, and a lady visitor soprano. General admiration encouraging the composer to go on, he soon completed a "Gloria," both "Kyrie" and "Gloria" being subsequently performed in the village church, with the aid of a real village band, comprising a quartet of strings, horns, clarinets, a flute, and a bassoon. The rest of the work our master composed on his return to Paris, and the first performance took place (1809) at the Prince de Chimay's hotel. Fétis, who was amongst the guests on that occasion, wrote: "Never shall I forget the effect produced by this Mass confided to such interpreters. All the celebrities of Paris, of whatever rank they might be, attended the performance, where the glory of the great composer shone forth with a living lustre. During the interval between the performance of the 'Gloria' and that of the 'Credo' groups everywhere formed themselves, and all expressed an unreserved admiration for this composition of a new order, whereby Cherubini has placed himself above all musicians who have as yet written in the concerted style of church music."

As we are here concerned in the events of Cherubini's life, not with the significance of his works, there is no place for discussion as to the claims of dramatic church music, which derived so immense an impetus from the genius of the Florentine master. It suffices to contemplate the apparently insignificant series of circumstances that led Cherubini back again into the paths of art, and induced him not only to make a fresh start, but to direct his course along a new path.

Not long after his return to Paris, Cherubini received the news of Haydn's death, and referred to the event in a letter addressed (June 19, 1809) to Neukomm. His words of regret for the old master's departure are worth transcribing: "You spoke about our dear Father Haydn. We have just received the sad intelligence of his death. He ceased to exist three days after the date of your letter, for it was on May 31 that we lost him. You little thought, no doubt, dear sir, that he was dying when you were speaking to me about him, and he expired while your letter was on its road to me. It is a sad misfortune that this great man is no more, but it is a blessing for him, since he has ceased to suffer, for he had been very long time a martyr. Music loses much. She has still his works left, but it is a great misfortune that she can write no more of them, and that no one is left who can replace him."

Cherubini paid a much better tribute than this to the manes of his illustrious brother in art. In 1805, Haydn being then seriously ill, report reached Paris that he had died, whereupon Cherubini composed an appropriate hymn, for three voices and orchestra, in honour of the supposed defunct. The work had, of course, to be put aside as soon as it was found that Haydn still lived; but when his death actually took place, four years later, it was brought forward and performed at a concert given by the pupils of the Conservatoire. Great attention seems to have been excited by the music. It was performed a second time, and then a Parisian critic spoke as follows:—

"The introduction of this fine composition is of a sombre and religious tinge; the violoncello, double-basses, flutes, and horns play a mournful strain which plunges the soul into a state of dark melancholy and sorrowfully presents us with the image of Death, whose cruel scythe spares neither genius, wealth, youth, nor beauty. . . . Haydn is no more. . . . The Nymph of the Danube bewails the death of the great man whose divine talent adorned the river banks, two shepherds offer her consolation based on the immortal glory of Haydn, whose genius and works will live for ever after him. Such is the substance of this funeral scene, whence M. Cherubini has derived the richest effects of harmony and melody. The manner in which he has depicted the charm of Haydn's pure strains is so truthful that we might almost believe the music to be written by Haydn himself; he has imitated with great art one of the happiest phrases in the oratorio."

The hymn was subsequently published with a dedication to Prince Esterhazy, Haydn's patron and master, who politely acknowledged the honour, at the same time forwarding a snuffbox ornamented with gold and diamonds.

Thoroughly restored to health and work, Cherubini composed "Pimmalionè," a one-act Italian opera, which was produced (November 30, 1809) at the theatre in the Tuileries before the Emperor and Empress. Upon this event M. Pougin bases another argument against the reported feud between Napoleon and the Florentine, but we need not here reopen the subject. It is more to the purpose to note that having written an ode for the marriage of the Emperor with Marie Louise (May 20, 1810) he brought out at the Opéra-Comique (September 1, 1810) a one-act buffo opera, entitled "Le Crescendo." Again the musician suffered for the sins of the librettist. A contemporary critic wrote:—

"The plot, though tolerably well worked out, appeared devoid of interest and even of comicality. . . A discontented spectator allowed a slight hiss to escape his lips; his neighbours fell foul of him; he retorted by saying he had been bored for some time, and wanted to amuse himself a little by hissing. His reason was heard and backed up by others who also were bored. The heresy that a man must hiss when he is bored made rapid progress, and this produced a crescendo of hisses as fatal to the piece as the crescendo of music was to the Baron."

On its merits, the music of "Le Crescendo" met with universal approval, but, as Garaudé pointed out at the time, "musical beauties alone are not sufficient in an opera offered to a French audience, who require, in addition to these, reasonable action, a piquant plot, and novel situations, or, at least, a story that shall fix the spectator's attention by the natural and probable connection of scenes attractive by their gaiety or interest." The same writer continued as follows: "The French want a complete whole, and M. Cherubini has proved more than once that he can successfully supply it. How is it that, on the present occasion, he has profaned his genius by associating it with such a rhapsody? On reflecting, we might return more than one answer to this question. In the first place, had he a choice? Are good works so common? May he not have thought that an innovation of this nature would be welcomed by the public? And is the taste of the public so sure that we may reasonably guarantee its infallibility? Who are the literary men and composers that would dare to predict with assurance the failure or success of an opera?" These questions are not worth much as excusing Cherubini's repeated mistakes in the matter of libretti, the merits of which he seemed quite incapable of appreciating, and so took good or bad with perfect submission to the whims of chance. From a letter of the master dated December 12, 1810, he appears to have begun an opera entitled "Nausica," and there gives reasons to the author, one Toug, why he felt unable to complete it. The year 1811 was almost a blank, save for the Mass in D minor—an important qualification truly—written between March and October, while in 1812 Cherubini did even less, only one composition—a cantata for some convivial occasion—appearing in his catalogue. It was during this year, however, that he began "Les Abencérages," the book of which had been written, from Florian's "Gonsalve de Cardone," by Jouy. The old story, now grown tiresome, here repeats itself. Jouy's libretto turned out to be as bad as the rest, while the music, though redeemed by the fine overture and some concerted pieces, did not come up to Cherubini's usual mark. Under these circumstances success could not be hoped for. The opera struggled on for twenty nights; was then withdrawn to be condensed into two acts, and appeared no more.

The great political and national crisis which marked the fall of Napoleon did not fail to touch Cherubini personally. As soon as France realised what had happened on the blood-stained fields of Germany, and heard a banded Continent thundering at her gates, then the men in power adopted every imaginable device for the purpose of stimulating patriotism. Amongst other things they revived the practice of the Republican days, and ordered the preparation of plays and spectacles intended to excite martial ardour. These were hurriedly compiled, generally by two or three authors in collaboration, and as hastily put upon the stage. One opera, in two acts, entitled "Bayard à Mézières," was the joint production of no less than six authors—that is to say, two librettists and four composers, of whom Cherubini was one. This work was produced at the Opéra-Comique on February 12, 1814, and we learn of it from Cherubini's own catalogue that our master's share therein was a trio, a concerted piece, and a martial song. A journalist of the period states that "Bayard à Mézières," though composed "by order of the police," had a great success, and that Cherubini's air was "full of energy and originality." According to M. Pougin, Cherubini wrote, also, a war-song for a drama, "La Raçon de Duguesclin," by Arnault, brought out at the Comédie-Française on March 17. It was not alone as a stage composer that Cherubini contributed his share to the stirring circumstances of the time. The Government having revived the National Guard, a band was organised for it, the musicians being entirely supplied by the Conservatoire. This event was chronicled as follows in the Journal des Débats of February 18, 1814: "Zeal for the National Guard is manifested among all classes; the artists, never backward when called upon to display their devotion, have just given another proof of it. On the invitation of the Prefect of the Seine and the general staff, the members of the Imperial Conservatoire have formed among themselves a company of 120 volunteer musicians. The director commands it; the lieutenants are MM. Méhul, Cherubini, Cotel, and Paër. The distinguished wind-instrumentalists trained in the institution, united with the professors, constitute the body of 120 performers." A very notable band, indeed, this must have been, and no doubt Lieutenant Cherubini was proud of it. As a matter of course, he helped to provide new music. His catalogue speaks of a March and a Double Quick composed for the 120 patriots; but a curious commentary upon Lieutenant Cherubini's own zeal for France is that the same catalogue records, only a little later, the issue of a number of military pieces at the request of the colonel of a Prussian regiment. Well, the master, after all, had only adopted France as his mother land. It should also be remembered that he had no particular reason to identify himself with Napoleon's cause. Hence he was quite ready to write for the Prussian colonel, and, as happened directly after the restoration of the monarchy, to compose cantatas in honour of the Bourbon King. For his art had neither politics nor nationality. Cherubini prepared two Restoration Cantatas; one, in three parts with accompaniment, for a military fête given on July 20; the other—for several voices, with choruses and accompaniments—being performed before the King on August 29. More important than all these things put together was a work bearing the same date. In 1814 our master composed his first string quartet (E flat) the refined and classic beauty of which, if it needed a foil, would find one in its author's warlike effusions.

The Government of Louis XVIII. was not slow to mark Cherubini's worth by official honours, which had been denied him by the unforgiving Napoleon. In December, 1814, the master was gazetted Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, and in the same month he succeeded M. Martini as Superintendent of the King's musical establishment. Nevertheless, all things did not run quite smoothly under the new régime. The Government played havoc with the Conservatoire; dismissing its founder and director, Saretti, under circumstances of positive contumely, and so disorganising the establishment that Cherubini found himself without anything to do. Under these circumstances an invitation came to him from England, which he at once accepted. Just then the London Philharmonic Society was in the full flush of youthful vigour. It had been founded by Cramer, Clementi, Neate, and their fellows, less than two years before, and naturally desired to achieve something of a sensational nature. Hence the invitation to Cherubini, who was the first to receive a compliment afterwards accepted by Beethoven, Spohr, Weber, Mendelssohn, Wagner, and Gounod. In our master's case the offer was to compose two works, and conduct them himself. These pieces took the form of an overture and a symphony; but Cherubini also wrote a vocal composition, which, together with several selections from his repertory, were duly performed. According to his diary, he started for London on February 25, 1815, and returned to Paris on June 8. What he did in the English capital, and his experiences there, may well form the subject of another chapter.

By F. CORDER.

DULLBOROUGH is a thriving watering-place on the coast of Rutlandshire. Look it out on the map if you don't believe me. It may not be a fashionable or popular resort, but in the summer season it has a tolerably large population. Of course, like all English seaside places, it is perfectly innocent of what we call artistic culture, and its only concerts are the spasmodic efforts of the local amateurs and music-teachers, and are about of the style of a so-called Penny Reading. Now last summer it suddenly occurred to one of our local magnates—Mr. Bulpit, the auctioneer, alderman, and town-councillor—to “wake up the town a bit,” as he expressed it, by getting up a sort of Eisteddfod, or musical festival embracing some sort of competition, prize-giving, speech-making, and performance on a large scale. On communicating the idea to a few friends it was eagerly taken up, especially by the Rev. Loafy Fisher, incumbent of St. Matthew's. A provisional committee was soon formed, including in its numbers Mr. Skinner, the Mayor, and Herr Müller, the organist of St. Matthew's. This latter gentleman was the German master at Dullborough College, and, solely on the strength of his nationality, I believe, was considered to be our best musician. The first thing to be decided by this Committee was what should be the actual scope of the Festival. A competition of choirs was naturally the first idea that presented itself, but there were no amateur choral societies at all in the neighbourhood, and few churches had more than the usual hopeless choir of school-children who were with difficulty taught a few simple chants and hymns, so that anything like part-songs and choral-singing was out of the question; and on Mr. Fisher proposing that a competition hymn-singing should form at least a minor feature of the Festival, the Mayor declared emphatically “We don't want no ‘ims!” Then a lady, who had a “large teaching connection” in the schools of Dullborough, proposed to get up a competition among the young ladies' schools, and offered her full services in the matter on the condition of being allowed to sing two solos herself as a little advertisement. Her suggestion might have obtained consideration had it not been for this fatal stipulation, which caused a thrill of horror to run through the committee. Mr. Bulpit even went so far as to remark audibly that he should prefer hymn-singing to her singing.

It being generally agreed that choral singing was not to be thought of, the Mayor startled us all with a luminous inspiration: a competition of brass bands and barrel-organs! Every watering-place along the coast had one or two town bands which could be brought to Dullborough at small expense by special arrangement with the railway company, and as to organ-grinders, they abounded everywhere. Herr Müller, indeed, objected to the latter half of the scheme. He contended that there was little or no skill required to play a hand-organ, and whatever merit its performance possessed was not to the player but to the maker of the instrument belonging. A vigorous discussion on this point then arose between his Honour the Mayor and Herr Müller, in the course of which the English language was maltreated to the utmost limits of its endurance. The Mayor wisely argued that his friend's objection applied equally to singers, inasmuch as their voices were not of their own making and they had been always taught their different songs and pieces by the voice-makers or singing-masters. “It ain't the maker or the teacher what gets the prize,” said this worthy, with his usual practical common sense, “but the ‘appy owner of the instrument.” The Mayor's proposal was therefore carried, and it was settled that besides two classes for bands—brass bands and those containing brass and reed instruments—there should be three classes for organs—pipe organs, harmonium organs, and piano organs. Later on an enthusiastic amateur of street music offered a prize for the best instrumental soloist, whether bagpipe, hurdy-gurdy, cornet, or fiddle player, organ-grinders being excluded. Fired by this example the Festival Committee offered another prize for the best street singer, male or female. On the solicitation of several intending competitors this prize was also thrown open to families.

We now had to consider the question of expenses. A subscription list was opened, and headed by the Mayor and Mr. Bulpit with five pounds a-piece, and then a house-to-house canvas was instituted, as the townspeople seemed rather backward in coming forward. Here our reverend friend Loafy Fisher did us good service. Having observed that the lower classes are the great patrons of street music, he started a penny subscription among his poor parishioners; and this, being energetically pushed, realised eventually over £20. It was only by exerting private influence that we could induce any of the really wealthy inhabitants to subscribe, but our intelligent Mayor well knew how to squeeze guineas from the shopkeepers. He represented quietly to those newly established that money given to this sort of thing is a valuable advertisement, and having obtained his way with them he would show the subscription list to the older-established tradesmen, and advise them, as a friend, not to let these new upstarts cut them out. Eventually we succeeded in raising a sum sufficient for the actual expenses, including the prizes. These were mostly small sums of money, as pewter medals, which had been first proposed, were found not to offer sufficient attraction to competitors. Several of the more artful tradespeople indeed sought to serve their own interests by offering prizes of their own goods, and we accepted a meerschaum pipe from one and an aluminium gold pencil-case from another; but when Mr. Sands, the grocer, of High Street, offered a box of fancy soaps and half a dozen bottles of the Jumbo pickle (his speciality) we found ourselves obliged to draw the line, more especially as Mr. Bulpit pointed out that to award soap to a German band would not only be useless but might hurt their feelings.

The next important point to be settled was the place at which the Festival was to be held, and this was not easily decided. The music was to be all open-air music, and one could not judge of its effect properly in a room. The Town Hall and Assembly Rooms being therefore rejected, there remained only three courses—to hold it at the head of the pier, to erect a sort of open-air amphitheatre on the esplanade, or to seek some uncovered building in the town. The pier did not afford room enough; we had not sufficient funds for the eminently desirable plan of building an amphitheatre; and the offer of the new gasometer which the Dullborough Gas Company were erecting had to be reluctantly refused, as in the case of bad weather it would be impossible to cover so large a space in any way. Finally we hired the riding-school, a large and lofty building with the solitary drawback of its smell of tan. It was gaily decorated with flowers and flags, and a platform was erected at one end. On seeking for two busts of musicians to place one on each side, we could only find one in all the town, a plaster bust of Handel which graced the principal music-shop. The Mayor declared that nothing could be more appropriate, as he "knewed that 'Andel had a lot to do with organs," but I fancy that there was some confusion in his mind as to the connection. Failing a second bust this worthy man lent us a marble head of Apollo—"god of music, don't yer know?"—but I cannot say that the two harmonised very well.

Herr Müller, finding himself much relied upon and looked up to as the principal authority in musical matters, had meanwhile grown rather puffed up. He therefore resolved to supplement the competitions by a grand concert at the Town Hall—something which should eclipse all previous Dullborough concerts. A full orchestra and singers from London were the two amazing attractions which afforded scope for numerous preliminary paragraphs in the local papers. Every one wondered how Herr Müller was going to make it pay, but I regret to say that these wonders were seldom good-natured enough to endeavour to obviate the wonder by taking tickets. But Herr Müller knew what he was about. He certainly engaged eight or ten principals for his band from London, but counted on finding in the town and among the Festival competitors sufficient subordinates to fill up and make a respectable number. Then he discovered that two third-rate London vocalists were born at Dullborough, and on the strength of this contrived to engage them at reduced terms. He filled up his bill with local amateurs, including the lady music-teacher mentioned above.

Well, the grand day arrived at last, and Mr. Bulpit had indeed "waked up the town." The committee and judges bustled about in dazzling white waistcoats and with a distinguishing knot of blue ribbon in their buttonholes, this ornament of course provoking facetious remark from the vulgar; crowds were assembled before the riding-school to see the judges and competitors arrive, but we were rather surprised to find how few paid their half-crown and entered the building. But the competition began at 10 a.m., and we comforted ourselves with the idea that the room would fill up later on. The united brass bands having played the National Anthem with rather discordant effect, it not having occurred to them to tune together, the Mayor opened the proceedings with a speech which, from his dreadfully hesitating style, occupied twenty minutes in delivery, though it only filled half a column of the Dullborough Gazette. I spare you his dreadful grammar and "exasperated" h's, but his speech was to the effect that in these days when music was making such startling progress in England it behoved every one to keep up with the times and help in removing the reproach that we were an unmusical nation. The great interest taken by the town in the present Festival was a convincing proof that Dullborough was not backward in—in—taking as much interest in music as any town, if not more so. (Judicious applause from the committee concealed this weak place in the orator's speech.) It must not be thought that, because most of the competitors belonged to Italy and Germany, those two lands of song, that we were obliged to go abroad for our music, as certain sneerers pretended. There was plenty of music in England. Why, two of the artists who were to sing that evening were natives of Dullborough—(great applause)—and, to quote another proof, Miss Smith, of this town, had only last year sold the copyright of one of her beautiful compositions to a London publisher for five pounds. (Immense applause.) But Art was of no country, and it was in the interests of Art, and at the same time as a graceful compliment to our two sister countries, that we offered the present opportunity of offering them the present opportunity—he should say—er—of, in short, earning them—their earning some token of reward for the Art they have so long exhibited to us. (General relief felt at his Honour successfully extricating himself from this quagmire.) He thought, he was sure every one thought, it was only right that such inducements as the present should be frequently offered to musicians to improve their Art, and do even better than they had done hitherto. (Hear, hear.) When he looked round him and saw the crowd of eager competitors longing to—to—go in and win, he felt his heart swell with satisfaction, and he was sure that their efforts could not but advance the interests of English Art. (Tremendous applause, upon which the speaker thought that he had better stop with this good point; so after a pause he resumed his seat, and the applause increased.)

Several other speeches followed, but all to much the same effect, dragging in "English Art" at every available opportunity. When this was done, the National Anthem was again played, and the real business began. There were seven bands in the first two classes, the Dullborough pier and town bands, and one from each of the five neighbouring towns, Harbourn, Quagly, Beacham, Dawdlings, and Westbrook. It is hard to say which was the most discordant; but it having been represented that, after travelling so far and losing so much time, they would all feel hurt if their exertions proved fruitless, we awarded a prize to each.

The competition of organ-grinders was found to be rather monotonous, each having to play his whole répertoire of six or eight tunes. A pipe organ of fearfully powerful tone whined and howled through four slow movements from Bellini in succession, and aided by a tremolo stop, nearly reduced the judges to tears; he bore off the prize in his class. The first prize for piano organs was gained by two ladies from Clerkenwell in the costume of Neapolitans, who together worked a clattering monster of an instrument which played "Home, sweet home," "In the gloaming," "The Marseillaise," "Nelson's Hornpipe," and terrific variations on the "Carnival of Venice." Most of these airs were so concealed by redundant accompaniments in bass, middle, and treble all at once, with wild scale passages heaping horror upon horror's head, as to be quite unrecognisable, but the general effect was decided to be "most brilliant."

The competition of the soloists was much more amusing. The prize for instrumentalists was fairly won by a rubicund gentleman who played the harp in accompaniment to melodies which he whistled with singularly powerful tone, but in quite another key. This the judges did not mind, but there was some question as to whether whistling was not a vocal rather than an instrumental performance. The objection, however, was waived. A special prize was given to a gentleman without any legs, who sat in a truck and played seven instruments at once.

Among the singers a decent widow, who wore, for no obvious reason, a white apron over her black dress, was thought to have a good chance for the first prize, but her style was considered too defective. She brought out the first note in each bar with a whoop, and the remainder was inaudible. An old sailor with two wooden legs had a very powerful voice, but his objectionable habit of clearing his throat noisily and expectorating after every other line disqualified him. The successful candidate, or rather candidates, proved to be an interesting family of father (blown up in a coal mine), mother (consumptive), and three small children, who sang hymns, relieving one another at quite irregular intervals.

The prizes having been all awarded, there were more speeches, more "God save the Queen," and the exhausted judges went home to dinner and dress for Herr Müller's concert. I am strongly tempted to describe this portion of the Festival at full length, but I fear to weary my readers. Most of them must have experienced the horrors of a provincial "grand" concert, and to describe how fifth-rate performers mangled a few hackneyed pieces would be a painful and needless task. The programme of the first part of the concert will give them a fair idea of what it was like:—

Herr Müller was naturally rather nervous at conducting an orchestra for the first time. He endeavoured to beat four in a bar for the overture to "Masaniello," and nearly wagged his arm off in consequence. His "Danse" was very successful, though it bore a certain family resemblance to many polkas I know. But the fun was great at the end of the concert. The last piece was the overture to

"Figaro," and the London members of the band were in agony lest they should lose their train. Accordingly, the instant Herr Müller set foot upon his conductor's rostrum the leader dashed away at the opening passage, and before the astonished conductor had found his place and raised his stick the piece was all but finished. I afterwards heard that it was accomplished in 2 min. 15 sec., the fastest time on record. The local men, as may be imagined, hardly played a note. As if unable to stop himself, the leader then dashed from the last D straight on into "God save the Queen," and before Herr Müller had recovered his senses, the platform was empty and the concert over. Every one seemed to think a grand undertaking had been brilliantly carried through, there was abundance of cheap champagne and congratulations in the artists' room, but as I walked home I could not help feeling a doubt as to whether English Art had really benefited much by Dullborough Festival. A good deal of more or less good music had been performed in a very inferior manner, a number of dreadful speeches had been made and reported in the local papers, several very commonplace individuals had had their vanity enormously flattered by seeing themselves in print, a great deal of money had been spent, and the prize-winners were, man, woman, and child, every soul now inside the public-houses. But, after all these weeks of talk and labour and excitement, who can dare assert that the love of music had increased in our townspeople's hearts? I much fear that the same question might be asked after many far more pretentious music festivals than that of Dullborough.

WORDS FOR SONGS.

BY MRS. WALTER CARR.

A good deal has been said lately about the words of modern songs. The general run of these are bad, undeniably bad. Roughly speaking, the songs of the present day may be divided into two great classes—the love-song and the death-song. Occasionally these are combined, as in the case of the lover whose fair one dies, but as a rule the supposed speaker in the death-song is a mother. In the first verse she gives way to a little natural motherly exultation over the perfection of her offspring, in the second she weeps over its untimely end, and in the end she rejoices over its being, as consolers so often say, "better off." If the verses be very skilfully written, one may be carried along with them in a single case only, but when once the idea has been hackneyed (and how hackneyed it is now!) one's very soul revolts against it. For the love-song pure and simple there is always something to be said. The sentiment in itself is lasting as the world, and, if the words are free from vulgarity either of thought or expression, they are particularly easy to sing, for the simple reason that any passion which can be felt dramatically is easy to express. An emotion very deeply felt chokes the utterance, but one that is felt by instinct or sympathy, instead of experience, is a positive help. Having some real sentiment to carry into the mind of others distracts the attention from self and prevents nervousness. For this reason sacred words are, generally speaking, easiest of all to sing, and what one may characterise as the reflective type of song the hardest.

And yet it does not do to have too much sense in a song. However distinct the utterance of a singer, it is impossible to convey either a crowd of images or a crowd of thoughts to several hearers at once. Shakespeare's songs are a striking example of this. Look at "Sigh no more, ladies," with its "hey, nonny, nonny"; "The poor soul sat sighing by a sycamore tree," with its "Sing, willow, willow, willow"; and "When that I was and a little tiny boy," with its double burden of "Hey, ho, the wind and the rain" and "The rain it raineth every day"—and see how very thinly the sense is spread, as it were. Compare these with one of his utterances on music:—

That strain again:—It hath a dying fall;
O it came o'er my ear like the sweet south,
That breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing and giving odour.

Here we have perfect melody in the words, and, therefore, they are infinitely less fitted for singing than the simpler ones quoted above, as Shakespeare knew. Such a passage may be set to some fine recitative, as has been proved with that from "The Merchant of Venice" beginning "Look how the floor of heaven is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold," which Sir Arthur Sullivan has set so beautifully for a tenor voice in his Cantata "Kenilworth"; but such words are unsuited for rhythmic melody, being complete music in themselves.

Having said that words may be too full of sense and too full of melody to be appropriate for singing, it is worth while to spend a few moments in considering what does characterise a good song. Here, of course, it is impossible to speak otherwise than very generally, for to the end of time the individual musician will catch his inspiration now here, now there, in a manner defiant of all set rules and maxims.

First of all there is the narrative song, which may be a simple ballad or a highly dramatic composition, like Schubert's "Erl-König." It is this type which has been so specially overdone lately, so that one starts with a prejudice against it, and yet it must always remain effective. Look at Kingsley's "Three Fishers"—what essentially striking words they are for singing! The story is plainly indicated, rises gradually to its tragic climax, and has a refrain which binds the whole together. The very popularity of Mr. Hullah's setting, which marred the pleasure of hearing it, was a tribute to the truth of both words and music; and now that it is possible to walk down a street without catching the often inharmonious moan of "the harbour bar," a really good singer might again thrill his audience with the story. This is an instance of a story plainly told; but it may also be indicated in shadowy outline, as is so beautifully done in Tennyson's "Break, break, break." Like most of the Laureate's songs, this little poem seems ideally fitted for music. How suggestive is the change of mood in the second verse! One feels at once that here must come in a change of key or of tempo which would last through half the third verse, changing again at—

O for the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still.

The last verse rounds off the idea without literally repeating the first words. In the hand of a master this narrative type will always remain perhaps the most effective of all, either for the drawing-room or the concert-platform, as affording the most scope for both composer and singer. But at present we get far too much of it, and—the words, at any rate—touched by a hand very far from that of a master. Fresh topics are what we most want. We will not stand any more of the good children who die, and the ships that go down with all hands on board. True pathos never palls; but this is not true pathos. If ballad-writers must be pathetic, let their tones ring true; and then, be their theme passion or pain, they will inspire musicians with worthy accents.

More difficult to deal with than the narrative are the reflective songs—that is to say, if the type be pure; for such songs as "Break, break, break," partake of this type as well as the other. It is not easy to find songs of this description familiar enough to serve as specimens where the limits of space forbid quotation, but Moore's "Those evening bells" will do as an example. As a rule, such words do best for part-songs, and at all times require a superior style of workmanship to the shop-ballad written for sale.

We have said nothing of sacred songs, or many others of a less defined character, for the reason mentioned before—that it is impossible to lay down rules for inspiration, and individual poems will always appeal to individual minds. By way of summing up, however, it may be well to make a few observations upon forms of poetry most suitable for musical treatment. The ballad-form, whether in four, eight, or twelve lines, it is unnecessary to mention, as all are obviously suitable. Of all poems the sonnet is the most ill-fitted for composition, being too crowded with thought and too set, elasticity being a great desideratum. There should be a unity of idea, either intentional on the poet's part or created by the composer's repeating certain strophes or parts of strophes. The refrain is very useful in this sense, but it requires care, or a similar result is produced to that in a song popular some years ago, when a mystified audience used to be informed that—

His last stirrup-cup,
Was his true maiden ever.

Of course repetition may become wearisome, but it seems dramatically true, for is it not natural to repeat words or phrases when speaking with unusual emphasis? and it is certainly conducive to musical form. The roundel, as treated by Mr. Swinburne, seems a very suitable form for composition. The idea is one, the refrain may be repeated or not, and the alternate rhymes would please the ear. Personally, we long to hear a worthy setting of "The little eyes" in his new "Century of Roundels." But—and it is a large "but"—the skill of the poet who hides the artificiality of the form he has chosen by the perfect simplicity and flow of his words must be met by a skill as great in the composer.

When songs are written by such poets, set by composers of equal eminence, and sung by true musicians, we shall have done a great deal to wipe out the reproach sometimes cast at us by other nations—that English composers never draw their inspiration from true poetry, but set words intended for lazy amateurs to sing, by which means publishers may fill their own tills, and replenish the composers' pockets.

The "Wandering Minstrel" in Mr. Mayhew's well-known farce, who knows the value of peace and quietness so well as never to "move on" under sixpence, at least placed the public in possession of the price at which perfect repose could be bought. His victims, therefore, could complain of nothing but the exorbitant terms he demanded for the purchase of his absence. But what commiseration must we all feel for persons with sensitive ears who can neither bribe their tormentors to "move on," nor remove themselves from the noise which distracts them. The "cheerful musical society" promised in the advertisements of boarding-houses—although perhaps often more musical than cheerful—is usually partially regulated according to the taste or convenience of the assembled guests, and at all events those who enter these establishments know what they have to expect. How, then, can we wonder that people who unexpectedly find themselves located near musical houses, which they would have studiously avoided had they been aware of the fact, should endeavour by every means in their power to release themselves from the infliction? In some continental cities we have heard that fines are inflicted upon persons who, perhaps unintentionally, thus annoy their neighbours; and in our own country applications on this subject are often made to landlords, and even to magistrates; but the following letter addressed to two amateur vocalists, which appears in a suburban newspaper, seems so carefully worded that we are tempted to place it before our readers as a model: "The inhabitants of several houses on the west side of G—n Road would esteem it a favour if the two gentlemen residing at 49, S—e Road would have the courtesy and consideration to shut their window during their evening practice, until their musical education is more advanced, and until they have agreed to sing either in parts or unison." Since the receipt of this communication—in a lady's handwriting—we are informed that "the evenings have passed without a sound from the open windows."

UNDER the heading "A New Danger to the Trade," a contemporary says: "Another not entirely new, and to me quite pleasing, fashion we enjoyed a short time since at an evening party. A young and pretty lady was seated at the piano, playing an accompaniment, to which she whistled, with exceeding cleverness, a lively air, following the notes as precisely as in singing. Is the accomplishment—for it certainly is one to whistle perfectly—much in vogue here? It is said to be growing in popularity here with violin, guitar, and banjo playing. There are schools and teachers who give lessons—a pleasant task, one would think, to teach pretty lips how to pucker—at the houses of pupils. Two young ladies will whistle a duet to a piano accompaniment, or a quartet of ladies and gentlemen." We certainly never yet met with a professor of whistling, and were quite unaware of the fact of lessons in the art being given to ladies at schools and in private houses. That this accomplishment is by no means confined to the male sex we know, because we have heard, from undoubted authority, of soprano vocalists who have created almost as much enthusiasm by whistling as by singing; but this of course has always been before a select circle of friends. Even presuming, however, that this natural musical instrument were as extensively taught and exhibited as the voice itself, we cannot understand what trade it would injure, for the "pretty puckered lips," though thoroughly under the control of their possessor, would scarcely discourse sweet music without the aid of a pianoforte accompaniment. From our own experience, we can assert that a large amount of musical feeling can be thrown into this novel performance: but there can be no doubt that, like banjo-playing, it will never cease to be a mere curiosity. At all events, we cannot say that a "whistling recital" has to our own knowledge ever taken place, or that advertisements from teachers of the art have yet appeared in the newspapers.

No one who has attended an Eisteddfod can have failed to note the unbusiness-like character of the proceedings. The programme is never observed, and the irrepressible desire of fussy nobodies to pose on the platform as somebodies is a constant source of interruption and distraction. A remarkable example of this occurred at Cardiff, and it received, we are happy to say, a no less conspicuous rebuke. The occasion was the great competition of choirs which some fifteen thousand people had gathered to hear. For a while matters went smoothly, but no sooner had the fourth choir finished than it occurred to the Mayor of Cardiff that the time was opportune for proposing a vote of thanks to the Chairman, Dean Vaughan. His Worship accordingly made a short speech in English and then called upon a Mr. Clark, of Dowlais, to express the same sentiments in Welsh. It happened, however, that Mr. Clark was shy of the vernacular, and proceeded to deliver what sounded like a set harangue in the tongue of the Saxon. This proved too much for the patience of Sir George Macfarren. Lifting up his voice, the chief of the adjudicators shouted the number of the next competing choir. "No. 5," demanded Sir George, "go on with the competition! This interruption is most indecent." All eyes turned upon him in astonishment for the majority present were born to the Eisteddfod manner and saw nothing unusual in the proceedings. As for Mr. Clark, carried by the stream of his eloquence he halted not. Sir George, however, was not to be beaten, and, raising his voice to its highest pitch, he exclaimed, "Unless the competition goes on the adjudicators will retire in a body." This was enough. Mr. Clark subsided, looking daggers and bottling up his rhetoric for another occasion. The competition was then resumed. All honour to Sir George Macfarren for so effectually asserting the principle of order on a platform where it does not seem to be understood.

It is always pleasurable to record instances of sympathy with artists in their misfortunes, and from time to time we have in this journal drawn attention to very many acts of benevolence towards both executive and creative musicians. An exceptional case now comes before us from America which shows a self-devotion in the cause, as far as we know, without precedent. The announcement appeared as an advertisement in the Baltimore Daily News, and runs as follows: "In the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, ex parte in the matter of James Marion Roche. The object of the petition in the above entitled case, to change the name of James Marion Roche to James Marion Roche Crouch. The petition states that the said James Marion Roche is a resident of the City of Baltimore, that he is more than twenty-one years of age, and that he desires that his name be changed to James Marion Roche Crouch because he has become attached and devoted to Frederick N. W. Crouch, the composer of 'Kathleen Mavourneen,' &c., and his family in their adversity. He feels that by adopting the name of Crouch he can better look after and care for his adopted father in his declining years, and after he is gone his little children can have a brother to look up to and call upon for aid and protection." The very fact of mentioning the veteran musician in this petition as "the composer of 'Kathleen Mavourneen,' &c.," proves the effect which this one ballad has made upon the sympathetic nature of the friend who thus assumes the responsibility of taking under his protection not only the author of the song, but the whole of his family. The value of such a helping hand as this cannot be over-estimated, for, in the words of the lyric which has given rise to such kindly feeling, "It may be for years, and it may be for ever."

THE experiment of conveying the sounds of voices and instruments from the stage of the Savoy Theatre to the assembled guests at the residence of the composer of the work being performed, was so successfully tested some short time since that nothing seemed wanting to complete the effect but the power of seeing the vocalists, with the scenery and all the stage accessories. If we can believe the truth of a statement in the Musical Courier, of New York, this difficulty is now removed. "A certain Doctor Guidrah, of Victoria, Australia," we are told, "by means of an apparatus of his own invention, has applied electricity in the transmission to long distances of luminous rays. The experiments made at Melbourne succeeded splendidly. Forty persons in a dark room saw reflected upon a large metallic disc the race-course of Flemington, with the thousands of persons who were there. This marvellous discovery will enable those who cannot go to the theatre to see the stage and what passes upon it. While the telephone enables us to hear the sound of voices, the music and words, Doctor Guidrah's apparatus will enable us to see the inside of the theatre, the stage, the artists, and the audience." It is difficult indeed to foresee what this may lead to; for if operas, performed perhaps some miles away, can be both heard and seen in our drawing-rooms, few will take the trouble to undertake a journey to the theatre. On the other hand, as operas cannot be given without opera-houses, lessees may doubtless calculate upon two sources of profit, one from persons who pay for admission to the building, and the other from those who prefer to have the rendering of a work "laid on" to their own houses. There can be no reason, therefore, why our present lyrical establishments should not continue to flourish, or the new opera-house on the Thames Embankment be energetically proceeded with.

THE CARDIFF EISTEDDFOD.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

LET me begin by clearing the ground a little. An Eisteddfod programme, embracing art, science, and literature in the most comprehensive manner, ranges from China to Peru in the world of intellectual exercise. I have here to deal with music only, leaving to other writers in other pages all there is to say concerning poetry and prose, painting, sculpture, et hoc genus omne.

The musical arrangements made by the Cardiff Local Committee of the National Eisteddfod were quite unique in their comprehensiveness, as became relationship with one of the most go-ahead towns in the kingdom—a town, moreover, in which there is a strong, if not a preponderating, English element. I do not say this so much with reference to the competitions, though they were numerous and important, as will be allowed when I state that prizes of £100 and £30 were offered to the best two choirs; that a prize of £50 was offered to the best setting of a secular cantata, and that no form of solo and concerted music, either creative or executive, escaped attention. Such features were, however, looked for; what the public did not expect was the engagement, at a cost of £600, of a London orchestra numbering sixty instruments, and the organisation of high-class concerts having symphonies and overtures as their staple. Here Eisteddfod frequenters had a surprise indeed—one which most of them gladly approved, and all of them owed to the English chairman of the Musical Committee, Mr. S. Aitken, himself a musician of no common sort. It is significant as bearing upon still surviving controversy that this great advance in the direction of highest art should have been initiated by a Saxon from over the border. From the same source, I fully believe, must come directly or indirectly most of the reforms needed to place the Eisteddfod abreast of modern developments. Our Welsh friends, excellent people as they are, show all the tenacity with which a small nation in danger of being absorbed by a greater clings to its distinctive life. We cannot wonder at this. It is perfectly natural, and has its source in a feeling which is even laudable. But sentiment may be carried too far. The patriotism is false which shuts out light because it comes from another country, and the policy is bad which checks progress for the sake of national peculiarities. Yet there are some Welshmen who prefer such patriotism and such policy to any other. They would use the Eisteddfod for the purpose of retaining the Welsh language in popular use, heedless of the fact that the people are handicapped thereby as compared with those of the rest of the island; and they would employ the ancient institution for a mere archaeological purpose, instead of turning its unique force in the direction of more practical results. Hence it has been complained of the late Eisteddfod that it was more English than Welsh. There was certainly an English orchestra instead of a Welsh harp. How am I to answer such arguments? The English reader does not want a reply, and he of Wales would probably say that the matter, besides concerning me little, is one I cannot understand. Begging the latter's pardon, the matter concerns everybody interested in our common country, and, as for understanding it, outsiders are able to see far more clearly than those directly concerned what the cry for an Eisteddfod on the old lines involves. I, for one, desire the Eisteddfod to identify itself completely with modern life and modern ways. It is a machine of perfect adaptability, and can be made to help largely in raising the Welsh nation above mere provincialism instead of keeping it there. For this reason I rejoiced at the presence of Mr. Aitken's orchestra, which day after day preached the gospel of a higher art than can be found in mere national music, even though that music be as beautiful as the melodies of Wales.

The proceedings began with customary observances on the 6th ult., the place of meeting being a vast newly erected engine-shed capable of seating some fourteen thousand people. All the first day was devoted, as regards music, to competitive exercises, the more important of which took place on the platform, others being carried on in ante-rooms, and only the winners appearing before the public. The morning session of each succeeding day brought similar work, so that the adjudicators, Sir G. Macfarren, Mr. Joseph Barnby, Mr. Joseph Bennett, Mr. Emlyn Evans, Mr. David Jenkins, Mr. John Thomas, and Mr. Brinley Richards, found their hands completely full, in some cases as many as forty competitors appearing for a single prize. I can speak with some assurance of the general merit displayed. Often, of course, candidates were found seriously wanting in even ordinary requirements; but many more showed great natural powers with a fair measure of cultivation. I should say that what Wales most wants for her music is good teachers. Such instructors as act upon the mass of the people, though very earnest and laborious, are not educated sufficiently, and advance beyond a certain point is therefore hard to make. On the other hand, the people cannot afford to pay good teachers; so for any material improvement we shall have to wait a more favourable combination of circumstances. Yet it is surprising how, even now, individual talent asserts itself. I heard, in Cardiff, solo-singing, playing upon orchestral instruments, and concerted vocal performances—all by working men and women—such as proved that, were Wales properly cultivated, she would contribute most valuable help towards the progress of the nation at large. This is one reason why Englishmen have a direct interest in the proper development of the Eisteddfod. Every step in advance is a gain for them.

As regards composition the results of the Eisteddfod were far from satisfactory. Prizes were offered for the best cantata, anthem, part-song, psalm-tune, chant, &c., but the adjudicators in some cases withheld rewards altogether, while in others they tempered its bestowal with a good deal of qualification. Of seventeen cantatas sent in for the £50 prize, the best were written by Englishmen, and not one was found worthy. The general result in the department of creative music went to show that education has not yet spread sufficiently for good results. There must be more working and waiting before the Welsh people can distinguish themselves as composers on the Eisteddfod platform. It is well that they should know this through such action as that of the Cardiff adjudicators, who based their decisions on a higher standard than usually rules at such meetings. The question they answered was not whether this or that composition was good as a Welsh composition, but whether it had absolute claims as a work of art.

Coming to the orchestral performances, which took place on the evenings of the 7th and 8th, let me say that they were directed with great zeal and intelligence by Mr. E. H. Turpin, who also acted as Eisteddfod organist during the week. Some admirable work was done at each Concert by the well-known performers who had Herr Politzer at their head, the programmes including, amongst many other things of a like sort, Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Handel's First Organ Concerto (solo by Mr. Scott, a resident artist), Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, Schubert's work of the same class in B minor, and the Overtures "In Memoriam" (Sullivan), "Die Zauberflöte," "Der Freyschütz," and "Guillaume Tell." All these works were heard with intense interest by thousands who, probably, had never listened to a first-class orchestra in their lives. The result could not have been more gratifying, especially as it showed how capable the Welsh people are of appreciating good music when it is presented to them under proper conditions. The musical proceedings on the last day (9th) were rather unfortunate. It was the day of the great choral competition, and as a choir had entered from North Wales (Bethesda), under Dr. Rogers, Organist of Bangor Cathedral, the keenest interest attended the occasion. An immense crowd filled the engine-shed, stormed over into places to which they were not entitled, and behaved so noisily that the duties of the speakers, singers, and adjudicators were discharged under trying circumstances, while in the evening, when the united choirs were to have sung accompanied by the orchestra, an unreasoning mob actually seized the places intended for the performers, and would not be removed, thus causing the programme to be abandoned and a sort of impromptu entertainment substituted as best it could. This was most unfortunate, and in its origin most unpardonable, because the authorities knew perfectly well with what a crowd they would have to deal, and should have provided a force of police strong enough to maintain order. The choral competition can hardly be described as a competition at all. It was a case of "Eclipse first, the rest nowhere." Dr. Rogers and his excellent singers carry off the first prize with ridiculous ease. They did well and deserved to win, but South Wales should have made a better fight. Her representatives were lost in their own enthusiasm. They sang with zeal, but not according to knowledge, and in each case sang themselves so completely out of the original key that it became a question with the adjudicators whether the second prize should be awarded. Ultimately they gave it to the choir from Llanelly. At another Eisteddfod South Wales will do better, for "sweet are the uses of adversity."

FESTIVAL IN HARLECH CASTLE.

For sixteen years past a number of Choral Societies located along the sea coast of Carnarvon and Merioneth have been in the habit of assembling annually within the grand old ruin of Harlech for the purpose of holding a musical Festival, limited to one day, but consisting of three separate performances. The proceedings have some features in common with those of an Eisteddfod, though there are no competitions for prizes. Thus, at each sitting a President takes the chair, and makes a speech, the choirs also sing individually as well as collectively, and, though successful rivalry be not rewarded, it is at least recognised. We are sorry to find that the institution does not prosper just now. Bad weather, for several successive years, has impoverished its treasury; this in turn preventing the managers from engaging an orchestra, as had been their wont. Continuing the chain of misfortune, several choirs have fallen out of the union, and hence it was that the Festival held on the 16th ult. appeared shorn of its fair proportions and character. Nevertheless, the doings were interesting and attracted a considerable number of visitors, many of whom were, no doubt, impressed by the hearing of solemn music within the frowning walls of a stronghold built centuries ago for a very different purpose.

The morning session began at 10.30, under the Presidency of Sir R. Wyatt, whose address turned chiefly upon the subject of temperance, that virtue having, it seems, a formal connection of some sort with the Festival. There were present six choirs in all—those, namely, from Penllwyn, Portmadoc, Nevin, Towyn, Dolgelley and Talsarau, the whole numbering perhaps, four hundred voices. The soloists were the Misses Pierce and Roberts, of Dolgelley, Mr. Dyfed Lewis, R.A.M., and Mr. Lucas Williams, R.A.M., the conductor being Mr. Eos Morlais. Considerable modesty distinguished the programme, which included psalm tunes, chants, and simple anthems, sung for the most part by separate choirs. About this there is only to say that one of the objects of the gathering comprises the improvement of sacred music used in churches and chapels. Works of a rather more complicated nature entered into the business of the afternoon, when the chair was taken by S. Holland, Esq., M.P. Glee and part-songs were conspicuous in this programme and some of them were very fairly sung, notably "The Three Fishers," by the Dolgelley Choir; "The return of spring," by the Talsarau Choir; and "Here in cool grot," by the Towyn Choir. To say that the performance in any single case was of a high class would be absurd, but looking at the disadvantages under which the singers laboured it is but simple justice to award them high praise. They amply asserted the capacity of the Welsh people for music. The choral efforts were pleasantly varied by the solos of Miss Annie Marriott, Eos Morlais, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Williams, and in the course of the afternoon a short address was delivered, on the invitation of the Chairman, by Mr. Joseph Bennett, of London, who chanced to be present. Mr. Bennett naturally referred, amid loud cheers, to the great success of the Penrhyn Choir at Cardiff, and added, as one of the adjudicators, that the supremacy of the North Wales singers was never for a moment in doubt. He then proceeded to show the points wherein the Penrhyn Choir excelled, insisting that Welsh enthusiasm, though a precious quality when held in proper restraint, needs to be supplemented by intelligence and the careful training of an accomplished musician. Upon this the speaker insisted at some length, his remarks being extremely well received. In conclusion Mr. Bennett complimented the choirs present upon the work done that day, seeing in it further evidence of a national talent destined, with proper cultivation, to play a conspicuous part in the development of music throughout the land.

The evening sitting, presided over by Mr. S. Pope, Q.C., was devoted to a performance of "Judas Maccabæus." This proved hardly satisfactory, although the solos were well sung by Miss Marriott, Miss Roberts, Mr. Dyfed Lewis, and Mr. Lucas Williams. The accompaniments played on a pianoforte and harmonium were of course ineffective, while the choirs, never having rehearsed together, sang at a very obvious and serious disadvantage. We trust that on the next occasion the managers will be able to obtain an orchestra, and also arrange for some sort of rehearsal in the case of large and important works. The Festival is too useful and much too interesting to be allowed to degenerate and finally disappear.

THE Duchess of Connaught and Princess Christian took part on Saturday afternoon, the 11th ult., at a Concert given at Ascot in aid of the fund for the completion of St. Anne's Church, Bagshot, the erection of which is mainly attributable to the exertions of the Duke of Connaught and the parishioners of the village. The entertainment took place in the ball-room within the grounds of the Grand Stand. Signor Tosti conducted. The programme consisted of selections from Beethoven, Offenbach, &c. (a strange combination of composers), and among the amateur musicians were Lord William Compton, Mrs. Ronalds, Mr. Charles Wade, and Miss Damian, Miss Shinner and Mr. Parratt (of St. George's Chapel), also rendering assistance. In the course of the concert Princess Christian, who received an enthusiastic greeting, and Mr. Parratt played a pianoforte selection by Chopin and Saint-Saëns. The Duchess of Connaught sang "The Last Dream," by Bowen, and a chansonnet by Alary, displaying a very sweet and musical voice, and was greatly applauded.

THE works to be performed by the Tufnell Park Choral Society during the forthcoming season will be selected from the following list: "The End of the World" (Raff), "The Lord is King" (J. Barnby), "St. Mary Magdalen" (Sir Stainer), "Jason" (A. C. Mackenzie), "St. Peter" (Dr. J. Benedict), "Bride of Dunkerron" (H. Smart), "May Queen" (Sir Sterndale Bennett), and "Acis and Galatea" (Handel). The rehearsals will commence on the 9th prox., and the first Concert takes place on Dec. 18. Mr. W. Henry Thomas will continue to be Conductor, and will open the season on the 2nd prox. with his annual Concert, postponed from May last.

SIR GEORGE MACFARREN, the senior adjudicator on the recent Choral Contest at the National Eisteddfod, Cardiff, between choirs from all parts of Wales, and which resulted in the victory of a choir from North Wales, has written from Swanage a long critical letter in respect of that contest to the conductor of one of the choirs, on the understanding that it would be communicated to the other conductors, with the wish that his opinion "may serve a cause which commands the support of every musician." Sir George proceeds as follows:—"The point most to blame in some of the performances was a tendency to force the voices, especially among the boy singers. That boys may sing with beautiful effect is proved daily in our Cathedral services, but this effect is produced by an easy emission of tone, without tightening of the throat. The breath should be impelled from the diaphragm, and never influenced by the rising of the shoulders. Disregard of these principles, by female and male adults as much as by boys, induces hardness of tone to the extent of harshness, and causes the rising of the pitch which, in some instances at Cardiff, proceeded into strange keys, and rendered the singing impossible to instrumental accompaniment. Noise is not power, and the best quality attained is with the least physical exertion. The fault I have named, and certainly not an incorrect knowledge of the music, was the cause of the singing being out of tune on the occasion. By musicianly phrasing I mean the taking of breath at the natural reading places in the musical sentences, analogous to observing the punctuation of words, the giving more or less emphasis to words according to their significance in the musical sense. By just variety of power I mean regard to the directions for loudness and softness and the gradations between the extremes, avoiding to sink in pitch with the diminution of tone, and beginning every phrase with distinct firmness, whether it be soft or loud. I cannot too strongly set forth my admiration of non-professional musicians such as you, for the ability they have acquired under obvious disadvantage, and for their influence upon those who were fortunate enough to have the benefit of their direction elsewhere in Wales, as well as in Cardiff. I have witnessed such proofs of musical aptitude as make me proud of my fellow-countrymen, for so I must and will consider you to be, though my lot be cast on the other side of the mountains that surround, but cannot cut off, the Cymric race, and will never part them from the sympathy of music lovers who claim Britain as their native land."

A LETTER from Mr. W. P. Andrew, quoted in the Daily Telegraph, says: "The movement regarding the translation of the National Anthem into the languages of India has received the approval of leading men of all shades of political opinion in this country, and has been welcomed in many parts of India as an expression of good feeling and sympathy; but, for some cause or other, we have given it very slender pecuniary support, while in India considerable liberality has been exhibited towards it. Canon Harford, the originator of the movement, has already explained on several occasions the absolute necessity of collecting funds to enable translations to be made, and for the extensive distribution of the anthem (when translated) amongst the thousands of native schools in India. For that purpose an account has been opened with Messrs. Drummond and Co., and all who wish well to the movement are requested to send in their contributions with as little delay as possible."

A FOUR weeks' term of study closed on the 15th ult. at the Tonic Sol-fa College, Forest Gate, which was attended by forty student teachers of music from all parts of Great Britain, who, although engaged in teaching in schools and in conducting choral Societies, are desirous of receiving the benefit of further study. The practising class of children has been this year under the charge of Messrs. Proudman, McNaught, and Venables. The subjects studied have included Voice Training (Mr. Proudman), Mechanism of the Voice (Herr Behnke), Harmony (Mr. Oakley, Mus. B.), Acoustics (Mr. T. F. Harris, B.Sc.), Elocution (Mr. Arthur Kestin), Sight Singing (Mr. Venables), Ear Training (Mr. McNaught), and Organ (Mr. W. C. Harris).

At the annual distribution of prizes at the Royal Academy of Music on July 28, the Principal, Sir George Macfarren, in an earnest and eloquent speech, gave a highly satisfactory account of the continued prosperity of the institution, and especially alluded to the fact of the Principals and chief professors of several of the Schools of Music which had gradually grown up of late years having been educated within the walls of the Academy. He also mentioned that the standard of examination had been raised year by year; and that a higher average of talent had been shown by the pupils on this than on any former occasion. The awards were presented by Mrs. Ellicott; and the Bishop of Gloucester in responding for a vote of thanks to his wife, expressed his extreme gratification at the progress which music had latterly made in this country, which he said was mainly owing to the steady persistent work of a central institution like the Academy. The following were the prizes in the female department: Llewellyn Thomas' gold medal, A. Ehrenberg. "Sterndale Bennett" prize, F. C. Smith. Certificates of Merit.—C. Thudichum (singing); A. Dyer, K. Isaacson, A. V. Mukle, L. Munster, F. C. Smith (pianoforte). Silver Medals.—R. Davenport (harmony); A. Ehrenberg, A. Iggulden, E. Rees (singing); C. Alexander, D. Bright, J. W. Buckland, A. Daymond, M. Devey, H. Gilder, M. Pope, E. Pound, E. Thompson (pianoforte); M. Chetham (violin). Bronze Medals.—B. Davenport, M. Gillington (harmony); Misses Arnold, Bocquet, Booth, Brittain, Burton, Cookworthy, Dwelley, Eddison, Etherington, Fenn, Harrison, Hoare, Howard, McKrill, Payne, Pople, Reynolds, Rolls, Rose, Russell, Watkis (singing); Bull, Butler, Corper, Cox, Hampton, Horrocks, Lockwood, Pain, Robinson, Rix, Shaw, Stephenson, Young (pianoforte); Jones (harp); Green (organ); Bull, Cantelo, Cox, Davenport, B. McKrill, Mukle (sight-singing). In the male department the prizes were as under: "Charles Lucas" medal, F. K. Hattersley; "Parepa Rosa" medal and "Evill" prize, Musgrove Tufnail; "Heathcote Long" prize, G. W. F. Crowther; "Santley" prize, Alfred Izard; "Bonamy Dobree" prize, J. E. Hambleton. Certificates of Merit.—Messrs. Croager, Crowther, Dace, H. Lake, Macpherson, Webbe, Wiggins (pianoforte); Hambleton, Hann (violinocello); Briant (organ). Silver Medals.—Knott, Macpherson, Prout (harmony); Lewis, Tufnail, Williams (singing); Cullen, Kiver, Knott, Reddie (pianoforte); Richardson, Windeatt (violin); Drewett, A. Lake (organ). Bronze Medals.—Baker, Briant, Dancey, Hattersley, Izard, H. Lake, Metcalf, Wilkes (harmony); Barker, Copland, Cundy, Edwards, Henry, Morgan, Thompson (singing); Bennett, Dancey, Fox, Gwyn, Norton, Philpot, Smith (pianoforte); Hann, Newton, O'Brien (violin); Burton (violinocello); Tonking, Wilkes (organ); Cullen, Kiver, Richardson, and Webbe (sight-singing). For languages, books were awarded to Miss Russell (Italian), Miss Horrocks (French), and Miss Wilkins (German); for violin playing, a violin bow was presented to Joseph Moore, and commendations were also given to a large number of students in both departments.

THE following is the result of the recent examinations for musical diplomas at Trinity College, London: Licentiates—Richard Frederic Tyler, Trinity College; Harry Edgar Hyatt, Trinity College; Lucy Elinor Hatchett Jackson, Oxford. Associates—Lewis E. Lewis, Meopham Vicarage, Gravesend; Herbert Rolfe, Trinity College; Jane Trotter Bird, Berwick-on-Tweed; John Freeman Dovaston, London; Henry Pickford, B.A., Cambridge and Trinity College, London; Francis Wilman, Heslington, York; John Matthew Ennis, University of London; Emily Asquith, Barnsley; Robert Reah, South Shields; Joseph Walsh, Trinity College; Alfred Frederic Tindall, London; Henry Glasspoole, London; Emily Jane Champion, Trinity College; Philip Sharpe, Bishops Stortford. The following gentlemen acted as examiners: Sir Julius Benedict, musical form and orchestration; R. W. Crowe, Mus. D., Cantab., harmony; A. H. Mann, Mus. D., Organist of King's College, Cambridge, choir training, &c.; E. H. Turpin, counterpoint and fugue; James Keene, F.R.C.S., England, vocal and aural physiology; and Mr. W. H. Walshe, M.D., F.R.C.P., London, acoustics.

THE detailed programme of the Leeds Triennial Musical Festival, which commences on October 10, is now published. The opening performance will be Mendelssohn's "Elijah," the principal vocalists being Madame Valleria, Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Patey, Miss Damian, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley. At the evening Concert, Mr. Alfred Cellier's Cantata "Gray's Elegy," written for the Festival, will be performed under the conductorship of the composer, the solo singers being Misses Anna Williams and Hilda Wilson; Messrs. Lloyd and King. The second part will be miscellaneous, and include Beethoven's Symphony in D, No. 2, the vocalists being Madame Valleria and Mr. Lloyd. The first performance in England of Joachim Raff's Symphony-Oratorio "The World's End, the Judgment, the New World," will take place on the second morning, Miss Damian and Mr. Santley singing the principal parts; the second part comprising a selection from the works of Handel. In the evening, Mr. Joseph Barnby's setting of the 97th Psalm, "The Lord is King" (written for the festival, and conducted by the composer) and Bach's Sacred Cantata "Thou Guide of Israel" (for the first time in this country), will be given; Mozart's motett "Glory, Praise, and Honor," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" being also included in the Concert. Sir G. A. Macfarren's Oratorio "King David," composed for the Festival, will occupy the third morning, Madame Valleria, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley being the solo vocalists; and in the evening Gade's "Crusaders," with Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Blower as the principal singers, and a miscellaneous part will form the programme. Beethoven's great Mass in D, solo parts by Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley; and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" will be given on the last morning; and in the evening there will be an extra Miscellaneous Concert, consisting of selections from the Festival works. The choir numbers 313, and the band 112; leader, Mr. Carrodus. Sir Arthur Sullivan is the Conductor, and Dr. Spark and Mr. W. Parratt the Organists. Choirmaster, Mr. J. Broughton; Accompanist, Mr. A. Broughton.

THE Edinburgh Choral Union, in conjunction with the Glasgow Choral Union, will give a series of Choral and Orchestral Concerts, under the conductorship of Mr. August Manns, during the months of December and January next. The arrangements are not yet fully completed, but it may be noted that among the works to be given are Haydn's "Seasons," with Miss Mary Davies and Messrs. Maas and Bridson; Handel's "Ode to St. Cecilia," and A. C. Mackenzie's "Jason," with Mrs. Hutchinson and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Santley. The Orchestra will be strengthened and will again be under M. Buziau's leadership. The Choral Union may be said to begin a new life this season. It has been in existence twenty-five years, and has done much good in raising the tone of choral singing as well as improving the taste for orchestral and high class music. For the last seventeen years the Conductor has been Mr. Adam Hamilton, to whose influence and training much of the past success is due. He is succeeded by Mr. Thomas H. Collinson, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Organist of St. Mary's Cathedral. The accompanist this season will be Mr. Charles Bradley, Organist of St. George's Parish Church.

In the Natal Mercury of July 21 a correspondent, speaking of the Durban Philharmonic Society, says: "What a lot of good things the Society have in hand just now. In about three weeks they will give a Concert with the following part-songs—Macfarren's 'Hunting Song,' Berger's 'Lovely Night,' the Gipsy Chorus from Weber's 'Preciosa,' Macirone's 'Sir Knight,' and Rossini's 'Carnovale'; while the orchestra will give you the Overtures to Bishop's 'Guy Mannering' and Handel's 'Samson,' and two other pieces, and there will be some vocal and instrumental solos. At another Concert a few weeks later you will have Beethoven's 'Ruins of Athens' and Van Bree's 'St. Cecilia's Day.' These are all being practised just now. In about three weeks the members will give selections from 'Saul,' 'Elijah,' 'Judas,' and possibly 'The Messiah,' for their last and fifth big Concert of the 1883 series. Truly Mr. McColl does wonders for music in Durban."

THE annual meeting of the Watford School of Music, and the distribution of certificates to the successful students, took place on Saturday afternoon, the 4th ult., in the large Hall of the Public Library—Sir George Grove, Director of the Royal College of Music, in the chair. On behalf of Miss Alice Brooks, the hon. secretary, the Report of the progress of the school was read by Mr. Brooks. In this it was announced that two scholarships had been presented to the Institution, one for pianoforte-playing by the head master, Mr. Henry Baumer, and one for singing by Mr. Visetti. The first of these scholarships was awarded by the Examiner, Mr. John Francis Barnett, to Miss K. S. Burn and the second to Miss C. S. Grindley, the Examiner being Mr. W. H. Cummings. Four exhibitions, two of five guineas and two of three guineas, had also been offered by the Council to be competed for by students of limited means possessed of musical talent, the money to be spent in their education at the School. The Council, on the recommendation of the Examiner, Dr. C. H. H. Parry, awarded those for pianoforte-playing to Miss Mary B. Grindley and Miss Bluett, and those for singing to Miss Raynes and Mr. A. Spicer, who were adjudged to be equal. In the latter case the exhibitions have been equally divided. The Examiner to the School, Dr. Parry, in his Report said that there appeared a decided advancement in every department upon the standard of last year, and especially commended for singing Miss Alice Wilson and Mr. Healey; Miss Rebecca Longland, Miss Kate Longland, and Mr. Spicer being also entitled to favourable mention. Sir George Grove, in an eloquent speech, gave much praise to all connected with the School, and particularly to Miss Alice Brooks, the hon. secretary, for her unwearied exertions in the cause. Speeches were also made by the Rev. N. Price, Dr. Brett, the Hon. R. Capell, and Mr. Baumer. The certificates were presented to the students by the Hon. Miss Grosvenor.

THE series of operas at the Crystal Palace commenced with a performance of "Maritana" on the 21st ult., Mr. J. W. Turner, Mr. Lansmere, Miss Josephine Yorke, and Miss Parkinson undertaking the principal parts. On the 23rd Gounod's "Faust" was performed, when Miss Marion Hood made a most successful début as Marguerite, the title-roll being played by Mr. Faulkner Leigh. On the 25th Rossini's "Il Barbiere di Siviglia" was produced with Madame Rose Hersee, Madame Mariani, Messrs. Faulkner Leigh and Walter Bolton, Signori Zoboli and Bellini, and Mr. Griffin. The audiences have been large on each occasion. On the 26th inst. Benedict's "Graziella" and Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" are to be placed on the stage for the first time in England, conducted by Sir Julius Benedict.

THE members of the St. George's Glee Union, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Monday, gave their usual Monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on the 3rd ult. The artists were Mrs. Lansell Sims, Mrs. A. H. Watkins, Mr. Edward Dalzell, Mr. H. Schartau, and Mr. Thurlay Beale. The part-songs by the choir were excellently sung, and included "Parting and Meeting" (Hatton), "Silent Night" (Barnby), "Gipsy Life" (Schumann), "Meek Twilight" (Martin), and "The Cruisken Lawn" (Sir R. P. Stewart); the latter receiving a well-merited encore. The Overture to "Raymond," as a duet for pianoforte and harmonium, was brilliantly rendered by Mr. Kinkee and Mr. F. R. Kinkee. The accompaniments were played by Miss Edith Mahon and Mr. F. R. Kinkee.

THE Grosvenor Choral Society gave its 138th Monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall on Friday, the 17th ult. The programme consisted of glees, part-songs, madrigals, &c. Songs were also contributed by Miss Louise Bond, Miss Edith Anderson, Mr. T. P. Frame, and Mr. Frederick Bevan; and two pianoforte duets by Moszkowski and Jensen were performed by Mr. G. R. Egerton and Mr. G. Winney. Miss Florence Hartley presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. G. R. Egerton conducted.

At the recent Competition of Choirs, held at Northampton, the Rev. T. Herbert Spinney, Organist of Exeter College, Oxford, was the judge. Nine choirs entered, numbering in all about 600 voices, and the prizes were of the value of £8, £6, £4, and £2.

At the last rehearsal of the St. Anne's Choral Society, at the Presbyterian Church, West Hill, Mr. J. Heald, on behalf of the members, presented Mr. Flavell, the Conductor, with a handsome gold-mounted ivory bâton, inscribed: "To Edwin Mark Flavell, R.A.M., by the Members of his Choral Society. Wandsworth, 1883." Mr. Flavell briefly returned thanks for the gift. Since the institution of the Society in April, 1882, the following works have been successfully performed: Handel's "Messiah," "Judas Macabæus," and Dettingen Te Deum; Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" and 42nd Psalm; Haydn's "Creation," and a Cantata by E. M. Flavell and P. J. Brebner.

Miss EVA THOMPSON (Silver Medalist, R.A.M.) gave a very successful Concert at the Congregational Lecture Hall, Lewisham, on Friday, July 27. Miss Thompson's rendering of Mendelssohn's "Variations Sérieuses," "The rabeske" (Schumann), and a Nocturne in F sharp and Waltz of Chopin, was received with well-merited applause. Miss Ambler was heard to good effect in "Softly sighs" ("Der Freischütz"). Mr. W. H. Burgon took the place of Signor Gustave Garcia, who was unavoidably absent, and Miss Pople and Mr. Sanders also contributed solos. Miss Marie Schumann's violin-playing was much admired. Messrs. Kiver and H. R. A. Robinson accompanied.

THE Highbury Philharmonic Society will give three Subscription Concerts during the approaching season, on the following dates: Monday, November 26, 1883; Monday, March 17; and Monday, May 19, 1884. Amongst the works selected for performance are Mendelssohn's "Athalie," Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose," Beethoven's "Fidelio," and selections from Weber's "Eury-anthe." The artists already engaged are Miss Mary Davies, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Bridson. It is also proposed to give an Orchestral Concert on Saturday, January 26, 1884. The Society remains under the able conductorship of Dr. Bridge.

WE are informed that Miss Helen Kenway—to whose exertions in the cause of the education of the orphan children of musicians we alluded in our last number—has taken a house at 10, Darnley Road, Notting Hill, which will be opened during the present month as a school to provide free board and education for orphan and indigent daughters of musicians, and board and education at a moderate cost for daughters of musicians, or girls with musical abilities whose means are limited. Orphans without musical ability will be trained for some other profession or business.

THE prospectus of the third series of "Drawing-Room Concerts" at Nottingham announces three performances, commencing on November 21, at which the following eminent artists are engaged: first violin, Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr Joachim, and Mr. Carodus; second violin, Herr L. Ries; viola, Messrs. Doyle and Zerbini; violoncello, Mr. Howell, M. Vieuxtemps, and Signor Piatti; contra-basso, Mr. White; and pianoforte, Mr. Charles Hallé, Mdle. Marie Krebs, and Miss Cantelo. The subscription tickets will be limited to 450.

A VERY successful Service of Song, consisting of the Cantata "Jesus of Nazareth," composed by Messrs. W. H. Hopkins, Mason, and Thomas, was given at St. James's Church, Curtain Road, Shoreditch, on Friday, July 27. The principal parts were taken by Mr. Hurle, Mr. Elsley, Mr. Smith, Masters Browne and Statham. The alto solo, "Love the enemy that hates you," by Mr. Smith, and the tenor solo, "The Believers' Song," by Mr. Elsley, were excellently rendered. The organ was well played by Mr. H. S. Browne, jun.

IN the notice of the Students' Concert of the Royal Academy of Music, at St. James's Hall, on June 27, which appeared in our last number, we inadvertently omitted to mention that Mr. Musgrave Tufnal sang with much effect Mozart's recitative "Hai già vinta la causa!" and aria "Vedrò, mentre io sospiro," and was warmly applauded.

MR. HULBERT L. FULKERSON, an American, from Cleveland, Ohio, student at the Royal Academy of Music, has been appointed Precentor and Choirmaster to Regent's Square Presbyterian Church (Dr. Dykes's), the position so long filled by Mr. Proudman.

A CONCERT was given by Mr. Sanders at the Beethoven Rooms on Thursday evening, July 26. The vocalists were Miss Clara Dowle, Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Eleanor Crux, Mr. Thurley Beale, and Mr. Holmes; solo pianoforte, Miss Edith Collins; solo violin, Miss Charlotte Wilkes; solo trumpet, Mr. T. Harper; violoncello, Mr. Edmund Woolhouse. The singing of Miss Clara Dowle and the violoncello-playing of Mr. Woolhouse were special features of the Concert.

THE prospectus of the Monday Popular Concerts announces for its twenty-sixth season a series of twenty-one evening Concerts, commencing on November 5, 1883, and extending to April 7, 1884. The Saturday Popular Concerts will consist of twenty performances, to be given in the afternoon, and will extend from November 10, 1883, to April 5, 1884. The artists will include Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr Joachim, M. Pachmann and Signor Piatti, other engagements being still pending.

THE first number of a new periodical, called "Pitman's Musical Monthly," is announced to appear on October 1, under the editorship of Mr. T. Crampton. The journal, besides vocal and pianoforte pieces, original and selected, arrangements for various instruments, old tunes, ballads, &c., will contain records of musical doings in London, a Summary of Country News, Notes and Queries, &c.

ON Monday, July 30, Miss Mina Poole gave her last musical reception of the season, at her residence, before a large audience. Miss Poole's selection included a Spanish song with castanet obligato (the castanets being played by a celebrated Spanish amateur). The other artists were Madame Viard-Louis (piano) and Herr Otto Booth (violin). Several of Miss Poole's pupils also assisted.

THE magnificent three-hundred-guinea American Organ, built by Messrs. Estey and Co. for the Festival at Bayreuth, has been purchased by Messrs. Haynes and Co., musical instrument merchants, of Cecilia Hall, Malvern, for the Rev. E. Ford's new private chapel at his College, Hillside, West Malvern.

WE regret to announce the death of Mr. Edwin Aspa, which occurred suddenly, at Lincoln, on the 17th ult. Mr. Aspa formerly resided at Leamington, and was well known as a composer, his principal works being the Cantatas "Endymion," "The Gipsies," and "The Villagers." He was also the author of several pianoforte pieces and songs.

WE are glad to hear that the tickets for the Gloucester Musical Festival, which commences on the 4th inst., are selling rapidly, and that, from the growing sympathy with these meetings in the city and surrounding neighbourhood, there is every probability that it will prove a financial success.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishops of London, St. Albans, and Rochester have become Patrons of the London Church Choir Association. The annual Festival takes place at St. Paul's Cathedral on November 8.

WE are informed that a medal has been awarded to the celebrated pianos for export manufactured by Weidenslaufer, Berlin, by the International Jury of the Colonial Exhibition in Amsterdam.

MR. H. C. TONKING, R.A.M. (pupil of Dr. Chas. Steggall) has been giving, and will continue to give, Organ Recitals at the International Fisheries Exhibition.

REVIEWS.

Grétry (André Ernest Modeste), Célèbre Compositeur Belge. Par Edouard G. J. Grégoir, Membre de l'Académie St. Cécile de Rome, et de plusieurs Sociétés Artistiques.

[Schott Frères.]

IN this goodly volume of nearly 400 pages M. Grégoir has done for Grétry that which Otto Jahn has achieved for Mozart, and Mr. Thayer is doing for Beethoven. It is a monument of industrious research, covering all the ground and leaving no stone unturned. We gather from the preface that the author compiled his work in competition for a prize offered by the Académie Royale de Belgique, and that he was not fortunate enough to win, the jurors adopting a collective memoir by the members of the musical section. This takes nothing from the value of M. Grégoir's labours, the result of which, as now laid before us, is a welcome contribution to artistic biography, and a storehouse of information for all who are concerned about Grétry and his contemporaries. We are bound to add that our author has not laid out his materials to the best advantage. He appears not to be a skilled littérateur, neither the style of the writing nor the manner in which the abundant information is arranged being of the best. Students will, however, forgive M. Grégoir on this account, inasmuch as they do not read merely for satisfaction with a style and a plan.

Our author begins at the beginning with researches into the origin of the Grétry family, who appear to have taken their name from, or given it to, a little hamlet near Bolland, in the province of Liège, and to have numbered amongst them a rich proprietor, grandfather of the composer, and a prelate named Delvilette who was at one time tutor to the Emperor Joseph I. Grétry's father, born at Bolland, in 1715, was a violinist, and in 1738 married at Liège one of his pupils, Marie de Fossez. He had seven children, and of these André Ernest Modeste was born, also at Liège, in February, 1741. Visitors to the fine old Belgian city may see at this day on the house No. 28, Rue de Recolets, a tablet inscribed "Ici est né André Ernest Modeste Grétry, le 11 Février, 1741." Our author follows pretty closely the boyhood of the future composer, which, however, was not fertile in striking incident, and duly accompanies him to Rome in 1759, where the young man went for better instruction than was obtainable in Liège. Grétry walked the whole way, and was two months on the road. On reaching the Eternal City, he obtained admission to a college open only to Liège students, and there seriously began his studies under Cassali. He appears to have laboured intensely, and to have astonished his masters and friends, among whom was Père Martini, by his extraordinary thirst for knowledge. But, according to our author, he made little way as a contrapuntist. "When one works," he said in after life, "it is useful to forget counterpoint, and to attend only to forms; rules will come of themselves to find the composer in order to strengthen the work." Again, he remarked: "The cry of nature, it is that which constitutes good music."

Leaving Rome in 1767, Grétry produced his first opera at Geneva, and arrived in Paris the same year. At this point our author fairly enters upon the serious part of his biography, and revels in it; taking no pains, as we have already remarked, to make an effective story, but piling detail upon detail till, as it seems, nothing is wanting to complete information. We cannot follow him step by step through his innumerable facts and quotations, but if the reader will copy our example and read M. Grégoir's pages carefully we promise great interest and often no little amusement, for the author drags in all sorts of things that have reference to his hero. Grétry married Jeanne Marie Grandon in 1771, and by her had three daughters, all of whom predeceased him. The story of those young, clever, and lovable girls—one, Lucile, composed and produced an opera—is told by M. Grégoir without art, but touchingly, nevertheless, for the facts speak for themselves and enlist all sympathies. In 1784, the master made an epoch in his life by bringing out "Richard Cœur de Lion," concerning which famous opera M. Grégoir gives a large mass of details. Thenceforward we read not of labour only, but of labour and honour. Grétry went from success to success. He was made a member of the Institute in 1796, and soon after purchased Rousseau's "Ermitage," at Montmorency, where he settled down for the rest of his life, quitting it only once, and then under the influence of fear caused by an atrocious murder in a neighbouring house. In his later years the master dropped the pen of the composer for that of a philosopher, and wrote several speculative books, among them one entitled "The Truth; or, that which we were, that which we are, and that which we shall be." These, however, do not appear to have been as successful as his operas. He died peacefully at the "Ermitage," in September, 1813.

M. Grégoir devotes fair space to the consideration of Grétry's qualities as a musician, but prefers to give the opinion of others in lieu of his own, a course more interesting and perhaps more valuable than any other. We refer the reader to the book itself for a mass of valuable quotation under this head, and shall be content to cite here an anecdote of Rossini, which, as it appears to us, places the characteristics of the Liège master in a light at once strong and truthful. Rossini was dining one day at the house of Mdle. Mars, in company with several well-known connoisseurs, when the talk ran upon Grétry, whose works one of the convives pronounced antiquated and out of fashion. Hearing this, Rossini fired up and said: "Antiquated! out of fashion! learn, sir, that in all times—and I will cite, for example, the very Grétry of whom you have dared to speak, without knowing him. The beauties of Grétry will live for ever. He is the most French composer that you have, although he came from Liège. True, Grétry is not perfect; he arrived, when so to speak, opéra comique had just been born; before him opéra comique was but a vaudeville with new airs. He was the first to give it style . . . Grétry is wanting in harmony it is true, but let me say that in his time they sang on the stage, whereas we sing in the orchestra. With a mere trifle (un petit rien) one can finish that great composer, whom one can reproach only with faults of spelling." On Rossini's invitation, Nourrit and Dabadie then sang a duet from "Les Deux Avares," Rossini accompanying and supplying what he thought was wanted in the score. The effect was immense, and rising from the instrument Rossini exclaimed "You see; I did no more than correct his faults of spelling."

The recital of this anecdote may induce our readers to look into M. Grégoir's book for themselves, and make the intimate acquaintance of a very remarkable man.

F. W. Kornatzki's Compendium of Thorough Bass, and Patent Chord Denoter. [Weekes and Co.]

WE usually find that the inventors of mechanical contrivances by which the study of music may be made easy and agreeable assume the belief to be universal that the received method of studying the art is difficult and disagreeable. We cannot say that we have generally heard such an opinion expressed, save by those dabbles in music who prefer to sport on the surface, or by those who, thoroughly ignorant of the subject, merely repeat what they have heard; but if any artificial aid to the acquisition of musical knowledge can in the slightest degree smooth the path of the student—which, we need scarcely say, is not our own belief—assuredly the "Chord Denoter" now before us may be strongly recommended. Our readers will understand the nature of the instrument by the following description given in the introduction to the "Compendium." "The eleven lines on which the notation of our whole musical system is based are painted on a glass fixed on a little stand, which is divided into two compartments. The smaller one, on the left, is for slides bearing the signatures of all keys. The larger one, on the right, is for slides exhibiting the chords and other musical matters." It may also be stated that notes on the slides raised a semitone are printed in red, and notes lowered a semitone are printed in blue. The numbers indicating them have respectively a red or blue line drawn through them. The scales, intervals, and principal chords are beautifully printed upon the slides, which are to be placed underneath the glass upon which the eleven-line staff is ruled. The method is extremely ingenious, and little difficulty will be found, even by children, in using the "Chord Denoter" precisely in the manner intended by its inventor. With regard to the "Compendium," of course we are bound to accept as truth everything advanced by the author, or the practical illustrations would be useless. We are here told that "there are no such intervals as the eleventh, thirteenth, and fifteenth; therefore chords of the seventh constructed in close harmony on every degree of a major scale, and on every degree of a minor scale, and a chord of the ninth constructed on the dominant of each of them, enable us to trace all fundamental chords in music." It is very certain that many eminent theorists will not agree with these sweeping assertions; for, to say nothing of the supertonic discords, assuredly the chord of the thirteenth on the dominant has been freely written by composers, not only of the present but of a past generation. With Kornatzki's "Chord Denoter," however, we must of necessity combine Kornatzki's "System of Harmony"; and our review, therefore, must be upon the method of teaching, rather than upon the matter taught. Abstractedly, then, we give warm praise to the author for the admirable manner in which he has carried out his design. The book, slides, and stand are enclosed in a handsome case; and every credit is due to the publishers for the elegant style in which the invention has been issued to the public.

A Song of Spain. Words by Mrs. Hemans. Music by A. Goring Thomas. [Metzler and Co.]

AMIDST the sickly sentimental songs of the day, it is quite refreshing to find one which breathes of "mountain pines" and "sunny lands," especially when the verses are written by an inborn poet like Mrs. Hemans, and the music is contributed by an artist so sympathetic with the words as Mr. Goring Thomas. Not only is the melody charming, but the harmonies are natural and appropriate, and the treatment of the song shows throughout the hand of a master. The unexpected change of key on the words "Hast thou heard the music still wandering by?" is an excellent point; and the conclusion of the first verse on the fifth of the key-note harmony in the voice part, with the symphony stealing in on the holding note, is extremely effective. We cordially commend this composition to the attention of vocalists; and as we find that it "may be sung in public without payment of fee," there can be little doubt that it will speedily be heard in the concert-room.

Bourrée in D.

Gavotte in G.

Sarabande in C major and minor.

Composed for the Pianoforte by Walter Macfarren.
[York: Banks and Son.]

THIS group of pieces, composed by one who has already proved his power of successfully speaking in the musical idiom of a past age, will assuredly be received with much favour by pianists of classical taste. One great recommendation is that in each composition the special character of the dance it is intended to represent is most faithfully preserved; and this, we need scarcely say, is not always the case even in some modern specimens where, abstractedly, the music is exceptionally good. The Bourrée has a fresh and melodious subject, and the harmonies throughout are thoroughly in sympathy with the nature of the piece. The Gavotte, however, is our favourite, yet this by no means proves that one of its companions may not become more popular. The theme is extremely attractive, and the second subject, in the subdominant, on a prolonged tonic pedal (or "drone-bass," such as usually characterises the Musette) is quite in accordance with the well-known models upon which the piece is founded. In the Sarabande we have good exercise for the fingers as well as good music; and although we have named the one which most commends itself to our notice, we can assure our readers that all three compositions will amply repay them for the practice they demand.

Poets' Corner. Song. Words by Rosa Carlyle. Music by Berthold Tours.

Longing Hearts. Song. Words by Rosa Carlyle. Music by Leigh Kingsmill.

[Alfred Phillips.]

ALTHOUGH Mr. Tours has now become a prolific song-writer, he need not fear that he will wear out his welcome as long as he contributes such artistic little musical poems as the one before us. It is impossible to separate melody from accompaniment in a vocal piece where the two are so interwoven; but we may say that in "Poets' Corner" the harmonies are charmingly sympathetic with the words, and that in the true interpretation of the song, therefore, the vocalist and the pianist must feel with one mind. We especially direct attention to the varied character of the pianoforte part in the last two pages, which invariably heights, without disturbing, the due expression of the text. Mr. Kingsmill's song has an unpretentious melody which faithfully colours the words; but the effect of the two verses passing from C minor to the relative major, with scarcely any variation, is certainly somewhat monotonous. The harmonies, however, are unexceptionable throughout, and the song may be made attractive by an expressive singer.

Drill-Book in Vocal Culture. By Rev. Edward P. Thwing, M.A. Fourth Edition, enlarged.
[S. W. Partridge and Co.]

THE author of this volume has been a lecturer at various institutions, and brings not only the result of wide reading, but of much practical experience in the exercise of the vocal organs, to his task. In the title-page of the book he tells us that it is written "with special reference to the needs of professional men and private students," and it is high praise to say that this object is steadily kept in view throughout. After some excellent remarks on physical training, we have a chapter on the production of tone, followed by one on articulation, the last-named especially containing some valuable hints both to speakers and singers. In treating of what the author terms the "pictorial features of words," he says: "In the expression 'the hiss of the serpent,' a speaker once slightly prolonged the final sound of hiss. It was wholly an unconscious act, only that he had long been trained in articulation. One of his hearers told him afterwards that a vivid dream of a serpent was the result of that slight sibilant sound." With regard to gesture, too, it is truly said that "monotony" is a prevailing fault. Professor Porter speaks, for example, of one preacher "who had but three gestures, first with the right hand, then the left, and then with both." Vocalists, especially on the stage, cannot too much study this important subject; for what has been derisively called the "tea-pot action" is still too much resorted to by those who imagine that movement of any kind gives as much effect as is necessary to the words they are singing. In conclusion we strongly recommend this "Drill-Book" to all who are interested in the subject of vocal culture.

The Great Musicians. Edited by Francis Hueffer.

Handel. By Mrs. Julian Marshall.

[Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington.]

THE authoress is well known as an accomplished and cultivated amateur musician, and her admirable little book labours under only one disadvantage, which she has herself pointed out—the materials are so vast and the space allotted to her is so small. From this cause the book is compelled to be too much a mere compilation of bare facts. For instance, we read that Handel's father "began life as a barber, and owed his first upward step in the social scale to an advantageous marriage with the widow of another barber." Space we presume, did not admit of the explanation that in the seventeenth century barbers were also surgeons, and not quite the counterparts of our modern proprietors of easy shaving shops.

Mrs. Marshall is also ignorant, apparently, that the trios written by Handel in his youth, and brought to England by Lord Marchmont, are not only in existence, but have been printed by the German Handel Society. Want of space must account for the abrupt introduction of various subjects in Mrs. Marshall's book; for example, on p. 27 we plunge into a notice of "Almira" without a hint of what it was or by whom; and some of the statements are open to question. At p. 136, in the last line but one, the municipality of Halle should be Hamburg. Mrs. Marshall's book, notwithstanding its brevity, contains much valuable information in a condensed form, and is one of a series of biographies published by Sampson Low, Fleet Street, edited by F. Hueffer. From the way in which this last instalment of the series is got up, the publishers would seem to be chary of expense; and we should be glad to learn why the names of the individual writers of the various biographies are not mentioned in the lists of the series which precede and are appended to the volume under notice.

Thirty-six Brilliant Postludes for the Organ. By Dr. W. Volkmar. [William Reeves.]

WHETHER or not the above compositions fulfil all that the word "brilliant" generally conveys we will not at present discuss. The three books each contain twelve short movements chiefly for the full organ. They are well written and melodious, and almost all require a careful and clean style of fingering. The only fault that may be found with them is their brevity, few of these covering more than one of the quarto pages. Those, however, who may be on the look-out for short concluding voluntaries will find them, we feel sure, both pleasing and satisfactory.

Beauty and the Beast. A Humorous Cantata for Solo Voices, Chorus and Orchestra. Words from "Dean's Pantomime Toy Tale Book." Music by Edmund Rogers. [Weekes and Co.]

MR. ROGERS has evidently a special talent for the composition of Humorous Cantatas, for not only is the whole of the music both to "Beauty and the Beast" and "Blue-Beard" (which we noticed some time since) really comic, but it is touched throughout with such an artistic hand as to render these works equally welcome to musical and non-musical listeners. The Overture to the Cantata before us, which contains fragments of the subjects in the Operetta (if we may so term it) is well written and effective. The opening chorus commences the tale, to some appropriate and well-considered music, the narrative being continued by the contralto, with choral observations upon the events which are happening interspersed. Then comes one of the best pieces in the work, a chorus, "Off went the old man," in D major, the principal phrase of which is most happily repeated, in the tonic minor, when he mournfully returns, to the words "Home came the old man." It would be impossible to enumerate the many numbers calling for praise in this clever trifling; but we may mention a melodious air, duet, and chorus, "Oh I am very, very sad," the aria buffa for the bass, "Say, do you love me?" and the scena for the principal voices, with chorus, "Home came Beauty"—the last-named piece having some really excellent dramatic points. In conclusion, we cordially commend this Cantata to the attention of Choral Societies, as well as to drawing-room amateurs in search of novelty.

The River. Song. Words by Claxson Bellamy. Composed by E. A. Sydenham. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. SYDENHAM's name has often been before us, both as a pianoforte and vocal writer, and we have always been enabled conscientiously to recommend his works to those in search of artistic novelties. "The River" has a graceful, flowing theme truly in consonance with the poetry, a characteristic figure in the accompaniment materially heightening the effect of the voice part. After the close upon the dominant, at the eighth bar, the unexpected minor phrase is a point of extreme beauty; and the close of the song upon the fifth of the tonic harmony—lengthened during a fragment of the opening symphony as an accompaniment—may also be mentioned in terms of commendation. The composition is in every respect worthy the attention of vocalists.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE Parsifal performances at Bayreuth, which took place during July, were crowned with the greatest success, both artistic and pecuniary. The utmost enthusiasm prevailed at the final performance on July 30, and it was decided at a meeting, subsequently held, and at which delegates from all the German Wagner Societies took part, to repeat the performances next year. Next to the exertions of the management it is due to the excellent artists who did their very best to render the master's last work as perfectly as possible that the success was so decided and unexpectedly great. The General German Wagner Society, which was founded last Whitsuntide for the maintenance of the annual performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth, already numbers 1,581 members, and is enabled to carry forward the sum of about £300 as a guarantee fund towards this purpose. King Ludwig of Bavaria, the great patron of the late Richard Wagner, will have "Parsifal" performed at Munich during next May.

We have received a prospectus from the "Crystal Palace" of Leipzig announcing the intention of the directors to enable all composers, publishers, virtuosi, and singers to bring their works and talents before the Leipzig public. The prospectus states that composers, as well as virtuosi and singers, year after year proclaim their ardent desire to introduce themselves and their works to the musical public of Leipzig, and declare themselves willing to submit to any sacrifice to obtain this opportunity. As the existing institutions are quite unable to cope with these demands in any satisfactory way, the directors of the "Crystal Palace" have resolved to give composers, &c., the chance to "exhibit their works in the same way that painters and sculptors exhibit theirs." This will be effected by a permanent series of "Novelties and Artists' Concerts," to be given before the musical critics of the town and a selected public. A jury of musicians will consider the merits of each work, and decide if it shall be submitted to public approval. The performances will be under the conductorship of Herr Hans Sitt or the respective authors. Authors desirous of having their works produced will be required to supply gratis the score and a sufficient number of parts for the performance, and will have to pay a small fee towards the expenses of the necessary body of executants. There will be no fee charged for the hire of the concert-hall. The prospectus is signed by a committee, consisting of Eduard Berthold, director of the "Crystal Palace" at Leipzig; C. F. Kahnt, the well-known Leipzig publisher; and Hans Sitt, the Conductor. There is also a list given of representatives and correspondents at several of the largest cities of Europe and America. For London we find mentioned for this purpose "Professor F. Praeger" and "Ewen and Co." (?), Musicsellers.

Amongst the novelties announced for the next season at the numerous opera-houses in Germany, we find Délibes's "Lakmé" accepted for no less than six towns—viz., Cologne, Frankfurt, Dresden, Munich, Leipzig, and Prague; Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda" will be produced at Cologne; and Mackenzie's "Colomba" at Hamburg, where also Rubinstein's "Sulamite" will be given for the first time.

Berlioz's Opera "Benvenuto Cellini" was produced for the first time at Leipzig on the 3rd ult., and was received with unbounded enthusiasm. Herr Schott, well known to our readers as a former member of the Carl Rosa troupe, sang the title- rôle.

The following dates have been fixed for the Concerts during the next season at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig: October 11, 18, and 25; November 29; December 6, 13, and 20; January 1, 10, 17, 24, and 31; February 7, 14, 21 and 28; and March 6, 20, and 27. Full rehearsals will always take place on the previous day.

Herr Angelo Neumann, the director of the late travelling Richard Wagner Theatre, known in this country by the performances of the "Nibelungen Ring" at Her Majesty's Theatre, has taken the management of the Opera-house at Bremen. He announces as novelties for next season "Rheingold," "Walküre," and "Tristan," when Herr Anton Seidl will conduct.

Victor Nessler, who, it will be remembered, made such an immense success with his Opera the "Rattenfänger von Hameln," has written a new work founded on Scheffel's celebrated novel "Der Trompeter von Säckingen."

Liszt is about finishing the composition of another Oratorio, called "St. Stanislaus." He will remain in Weimar until the beginning of November.

Besides the manuscripts already announced to have been left by the late Joachim Raff, an Italian Suite for orchestra called "Im Süden" has been discovered. It is said to have been composed in Raff's best time, between the two symphonies "Im Walde" and "Leonora."

Meinardus's Oratorio "Luther in Worms" has been translated into French, for performance at Geneva at the celebration of the fourth centenary of Luther's birth.

Dr. Ferdinand von Hiller, the veteran Rhenish composer and conductor, has contradicted the rumour, which has appeared in several musical papers, that he contemplates retiring from his office as director of the Gurzenich Concerts.

Dr. Hans von Bülow has completely recovered from his recent severe illness, and will be able, next autumn, to resume the conductorship at the Court Theatre of Meiningen.

A new international journal on all branches of art and literature is about to be published at Warsaw. The editor, B. Zawadzki, intends giving his subscribers not only illustrations by the best artists, but also with every number a musical composition.

Dr. Hugo Riemann, the second edition of whose "Musik-Lexicon" is already announced, is collecting materials for a supplementary volume, and will be glad to receive contributions addressed to his residence, 20, Bogenstrasse, Hamburg.

Henri Viotta has just issued books 27 and 28 of his "Lexicon der Tonkunst," containing articles from "Middentimmen" to "Novello."

Tschaikowsky, the celebrated Russian composer, has written a new Opera, "Mazeppa," which will be performed shortly at St. Petersburg.

"Don Carlos," with which the new Théâtre Italien in Paris will open next season, has been entirely revised by Verdi. The new version will contain only three acts instead of four, and the orchestration will be changed in many places.

An Italian composer, Signor Cagnoni, whose Opera "Don Bucefalo" has been successful in his own country, has written a new Opera on the subject of "King Lear."

King Kalakaua's band, consisting of forty well-trained musicians, is on the way to Europe, where its Conductor, a German, Heinrich Verger, formerly a member of one of the military bands of Prussia, intends giving Concerts.

The first prize of the Milan Quartet Society was allotted this year to a Trio for piano, violin, and violoncello, composed by Josef Martucci, of Naples.

Franz Doppler, the well-known flautist and composer, died on July 27, at Baden, near Vienna, aged sixty-two years.

Another virtuoso on the flute, Joseph Fahrback, also well known by compositions for his instrument, died recently at Vienna, aged seventy-nine years.

I. P. R. Reinecke, professor of music, and father of the celebrated composer and director of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig, Carl Reinecke, died at Altona on the 14th ult., at the age of eighty-eight.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PROFESSIONAL AND AMATEUR MUSICIANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Permit me a few words in reference to Dr. Pole's very interesting paper on the above subject in the issue of your valuable magazine for August.

I think the majority will agree with Dr. Pole in his clear and distinct definition of the difference between a "professional musician" and a "musical amateur." Also, I think, must we agree with him in conceding that persons engaged in various occupations other than music have a perfect right, if they think fit, to fill up spare hours by some musical occupation: as, for instance, playing the organ at church, the violin in an orchestra, or singing in a paid choir. But when this class of persons, having had little or no musical "training" in the fullest meaning of the term, being in very many instances self-taught, set themselves up as "teachers of music," then I think it is time for the legitimate professional musician, one who has, probably at much expense, been properly trained for his calling, who has made it his chief study, and depends solely upon it for his livelihood, to cry out and to inquire if some stop cannot be put to so serious a malpractice. Dr. Pole reaches the root of the matter when he says: "The semi-professional must remember that if he enters into competition with bona fide professional men on their own ground, he must expect no favour; on the contrary, he fairly provokes hostile criticism." Again, he touches upon what is to me the crying evil of the whole system when he uses these remarks: "And, again, the semi-professionals should bear in mind that in entering the field against professional musicians they ought to compete with them on equal terms, and not (if I may be pardoned the expression) to undersell them." Dr. Pole needs not to apologise for using the expression "undersell." It is this abominable practice which makes the non-professional competition so thoroughly unfair. The professional teacher of music has, probably, prepared himself for the exercise of his calling at the cost of considerable money and time—and time is money. Desiring to reap some return for this outlay, and relying upon his musical avocation alone for the support of himself and those dependent on him, he charges what he conceives to be a fair remunerative fee. But what about those semi-professionals who enter into competition with him? In nineteen cases out of twenty their musical education has not cost a tithe of that of the professional teacher, and as they are not dependent upon music for their daily bread, but simply follow it, more or less, to add to their incomes, they can afford to charge a low fee for their lessons (?) (generally far more than they are worth, however) and thus enter into decidedly unfair rivalry with professional teachers. While writing, numerous illustrations of this come into my mind. I am well acquainted with a young lady whose father is very well off; she is an only child, and will some day come into a considerable sum of money. She teaches music, why I cannot conceive, except it be for the sake of occupying her time; and as she charges but a very low fee, some 7s. 6d. or 10s. 6d. per quarter, she thus unfairly places herself in distinct competition with those whose income is solely derived from the profession.

I might multiply instances; in most cases these quasi teachers are young girls (I can think of some half-dozen in my own town), who, possessed of sufficient practical knowledge of music to enable them to get through an ordinary drawing-room fantasia with tolerable correctness, but being generally utterly destitute of theoretical knowledge, set themselves up as teachers of music, principally for the sake of having some pocket-money.

The little that many—nay, most—of these self-constituted teachers really know of the art they profess to teach is amazing. Only a short time ago a pupil came to me for lessons. He displayed an utter ignorance of key and time signatures, marks of expression, &c., &c., but could get through one or two pieces, so far as mere playing went, without any very serious blunders. Of course (as is, alas! too often the case) I had to undo a great deal that had been done in the way of bad fingering, &c., and commence at the very beginning. Judge my surprise on discovering, shortly afterwards, that this very young gentleman was himself a teacher, and was being paid for attempting to instruct others in an art of which he himself was almost utterly ignorant! Does not this come very near to obtaining money by false pretences?

Of course, if no persons could be found to employ such "teachers" their "occupation" would soon be, like Othello's, "gone." But, unfortunately, in many towns, and especially in manufacturing towns like the one in which I live, plenty of people are to be found eager and willing to employ a teacher who charges low terms. It is an undoubted fact that while persons will pay the best price for the food they eat, the beverages they drink, the clothes they wear, so as to ensure the quality being good, they will have their children taught (?) music at the lowest possible price, no matter how inferior or, in many cases, how worthless, such teaching may be.

Only a few weeks ago a gentleman in a good position, with a substantial settled salary and many advantages besides, asked me to hear his daughter play. I did so, and found, as usual, that she could play, with very fair correctness, so far as the actual notes were concerned, a few ordinary and somewhat showy pieces, while the fingering was wretched, the phrasing nowhere, and the theoretical knowledge as to the construction of the pieces she played "nil." She learned from a young lady who charged but a very low fee. With all deference to Dr. Pole's exactly opposite deduction, I think that professional men are, and will be, seriously injured, especially in third or fourth rate manufacturing towns, by these semi-professional teachers. And inasmuch as no one can become a clergyman, or a dissenting minister, or a lawyer, or a doctor without having some authority to show for the exercise of his calling, failing which he becomes a "quack" at once—very shortly we shall have no schoolmasters or schoolmistresses, even in our public schools, but such as are certificated—so music ought to be placed on a similar level, and quackery suffer its just doom. Let every one who desires to follow music as a means of livelihood be obliged to pass a somewhat severe examination, and to obtain a certificate of positive efficiency before he or she can set up as a teacher of the art.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

JUSTITIA.

THE "CHURCH OF ENGLAND HYMN-BOOK."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In your notice of Mr. Thring's "Church of England Hymn-Book," you remark, not unnaturally, on the "frequent recurrence of the word 'altered.'" A brief explanation is needed, which you will perhaps kindly permit me to give. Of the editors of modern hymnals Mr. Thring will probably be found to have adhered to the original texts more closely than any one except Mr. Bickersteth; but he has marked all changes, however minute, while in other hymnals they are not indicated at all. Some of these are merely readings which have become thoroughly established by long usage. Again, many of the older hymns must be more or less modified to make them fit for use. I could fill your columns with examples.

A few slight alterations have been made by Mr. Thring in accordance with principles laid down in his preface, and some others to amend a faulty rhyme, correct a defect in grammar, or elucidate an obscurity of expression. Changes of this kind are usually slight, often of not more than a single word.

Of the residue, every alteration has been carefully considered, and made or adopted for reasons which, in Mr. Thring's judgment, rendered it absolutely necessary.

Everything for which Mr. Thring is personally responsible has been specially initialed, and he ought, I think, to be credited, per contra, with the restoration of the original text in many passages which have been commonly altered without sufficient reason. Such cases, of course, cannot possibly be marked, but they are tolerably numerous.

Yours faithfully,

G. A. C.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—No one can deny the importance of this subject, involving as it does the problem of how best to utilise the singing powers of the congregation. In the solution of this problem, owing to the rapid spread of musical knowledge and practice, we can reckon upon the fact that the congregation as a whole are both able and willing to sing. Your correspondent asks, 'Shall they sing in unison or harmony?' and is of opinion that the harmony "would only prove of a very questionable kind, if not altogether distracting." To whom? This is a point not sufficiently considered. It is not the minister, for he has the burden of the service on his shoulders. It is neither the organist nor choir, for their duty is to lead and help the singing. Nor can it be either the pew-opener or the organ-blower. It is the congregation, and from their point of view must the question be answered. And I may say with confidence, as well as with experience, that so great is the pleasure and so complete the effect of singing in full harmony that those who can take their proper part will do so, in preference to being content with a unisonal rendering. But this latter is effective—and grandly so—as a change, and in nearly every hymn will be found verses which naturally suggest themselves for such treatment. These might be so noted in the hymn-books, as the marks of expression are given in the "Hymns Ancient and Modern."—Yours very faithfully,

J. TAFFS.

THE EISTEDDFOD CANTATA COMPETITION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—As a competitor in the above competition, I write to protest against the withholding of the prize by the umpires.

In the March number of THE MUSICAL TIMES it was advertised that "a prize of £50 was offered by the Committee for the best setting to music," &c., and when I applied for the libretto and stated my wish to become a candidate, no standard was mentioned or conditions imposed.

I am an experienced professional musician of many years' standing; my works have been favourably noticed in the London papers, THE MUSICAL TIMES having always been specially kind to me; and I now, for the first time, presume on that kindness by asking you to insert this communication, to demand that, as there is a best setting (even allowing that there is not much merit in it), the prize be awarded. If it is withheld after this letter, I invite the co-operation of the other sixteen candidates in testing the legality of the proceeding.

I do not suppose for one moment that any competitor wrote his best, but (not knowing who the adjudicators were to be) wrote only up to the Eisteddfod standard, which previously has not been very high.

In conclusion, I would say, if prizes are to be withdrawn at will, this should be distinctly stated, even presuming that the number of competitors was thereby considerably reduced.—I am, yours truly,

DOTTED CROCHET.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collected from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERFELDY.—Organ Recitals have been given by Mr. Jesse Timson, Organist and Choirmaster to Sir Robert Menzies, Bart., at the Episcopal Church of St. David's, Treem. The programmes have included Handel's Fourth Organ Concert and "Hailstone" Chorus, Weily's Overture in G, Bach's "St. Ann's" Fugue, Smart's Minuet in C, and pieces from Handel, with selections from the works of Mendelssohn, Weily, Calkin, and Wallis.

BRADFORD.—The organ erected in the Leeds Road Baptist Chapel was opened on Friday, July 27, by Mr. J. H. Rooks, who gave an excellent Recital, which was highly appreciated. A selection of vocal music was contributed by Miss Shaw, Mrs. Clarke, Mr. C. W. Smith, and Mr. Emsley.—The organ at Holy Trinity Church having been renovated by Messrs. Wordsworth and Maskell, of Leeds, was inaugurated on the 2nd ult. by Mr. J. H. Rooks, who, in a well-selected programme, displayed the qualities of the instrument to the utmost advantage. The ordinary choir of the church was reinforced by a number of friends, and several choruses were effectively rendered under the direction of Mr. Poplewell; the Choirmaster, Mr. B. N. Parkinson, also contributing some tenor solos.

BRISTOL.—Beethoven's Mass in C was performed at St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church on Sunday, the 13th ult., for the first time in any Roman Catholic Church in Bristol, with full orchestra. The soloists were Misses L. Benham, Flemming, and Jackson, and Messrs. James Williams, George Williams, and Partridge. The leader of the band was Mr. Jacobs, the Conductor Mr. Richelleu Jones, and the Choirmaster, Mr. Augustus Simmons, presided at the organ. The performance was highly appreciated by the crowded congregation, and reflected credit on all concerned. At the evening service the orchestra again assisted, and amongst the items rendered were Sir M. Costa's "Date Sonitum," Emmerig's Magnificat, Tantum ergo (Lutz in C minor), &c., and as a concluding voluntary the band and organ played Sir M. Costa's March from Naaman.

CARDIFF.—The large Taff Vale Railway engine-sheds, the scene of recent Eisteddfod meetings, were again used on the 12th and 13th ult. for musical purposes, Concerts being given in aid of a fund for providing telephonic communication between the new Infirmary building and the residences of the medical staff. There was a large attendance on each occasion, the fame of the band of the 2nd Battalion Royal Highlanders, on whom the programme principally devolved, having doubtless contributed to that result. The sum of £170 was required to complete the projected work. The first Concert cleared the expenses of the band, &c., and on the second night the whole of the desired amount was obtained, two gentlemen personally offering to contribute a small balance necessary to make up the sum.

CARMARTHEN.—Miss Marian Ellis, R.A.M., gave an excellent Concert on the 2nd ult., at the Assembly Room, assisted by the following students of the Academy: Miss Marie Mackway, Miss Eleanor Rees (an excellent contralto), Mr. Musgrove Tufnal (Gold Medalist), Mr. E. H. Hann, and Miss A. T. Jones (harp). The singing of the beneficentia was much admired, and Miss Jones's harp-playing elicited warm and well-deserved applause. Several local artists also lent valuable assistance.

COLOMBO, Ceylon.—A union of the Catholic choirs of this city was held on June 19 last, in a beautiful church recently built in one of its suburbs, on the occasion of St. Anthony's Festival. The success was so great that another Festival has been decided upon, to take place on the Feast of St. Cecilia in November next. The music, which consisted of selections from the works of Mozart, Mercadante, and Rossini, and some original pieces by the local composers, Messrs. R. B. and J. C. E. B. and J. C. E. B. and J. C. E. B. (well known in the musical circles of Ceylon), was excellently rendered. The organists were Messrs. N. Brohier, D. John, and C. M. Fernando; and the soloists Messrs. Ubald and Stephen Van Langenberg, Vincent Neydorf, Fred. Gomes, Pierre Landsberger, Edmund Gomes, and D. Alexander, assisted by boys' voices.—Another Musical Festival took place on Sunday, July 8, on the occasion of the Feast of the Sacred Heart. It was given by the choir of the Rosary, who for the first time in Ceylon, and perhaps too in the whole world, sung in English to the original setting of Mr. N. Brohier. The chorists and soloists were almost the same as above mentioned, with the addition of Messrs. A. Holsenger and A. Loduwike. The Right Rev. Clement Pagnani, Bishop of the Vicariate, was present, and his Lordship confirmed the universal opinion that it was one of the most magnificent Festivals in the annals of the Catholic Church in Ceylon.

CORK.—A Concert by the students of the Cork School of Music, under the conductors of Professor T. J. Sullivan, was given on the 24th ult., at the Exhibition. The first part of the programme consisted of Spohr's Oratorio The Last Judgment, which was exceedingly well rendered. The solos were taken by Miss O'Connell, Mr. O'Leary, Mr. Coudon, Mr. Fitzgibbon, and Mr. Paul. The second part was miscellaneous, the varied items displaying to advantage the training of the soloists, the pianoforte-playing of Miss Cecelia Bayley, and Miss O'Keefe being especially commendable. Miss O'Hanlon was highly successful in her rendering of "Tell me, my heart." Mr. R. Howard led the band.

COVENTRY.—Friday, the 3rd ult., being the fifty-first anniversary of the consecration of Christ Church, in this city, Holy Communion was celebrated at 8 a.m., and there was a special service in the evening, when the preacher was the Right Rev. Bishop Mitchinson, D.D. The Anthem consisted of the quartet "Honour and glory" and the concluding chorus from Sir M. Costa's Oratorio Naaman, the soloists being Mrs. Mason, Mr. Spence, Mr. Mason, and Mr. W. Sutton. The Cantata and Deum were sung to Dr. Bunnett's setting in F, and the service also included some special hymns written by the Rev. John Napleton, the Incumbent. The services were continued on the following Sunday, when the morning Anthem was Dr. Clarke-Whitfield's "O praise God in His holiness." The Te Deum was G. B. Allen's in D, and the Ante-Communion Office Totus in F. The Evening Service (at which the Anthem from Naaman was repeated) concluded with Winchester's Grand Festival March. Mr. F. W. Humberstone, A.K.C., was the organist.

DOVER.—The Messiah was performed at the New Town Hall on Thursday, July 26, under the conductors of Mr. Howells. The solo vocalists were Madame Worrell, Miss Marion Burton, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. F. Bevan, and Mr. A. Hill; trumpet solo, Mr. Doland. The orchestra, led by Mr. L. Silberberg, was highly efficient, and the choruses were exceedingly well rendered.

FAIRLWORTH, NEAR MANCHESTER.—On Sunday, the 12th ult., the Sacred Cantata Under the Palms was performed with orchestral and organ accompaniment, in St. John's school, before a crowded congregation. The soloists were Miss Dowd, Miss Haron, Miss Allen, Mr. Clegg, Mr. Kinder, Mr. J. Allen, Mr. N. Whitaker, and Mr. Byrom Dewhurst. The choir (composed of about 100 voices) gave an excellent rendering of the choruses. The Infant Class had been well trained, and was extremely effective. After the Cantata the following selections from The Messiah were given: "Worthy is the Lamb," and "Why do the nations" (exceedingly well sung by Mr. J. D. Smith of Manchester); and the "Alleluia" by A. Wood was leader of the orchestra, and Mr. Mearl presided at the organ. Great praise is due to the exertions of Mr. Thomas Allen, the Conductor.

HELENSBURGH.—The new organ constructed in the Episcopal Church of St. Michael and All Angels was inaugurated on Saturday evening the 18th ult., with an Organ Recital by Dr. Spark, of Leeds. The organ has been built by Mr. August Gern, London, to the specifications, musical and structural, of Mr. G. W. Methven, of Greenock. The programme was well selected to display the fine instrument to the best advantage. The Choir was largely augmented, Sullivan's "Onward, Christian Soldiers" and Dr. Spark's Anthem "And now Israel" being excellently rendered.

Huddersfield.—The Hillhouse Musical Festival, in aid of the Huddersfield Infirmary, took place on July 27, before a numerous audience. A large orchestra was erected in a field lent for the occasion, and an efficient band was led by the Rev. J. Thomas, M.A., the Conductor being Mr. John North. The programme was well selected, and included several choruses from The Messiah, all of which were excellently rendered. Mention must also be made of a hymn, composed by Mr. Richard Mellor, which was expressively sung and highly appreciated.

HURSTPIERCE.—An open-air Concert was given by the choir of St. John's College, in the inner quadrangle, on Tuesday, July 31. The Cantata chosen for the first part was Romberg's Lay of the Bell. The choruses and solos were well rendered and highly appreciated by the large audience present. Mr. J. H. Bebbington sang the Master's part very creditably. The second part was miscellaneous. Mr. E. C. Allen, Choirmaster, conducted.

ILFRACOMB.—A series of Concerts have been given in the Oxford Hall during the week ending on the 25th ult. The artists were Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Alice Kean, Signor Odoardo Barri, and Mr. Warwick Gray, vocalists; Herr Hermann König, violin; and Herr Rudolf König, piano. The programmes have been of a popular character, and the audiences, although not large, have been appreciative.

KILMARNOCK.—What may be termed the "Burns Musical Festival" took place on the 11th ult., when an immense open-air gathering assembled to hear a musical setting of some of the best of the poet's lyrics. The choristers belonged chiefly to church choirs in town and neighbourhood, but there was also a number of young people of both sexes not connected with any choir, but who were able to sing their parts creditably. Punctual to the minute, Mr. Dixon took his bâton, and the vocal part of the festival opened appropriately with "There was a lad was born in Kyle," which was sung with much spirit. In the next piece, "Hail to the Chief," the soprano was extremely good; and "Had I a cave," and "The bonnie brier bush" (both newly arranged by Mr. Dixon) were very well sung. After the "Men of Harlech" and "My Nannie's awa'" "Farewell, thou fair day" was given, sung to the tune now generally adopted—viz. "My lodging's on the cold ground," which had been arranged for the Festival by Mr. Dixon. It was exceedingly well harmonized and was excellently rendered. "Corn Rigs," which brought the first part to a conclusion, received an unanimous encore, a compliment also awarded to "My love she's but a lassie yet." The rest of the programme was uniformly well sung, the selection ending with "Auld lang syne." Much credit is due to Mr. Dixon both for his admirable arrangement of some of the airs, and for his highly efficient conducting on the occasion.

LEEDS.—The half-yearly Concert of the students of the Organ School and Academy of Music and award of certificates of honour took place on Saturday afternoon, the 28th ult., at the Institution, in Great George Street, in the presence of numerous friends. Special mention should be made of Miss Greenwood's organ-playing. Mr. Arthur Elvey's performance of Bach's great organ Fugue in G minor, and Weber's "Concertstück" for the pianoforte, and the singing of Mr. W. Fisher, Mr. H. G. Jackson, and Mr. Northrop. Towards the end of the programme the Rev. J. Bewley, M.A., of St. Martin's Church (chairman), proceeded to distribute the awards. Before doing so he said that although the institution had not been open ten months, a large number of students had been most successfully taught the organ, pianoforte, singing, harmony, and composition. Several had obtained valuable appointments in open competition, and two had secured the honour of a Fellowship in the College of Organists. These results were most gratifying, and he most sincerely hoped that Dr. Spark and his pupils would go on and prosper.

LEICESTER.—An Invitation Concert was given by Mr. J. Herbert Marshall, at his new establishment in Rutland Street, on the 23rd ult. The violin-playing of Herr Poznanski was much admired, and Miss Carter and Miss St. John were very successful in their songs and duets. Signor Bisaccia was the accompanist.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—The first Musical Festival in connection with Newcastle Cathedral was held on July 26, in the Cathedral Church of St. Nicholas, and the success which attended it was so great that there is every likelihood of its becoming an annual event. The performance was rendered especially attractive by the introduction of Dr. Gladstone's Church Oratorio entitled Philippi (or the Acts of St. Paul and St. Silas in Macedonia), the words selected from the Scriptures by the Rev. Powell Metcalf—a work which will compare most favourably with any of a similar character which have preceded it. The style which Dr. Gladstone has adopted is a purely religious one, and although we cannot describe Philippi as a dramatic work, the incidents of the narrative are so sympathetically coloured, and the numbers so effectively contrasted, that the interest is sustained from beginning to end. The opening chorus, "How lowly dwelt on the mountains," is an excellent example of four-part writing. The recitative which follows leads to a charming trio for two tenors and a bass, which contains effective passages of imitation. All the choruses deserve praise, but special mention must be made of the fugal choruses "Praise the Lord, O my soul" and "To Whom be glory," the chorus of disciples, "Why do the heathen," the chorus of freed prisoners, "Praise the Lord," and "Praise the Lord." The most charming solo in the work is perhaps that for the soprano voice, "O the depth of the riches," which contains some striking passages of modulation. The duet for tenor and bass, "Thou, O Lord," and the unaccompanied quintet "Rejoice in the Lord" also demand special mention. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to the music in G, specially composed for the occasion by Mr. Jons, Organist of the Cathedral. The Service contains many striking passages, all of which were well rendered by the choir. The Magnificat is likely to become a favourite service among parochial choirs, although from an artistic point the Nunc dimittis is more successful. The principal vocalists—Messrs. F. Mace, Nutton, E. Perry, McDonald, McCall, and Master J. Walker—were thoroughly efficient, and the choruses were effectively rendered throughout. Dr. Gladstone was present and conducted his own work. Mr. Jons presided at the organ, and played the accompaniments with great taste and ability. The service was concluded by the singing of the festival hymn commencing "Hail, festival day, for ever sanctified!" to music composed by Dr. Armes, the Organist of Durham Cathedral.—The annual Musical Flower Service was held at Elswick Road Wesleyan Chapel, on Wednesday, the 1st ult., when a new cantata, entitled Gudak's Captivity and restoration, composed by George Barrin, Mus. Bacc., was performed. The soloists were Miss Foster, Miss Jennie Thompson, Miss Bellas, Messrs. J. Thompson (Cathedral Choir), T. S. Seatre, and J. Robinson. The chorus numbered sixty voices. Mr. G. Dobbs conducted, Mr. J. M. Gibson presided at the organ, and Mr. A. B. Thomson at the pianoforte.

NORTH BERWICK.—Mr. T. S. Guyer gave the third Organ Recital of the season on the 22nd ult., in St. Baldred's Church. The programme comprised works by Handel, Mozart, Bach, Haydn, Mendelssohn, &c.

OLDHAM.—At the opening of the Fine Art and Industrial Exhibition on the 1st ult., an evening Concert was given by Mr. G. J. Jones's Choir and Orchestra, the programme including Sterndale Bennett's May Queen. Daily Concerts have been given also by Mr. R. Jackson's Instrumental Quartet.—On the 15th ult., the Apollo Choir gave its usual monthly Concert at the "Fit-Bits" Coffee Tavern, Mr. J. Greaves conducting, and the accompaniments being played by Master A. H. Greaves.

SALTBRN.—Dr. Spark, Organist of the Leeds Town Hall, is at present giving a series of Organ Recitals in North Yorkshire. The first took place on Wednesday, the 11th ult., at the Parish Church, the programme including a Concerto by Handel, a Fugue by Bach, and other important and interesting works by Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Guilmant, Rossini, Batiato, and the performer himself, all of which were highly appreciated by the audience. In the evening Dr. Spark presided at the organ at a Festival of Choirs, consisting of about 200 voices, when several pieces were sung with much effect.

SCARBOROUGH.—At the Spa Theatre, on the 6th ult., Mr. Owen Williams, Organist of St. Martin's, gave a Pianoforte Recital in aid of the Royal Northern Sea-Bathing Infirmary, which was well attended. The programme included one of Beethoven's Sonatas, a Prelude and Fugue by Bach, a selection from Chopin, and a Trio by Gade for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte, in which Mr. Williams was ably assisted by the Misses Alderson-Smith. The performance of the concert-giver elicited warm and well-deserved applause, and a solo on the violoncello by Miss M. Alderson-Smith was one of the features of the Concert.

WELLINGTON, N.Z.—The Orchestral Society gave its third Concert on July 9, when a programme drawn exclusively from classical sources was presented to a large and attentive audience, which included the Governor of New Zealand. At each Concert of the Society, a Symphony is given in its entirety as the central feature, the one played on this occasion being Mozart's Jupiter, which, in spite of one or two slips, went admirably from first to last, the splendid final movement being given with unflinching spirit and precision. The Overtures were Cherubini's Lodovica and Weber's Oberon; Schubert's ballet music from Rosamunde and a selection from Beethoven's Ruins of Athens being also given. Three movements of the last-named composer's Sextet were smoothly played by members of the Society; and songs by Beethoven, Mozart, and Kücken were also given. The orchestra numbered thirty-two performers, and was under the direction of Mr. Robert Parker.

WHITBY.—The Whitby Choral Society gave a Concert in the Saloon, on Thursday, the 2nd ult. There was a large and brilliant attendance. Cowen's Cantata The Rose Maiden was admirably sung, the principals being Madame Tomsett, Mr. Moxon, and Mr. R. Grice. Miss Trust was harpist, and Mr. N. Kilburn, Mus. Bac., Cantab., was an able accompanist. The Saloon Band did good service. Mr. Henry Hallgate, the Society's Conductor, had the musical management of the Concert.—A Festival of Choirs was held at St. Michael's Church on the 21st ult., when a large congregation assembled. Special psalms were sung to chants by Elvey and Jones, and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were by Lloyd. The Anthem was "From all that dwell below the skies," by Dr. Wallingford. Hymns were also sung before the sermon, and while the offertory was being taken. The musical portion of the service was rendered with much taste and judgment throughout, and reflected the greatest possible credit upon all who took an active part in it. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. S. Flood Jones, Precentor of Westminster Abbey, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Wright, Vicar of Doncaster. The organ accompanist was played by Mr. H. R. Bird, Organist of Kensington Parish Church. Mr. Carr was the Choirmaster, and Mr. Henry Hallgate conducted.

WISBECH.—Mr. W. H. Jude, Principal of the Liverpool Organ School, gave an Organ Recital at the Parish Church on July 3, which was highly appreciated by a large audience. The programme was selected from the works of Handel, Mendelssohn, Sterndale Bennett, Guilmant, Wesley, and also included a Trumpet March of Mr. Jude's own composition.

YORK.—A Pianoforte Recital was given in the Blind School in aid of the Jubilee Fund, on Friday, the 24th ult., by Mr. O. S. Marshall, R.A.M. The programme consisted of classical compositions by Bach, Scarlatti, Schütz, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Liszt, W. S. Bennett, Henselt, F. Hiller, and W. Macfarren, and included the celebrated "Etudes Symphoniques" (Schumann). Mr. Marshall was listened to with marked attention by a select and appreciative audience.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Samuel Leighton to Christ Church, Battersea.—Mr. Ernest Slater, R.A.M., A.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster to Lambeth Palace Church.—Mr. W. Whitmore Warne, Organist and Choirmaster to the Congregational Church, Beckenham.—Mr. Lewis F. Lewis, A.Mus. T.C.L., Assistant-Organist to King's College and St. Matthias, Stoke Newington, N.

CHOIR APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. A. Butterworth (Principal Bass) to St. Peter's Church, Great Windmill Street, W.—Herr J. A. Toepefer, G.C.L., Conductor of the Lavender Hill Choral Society.

HOLY TRINITY CHURCH, Boulogne-sur-Mer.
WANTED, at once, an ORGANIST (Lady or Gentleman). Salary £35 per annum. Music plain, but good. Evening Psalms sung. A good musician who would give Music Lessons the opening would be desirable. EIGHT HARVEST HYMNS

Words by Rev. S. CHILDS CLARKE; Music by Dr. DYKES, DEAN ALFORD, Mr. LANGRAN, and the editor, Mr. A. H. BROWN.

Price 2d.; words only, 2s. per 100.

"The hymns, which include a fine Processional, are excellently written, and as suitably set; and if music is ever to win its way, will assuredly become great favourites at harvest festivals. They vary considerably in metre; but gladness and thanksgiving are the twin keynotes of all."—Western Morning News.

"A very excellent set of hymns, and most suitable for country parishes."—Church Times.

"The tunes are which in the current vein of thought, pleasant, tuneful, and having a part-song flavour. Nos. 1 and 3, by the editor, are fresh and effective, and No. 5, by the same composer, is elegant in its melody, and smooth in its harmony. No. 6, by that man of many accomplishments, Dean Alford, has a not unpleasant flavour of mixed antique and modern thought. Mr. Langran's (No. 4) a plain note against note tune, will be found to sing well. Dr. Dykes' (No. 2) is elegant and melodious, and set in the quasi-ecclesiastical measure six-four, a time borrowed by the church from an early period of modern dramatic music. The tunes will not fail to please modern choirs."—Musical Standard.

"We would specially draw attention to the unusually good common metre tune 'St. Angelus,' No. 5, which might well pass for a composition of 250 years ago."—Church Herald.

London Music Publishing and General Agency Company, Limited, 54, Great Marlborough Street, W.

Just published, New Octavo Edition, Price 3d.

BALAAM'S PROPHECY,
"I SHALL SEE HIM: BUT NOT NOW."

Anthem suitable for all Seasons, but especially for CHRISTMAS. COMPOSED BY DR. WILLIAM SPARK.

"One of the most effective, melodious anthems with which we are acquainted."—The Choir.

Folio Edition, Price 1s. 6d.; Vocal Parts, 3d. each.

THE HOLY CITY

A SACRED CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL."The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen."A good sound musical work this 'Holy City'! I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph."The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard."The Holy City" is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times."We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr.
Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette."A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier."This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; Ditto, paper boards, 3s.; Voice

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

NEW PART-SONG. PRICE 3d.

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

This Part-Song, written for, and dedicated to, the Kyrie Society, is laid out in Mr. Gaul's very best manner, and while recalling, for its beautiful effects, his elegant Part-Song, "The Silent Land," the resemblance begins and ends there. Mr. Gaul knows to the very letter the capabilities of the voices he writes for, and one is perfectly safe, even after a single experience only, in predicting a widespread popularity to "The Children's Hour."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

BOOK II. of Herr A. HOERING'S NEW

METHOD FOR THE PIANOFORTE on an entirely new principle, complete in Six Books. It is quite impossible for us to learn to play the Piano well unless we learn to understand what we play. A mere parrot-like performance may be good enough for the uneducated, but is quite unworthy of intellectual beings who strive for something higher. By the above method musical students are trained from the very beginning, in a systematic course of 120 lessons, to become thorough musicians, by learning to understand what they play at the same time as they are trained to become clever performers on the Piano. All conscientious teachers of music who are anxious about the sure and rapid progress of their pupils ought to send for a specimen copy of Book I. and a Prospectus, containing full particulars, from the Author, 1, Cambridge Road, Teddington, or may be ordered from the publishers, NOVELLO, EWER and Co., London.

A few testimonials out of many—

"Dear Sir,—Book I. of your New Method to hand this morning. I like it immensely, and when Book II. is ready please send it to me. I shall introduce it to my pupils, &c."

"Yours faithfully,
E. L. R."

"N— Road, Middlesbrough, July 6, 1883."

"Dear Sir,—Many thanks for sending me your Method for perusal. I must say it is an excellent method and worthy of all teachers' notice, and I will introduce it to all my pupils. You may send me another copy of Book I., for which I enclose stamps."

"B— House, Margate, July 10, 1883."

"Sir,—I find your method excellent."

Important to all who are anxious to become First-class Performers on the Piano.

WHY WASTE your TIME and your MONEY

by paying high fees for MUSIC LESSONS by the Old Method, by which you will never become intellectual and first-class Players, when a double Lesson for 10s. 6d. from Herr A. Hoering, 1, Cambridge Road, Teddington, either by correspondence or personally (where possible), will be sufficient to point out to the intellectual and earnest Student of Music the only correct and reasonable way for making the most rapid progress in the shortest possible time? An incredible amount of time, labour, and talent (and money too) is wasted annually with the old Method, and the never effect what it pretends to do, and thousands are misled by its ostentatious pretensions. The mere mechanical Training of the fingers for brilliant execution might do for the uneducated and the indolent, but is unworthy of intellectual beings, who strive for something higher. With Herr A. Hoering's new Method, the Technical Training goes hand in hand with the Intellectual Training of the Students, whereby an immense amount of time and labour is saved. Write for Prospectus, containing Terms and numerous Testimonials from pupils, to the above address.

NOTICE.—£50 worth of books, containing most valuable information on the Study of Music will be given away during three months, beginning September 1.

Those who take the above Double Lesson will receive free of charge, as a gift from the Author, the following books (value 3s. net):—

1. "Music and How to become a Musical Man." Price 1s.

2. "Pianoforte Playing to highest perfection." Price 1s.

3. And either Book I. or Book II. of Herr A. Hoering's New Method for the Pianoforte, as advertised above.

OFFERTORY SENTENCES

SET TO

TUNES FROM "THE HYMNARY"

BY

J. POWELL METCALFE.

Price Fourpence.

PREFACE.

There is an ever increasing conviction that decency and order are better promoted by the singing than the saying of the Offertory Sentences—and that not only in our larger, but in our smaller churches as well. In the latter the adoption of the desired use is to a great extent prevented by the anthem character of the music employed in the usual offertory setting.

The following arrangements are more especially intended for the use of those choirs who, not being regularly trained in anthem-singing, are accustomed to rely on the tunelessness, form and compactness of the hymn-tune for aid in fittingly rendering the words they sing.

PREFACE.

This work is here given in its complete form, namely, in Three Parts:

Part I.—For Little Players.

Part II.—For more Advanced Players.

Part III.—For more Matured Players.

The last part, though composed some years later than the others, was designed by Schumann as a sequel to them, and is therefore necessary to complete the series, which is one of progressive difficulty intended to promote the development of the mental and technical powers of the Student.

Some misunderstanding as to the form and extent of the "Album for the Young" has arisen through former English Editions, which have omitted the Third Part, substituting the "Scenes of Childhood" (Kinderscenen), Op. 15. This is, however, an entirely distinct work, and is therefore now issued in another Vol., which also contains a set of short detached pieces entitled "Album Leaves," Op. 124.

A source of great inconvenience to students and players is the want of uniformity in the signs used to express fingering. In England the thumb is represented by $\dagger$, whereas, on the Continent and in America it is marked 1; thus the figures 1, 2, 3, 4 have a different meaning in an English edition from that which they have in a foreign one, a discrepancy which cannot but cause embarrassment, especially in reading new music. The advantage of having only one set of figures in general use is obvious, and as it cannot be expected that the mode recognised by a majority of countries will be altered to that which is used in England alone, it seems inevitable that what is called "foreign fingering" should ultimately prevail.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. have therefore decided on the important step of adopting this mode (that is, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 instead of $\dagger$, 1, 2, 3, 4) in their future publications, and it is accordingly introduced in this edition.

London, July, 1883.

Miss Kilmansegg & her Golden Leg

GRAND OLD-FASHIONED CANTATA

BY

CAROLINE HOLLAND

Words by THOMAS HOOD.

Price 3s.

"In the music Miss Holland has written to Hood's poem, she shows herself to be possessed of real talent for dramatic writing, combined with a thoroughly English vein of melody. . . ."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Miss Kilmansegg" is not only a very musical composition, but it is also full of those little touches of art which can "raise or quell" the feelings of the listeners. . . . Is at times tender as well as comic, and never is wanting in the element of refinement."—Morning Post.

"Miss Holland's music is extremely tuneful and pleasing, and it overflows with fun. Her setting of the more comic passages of Hood's poem is an example of admirable fooling. . . . The whole chorus entered heartily into the spirit of the fun. The Cantata may be cordially recommended to small Choral Societies in search of light music."—Athenaeum.

"No forbearance of any kind is necessary in dealing with the performances organised by Miss Holland. . . . The subject of woman's capacity for composition has recently been raised in our columns. Those who take a sanguine view of the matter may derive encouragement by an examination of Miss Holland's setting of Hood's humorous poem. . . . That the composer is a cultivated musician is obvious from the excellent construction of the Chorus. . . . She also appears to have an exhaustless fund of tune at her command, while her melodies are remarkable for a piquancy of style quite in keeping with the lines to which they are set. . . . The performance at Grosvenor House was thoroughly efficient, and the work was received by a distinguished audience with mingled laughter and applause."—The Musical Times.

"Miss Holland's venture into the field of Cantata is generally admitted to be satisfactory. The Athenaeum recommends it to 'small choral societies.' I hope some of them will be tempted to take their stand upon 'Miss Kilmansegg and Her Golden Leg.'"—Truth.

CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."
SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).
PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).
MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

A system of construction which, by a careful application of scientific principles, Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have brought to great perfection, is now generally acknowledged as the only one calculated to render the Piano almost impervious to the deleterious influences of damp and extremes of temperature, while it stands better in tune with one-fourth of the usual tuning—a most important consideration where tuners are not readily obtained. The inestimable advantages thus secured are augmented by an increased power and purity of tone hitherto unattainable in the Upright Piano.

A selection from numerous testimonials will be a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the Pianos manufactured by this Firm:—

The Pianettes manufactured by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.—Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Opera.

I consider that Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. Their Pianettes are specially deserving of notice in being remarkable both for their cheapness and general excellence. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,

English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Brackly Villa, Dulwich.

I have on several occasions selected Pianos from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, and have great pleasure in stating they have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate.

THE LONDON MUSIC PUBLISHING AND GENERAL AGENCY COMPANY (LIMITED).

THE DIRECTORS believe that, notwithstanding the activity of private publishing firms, full provision in some particulars has not even yet been made for the growth of the national musical taste, and that a large field of operations is open in facilitating the publication of meritorious works by young and unknown musicians. To secure so far as possible against the issue of music that would be unworthy of public attention, a jury of three musicians will examine works offered for publication, which will be accepted or otherwise according to the verdict of these judges. The Company is now prepared to receive MSS. for consideration.

The Company being desirous of meeting the requirements of the large number of persons who very justly complain that the present high price of pianofortes places the attainment of a really good instrument quite beyond their reach, have determined to supply for cash genuine Pianofortes which for volume of tone, quality of touch, solidity of construction, durability, and finish compare most favourably with the productions of the best makers, both English and Foreign, and at prices which have never before been attempted. This they will be enabled to do by supplying the instruments direct from their factory at first cost, and as they will supply for cash only, it is obvious that purchasers dealing with the Company will save the amount usually added for credit, middle profits, and bad debts. The prices at which these instruments will be sold will range from Ten to Forty Guineas.

The Company are now prepared to supply Pianofortes direct from their factory at first cost, viz. :—

EPPS'S COCOA.—“By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by the careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage, which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame.”—Civil Service Gazette. EIGHT HARVEST HYMNS

Words by Rev. S. CHILDS CLARKE; Music by Dr. DYKES, DEAN ALFORD, Mr. LANGRAN, and the editor, Mr. A. H. BROWN.

Price 2d.; words only, 2s. per 100.

"The hymns, which include a fine Processional, are excellently written, and as suitably set; and if music is ever to win its way, will assuredly become great favourites at harvest festivals. They vary considerably in metre, but gladness and thanksgiving are the twin keywords of all."—Western Morning News.

"A very excellent set of hymns, and most suitable for country parishes."—Church Times.

"The tunes are much in the current vein of thought, pleasant, tuneful, and having a part-song flavour. Nos. 1 and 3, by the editor, are fresh and effective, and No. 5, by the same composer, is elegant in its melody, and smooth in its harmony. No. 6, by that man of many accomplishments, Dean Alford, has a not unpleasant flavour of mixed antique and modern thought. Mr. Langran's (No. 4) a plain note against note tune, will be found to sing well. Dr. Dykes' (No. 2) is elegant and melodious, and set in the quasi-ecclesiastical measure six-four, a time borrowed by the church from an early period of modern dramatic music. The tunes will not fail to please modern choirs."—Musical Standard.

"We would specially draw attention to the unusually good common metre tune 'St. Angelus,' No. 5, which might well pass for a composition of 250 years ago."—Church Herald.

BY HER MAJESTY'S ROYAL LETTERS PATENT

GRANTED TO

WM. CHINNOCK DYER

1882.

Letters Patent from the French Government have also been received by the Inventor.

Members of the Musical Profession and Trade are requested to apply to the Inventor and Patentee for the Drawings, full Explanations, and Prices of this the latest and most improved

PATENT ACTION

FOR

Attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte

WHICH ACTION HE HAS, AFTER CONTINUED STUDY, BROUGHT TO PERFECTION, AND GAINED THE APPROVAL OF HER MAJESTY'S COMMISSIONERS OF PATENTS.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE says:—

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. Wm. CHINNOCK DYER's Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ.

"It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils."

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, is easily attached to any Pianoforte. £ 8.

ADDRESS—WM. CHINNOCK DYER,

INVENTOR AND PATENTEE,
WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

To show the popularity gained by this invention, and the way it is making in the houses of organists and students, the last Patent Action sent out previous to March 1 was numbered 2,024; thus it will be seen that the turn-out for six months as above will give a total of over 4,000 per annum.

Agents for Birmingham, where it may be seen, Messrs. ROGERS and PRIESTLY, Colmore Row.

Agents for Glasgow, where it may be seen, Mr. ALEXANDER BIGGAR, 102, Sauchiehall Street.

Agents for Dundee and Perth, Messrs. PATERSON, SONS and CO., 130, Nethergate, Dundee, and Princes Street, Perth.

Agents for Halifax and West Vale, where it may be inspected, Mr. SQUIRE HAIGH, Victoria Street, West Vale.

Agents for Lindow, Lancaster, where it may be seen, Mr. WM. STUART, 28, Portland Street.

Agents are required in every Town. Apply to the Inventor and Patentee as above.

CAUTION.—This being the latest Patent Pedal Action, intending purchasers should note that it is the most perfect and reliable, as it contains every improvement; and being manufactured solely of well-seasoned mahogany, carefully bushed with red cloth, will continue to give the very best Pedal practice to Organists and Students.

Kindly read the testimonial above.

Before purchasing send to the Inventor for the drawings and prices of this the most recent Patent Pedal Action.

Organists should recommend these Pedals and Patent Action to their Pupils.

No more Pedal "Attachments" to Pianos.

THE "COLLEGE" PEDAL REED ORGANS are the only instruments at which an Organist can find himself "at home," as all Scales, Positions, and Measures are adopted strictly in accordance with the Resolutions of the Council of the College of Organists. Sole makers, E. and W. Snell, King Street North, Camden Town, London. Pedal Reed Organs, with one to three manuals and every modern improvement, built to order. Prices, estimates, &c., free.—The "C.N.E.L." perfected Harmoniums.

From C. H. Barker, Esq., Organist of Holy Trinity, Bradford.

April 25, 1883.

Dear Sirs,—After having carefully and completely examined and tested the three-manual Reed Organ which you have built for me, I have no scruple in testifying to the excellence of the work from every point of view, whether as regards mechanical perfection or beauty of tone. The pedals and the swell are very effective. Indeed, as a whole I think it is a fine instrument, and reflects great credit upon your firm.

Respectfully yours,

E. and W. Snell, London.

C. H. BARKER.

PREFACE.

This work is here given in its complete form, namely, in Three Parts:

Part I.—For Little Players.

Part II.—For more Advanced Players.

Part III.—For more Matured Players.

The last part, though composed some years later than the others, was designed by Schumann as a sequel to them, and is therefore necessary to complete the series, which is one of progressive difficulty intended to promote the development of the mental and technical powers of the Student.

Some misunderstanding as to the form and extent of the "Album for the Young" has arisen through former English Editions, which have omitted the Third Part, substituting the "Scenes of Childhood" (Kinderscenen), Op. 15. This is, however, an entirely distinct work, and is therefore now issued in another Vol., which also contains a set of short detached pieces entitled "Album Leaves," Op. 124.

A source of great inconvenience to students and players is the want of uniformity in the signs used to express fingering. In England the thumb is represented by +, whereas, on the Continent and in America it is marked 1; thus the figures 1, 2, 3, 4 have a different meaning in an English edition from that which they have in a foreign one, a discrepancy which cannot but cause embarrassment, especially in reading new music. The advantage of having only one set of figures in general use is obvious, and as it cannot be expected that the mode recognised by a majority of countries will be altered to that which is used in England alone, it seems inevitable that what is called "foreign fingering" should ultimately prevail.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. have therefore decided on the important step of adopting this mode (that is, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 instead of +, 1, 2, 3, 4) in their future publications, and it is accordingly introduced in this edition.

PROSPECTUS.

The above comprises musicians of all ages and countries—composers, singers, instrumentalists, theorists, &c.—including many now living. That a work of this nature, pressing wanted in England cannot be doubted, the last work of any moment upon the subject being a "Biographical Dictionary of Musicians," published about 1824, in two octavo volumes treating of some seven or eight thousand names, and having sketches of about one hundred English musicians then living. Much space was, however, in some cases devoted to people who are now forgotten, while composers of sterling merit were omitted or dismissed in a very few lines; and there were many errors committed in regard to names and dates, several of which were the means of misleading Fétis and other writers. It is hoped that while this little volume will be sufficient to satisfy the desires of that large class of amateurs who merely wish for a little information, more eager students will be stimulated by its perusal to consult some of the larger works upon the subject. In conclusion, the Editor begs to say that he has for upwards of thirty years been compiling material for this work, and as he has paid particular attention to chronology, he trusts it will in some measure supply a long-felt want.

"DAS WOHLTEMPERIRTE CLAVIER."

By J. S. SHEDLOCK, B.A.

J. N. FORKEL, the celebrated musical critic and historian, in his biography of Bach, says that the composer, throughout his life, strove to make the faulty good, the good better, and the better best. Bach had an extraordinary power of self-criticism, and he did not hesitate to alter notes and passages even in writings which were printed, or copied and distributed among his friends and pupils. It is all very well to read about the wonderful rapidity with which some works by the great composers were written down; but, after all, the most perfect masterpieces are only produced by great patience and labour, and by attention even to the minutest details. A glance at Beethoven's sketch-books will show how that great writer turned over his thoughts until they assumed a shape which perfectly satisfied him. In a series of articles on "Elijah," in last year's MUSICAL TIMES, we learnt how Mendelssohn "touched and retouched as long as anything seemed wanting to his stern self-criticism." And now we propose to speak about Bach's great work "Das Wohltemperirte Clavier," an account of the autographs, copies, and printed editions, with their varied readings, will not only illustrate what we have said with regard to purification, progress, and perfection, but will also lead us to speak of matters which can scarcely fail to prove both interesting and instructive to musicians.

The first part of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier" was written in 1722. At that time Bach was Kapellmeister to Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Cöthen. The lexicographer Gerber, whose father was a pupil of Bach's, in Leipzig, soon after 1722, and whose testimony, therefore, is of some value, tells us that this first part was written at a place where Bach had neither musical occupation nor instrument, and that he set to work at the Preludes and Fugues in order to kill time. Beyond this we know scarcely anything of the origin of these wonderful masterpieces. The second part was written at a much later period. The first printed copy of both parts appeared either at the end of the eighteenth or the beginning of the nineteenth century. (We may perhaps mention that the twenty-fourth Fugue, Book I., and the twentieth Prelude, Book II., are to be found at the end of Kirnberger's "Kunst des reinen Satzes in der Musik," which appeared in 1774.) Hilgenfeldt, in his biography of Bach (1850), speaks of a London edition of the Preludes and Fugues brought out by Kollmann, Organist of the German Chapel, St. James's, in 1799. We are, however, disposed to question the accuracy of this statement. Sir George Grove, in his "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," only makes vague mention of it; no such book is to be found in the musical library of the British Museum; and, besides, we think that S. Wesley would certainly have spoken of it in his letters which we shall presently notice, or in the preface to the Wesley and Hofn edition of the Preludes and Fugues. The editions of Nägeli (of Zurich) and of Simrock (of Bonn) came out in 1800. Several autographs of the first part and copies of both parts have been preserved: some are in the hands of private persons, some in the Berlin and other libraries.

The principal autograph (marked as No. 1 in Kroll's preface to the volume of the Bach-Gesellschaft containing the "Wohltemperirte Clavier") was formerly in the possession of Herr R. Volkmann, in Pesth, and now belongs to Herr Dr. Wagener, of Berlin. It contains the whole of the first twenty-four Preludes and Fugues with the exception of the F sharp major Fugue and the first six bars of the F sharp minor Prelude. These were on one sheet, which has been lost. The title, in Bach's handwriting, is characteristic, and we give it in full: "Das wohl temperirte Clavier oder Praeludia und Fugen durch alle Tone und Semitonia so wohl tertiam majorem oder Ut Re Mi anlangend, als auch tertiam minorem oder Re Mi Fa betreffend. Zum Nutzen und Gebrauch der Lehrbegierigen Musicalischen Jugend als auch derer in diesem Studio schon habil seyenden besonders Zeit Vertrieb aufgesetzt und verfertigt von Johann Sebastian Bach p. t. Hochfürstl. Anhalt. Cöthenischen Capell-Meistern und Directore derer Cammer-Musiken. Anno 1722." After the last fugue is marked "1732," probably the year in which the copy was made. Of the original autograph there seems to be no trace.

In this Wagener autograph there are many corrections and additions. It is somewhat difficult to determine whether or not they are in Bach's handwriting, for about sixty years ago the manuscript was damaged by water, and the notes were touched up by some skilful pen. These corrections and additions are, however, considered by Kroll, almost in every case, improvements; and he has adopted this second reading as the text of the B.-G. edition, giving in the appendix many quotations from the earlier form. He lays great stress on the fact that Altnikol and Kirnberger (the former Bach's pupil and son-in-law, the latter "one of the most remarkable of Bach's scholars") introduced all these changes in the copies which they made of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier." Spitta is of opinion that this Wagener autograph was the one which Bach kept for his own use. The autograph marked by Kroll as No. 7 is now in the Berlin Royal Library, and is said to have belonged to Wilhelm Friedemann, Bach's eldest son, and to have been sold by him to an organist named Müller, in Brunswick. Some sheets were missing containing the earlier numbers up to the fiftieth bar of the C sharp minor Fugue. When Müller died, in 1835, the autograph passed into the hands of Professor Griepenkerl. This manuscript contains many mistakes—incorrect notes, others omitted, wrong entry of parts, and so on—as if, to use Kroll's expression, the composer's patience had become gradually exhausted. Many alterations have also been made by a strange hand.

The only other autograph of the first part mentioned by Kroll is the so-called Fischhof'sches autograph (B.-G., No. 10). It was bequeathed to the Berlin Royal Library by the late Professor Fischhof. It has the same title as No. 1, only the year mark is wanting. Its authenticity has been called into question.

With regard to the second part of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier," Kroll only mentions some of the Preludes and Fugues in the possession of Professor Bach, of Berlin; and the Fugue in A flat in the Berlin Library. Spitta, however, declares that the former are not autographs, and he further informs us that the rest of the manuscript (with the exception of the G and B major Fugues) was found in 1876 among the collections of music belonging to the King of Saxony. So the only known autograph of the second part is the one Fugue in A flat. Of the first part Spitta has more to tell us.

After Emanuel Bach's death, at Hamburg in 1788, his only daughter, Anna Karoline Philippine, is said to have sold an autograph to a certain J. K. Horner, who in turn gave or sold it in 1802 to Hans George Nägeli, of Zurich. His sons sold the manuscript to Herr Ott-Usteri; and at his death his collection of autographs, including this one, were deposited in the Zurich Library. Spitta considers this Nägeli autograph the latest and the best; and, moreover, he adds that it was probably the copy which Emanuel took away with him when he left his father's house in 1735. It follows, as a rule, the first reading of the Wagener autograph; and, if we may judge from the examples given by Spitta, the passages which differ from the other autographs and copies are of great interest. The change, for instance, of the two quavers, C, B $\flat$ into crotchet C tied to following semiquaver, in bar 21 of Fugue 7, is an improvement; and the same may certainly be said of the change in bar 16 of Prelude 10: here the first half in the right hand is a minim C tied to following semiquaver; by this alteration the bar is more in keeping with the rest of the Prelude. In the A minor Prelude the passage from the seventh quaver of bar 22 to the seventh quaver of bar 23, which is unsatisfactory in more respects than one, is cleverly omitted; while one or two finishing touches to the grand Fugue in B flat minor show the hand of the master. It should be mentioned that in this Zurich manuscript the first six Preludes and Fugues are not in Bach's handwriting. There are very possibly other autographs hidden away which may one day come to light. Forkel is said to have seen an old copy with "Scripsit, 1734" on it; though Spitta thinks it must have been the Wagener autograph that he saw, and that he misread the date. Hilgenfeldt, again, speaks of two autographs in his possession with corrections and additions partly in red, partly in black ink. He tells us that the second part came from E. Bach's collection; that it had on it the date 1740 and consisted of 136 pages. There is a manuscript of this second part in Hamburg which contains similar corrections. Is it perchance the same copy, and was Hilgenfeldt mistaken in describing it as an autograph?

Of copies of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier" two of the most important are those of Altnikol and Kirnberger already mentioned. The copy belonging to C. F. Weitzmann is of considerable interest. It differs from autographs Nos. 1 and 7, and also, as far as we can make out, from the Zurich autograph. It would even seem to be of later date, for on the title-page Bach is called "Court composer to the King of Poland," an honour conferred on him only in the year 1736. The manuscript of the organist Schwenke calls for notice. In some modern editions a bar is inserted between bars 22 and 23 of the Prelude in C major (Part I.); it is not to be found in any of the other manuscripts, and there seems to be no authority for it. The progression from the F sharp to the A flat in the bass is a bold one; but this so-called Schwenke bar entirely weakens the effect of the entry of the long dominant pedal.

There is a curious manuscript of both parts in the Berlin Library. Nearly all the pieces are changed; and, from the few examples given by Kroll, we should say for the worse. It is, however, acknowledged that the metamorphoser shows a certain method in his madness; and the tamperings with the text, if bold, are at times skilful. There is an interesting manuscript of both parts of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier" in the British Museum (Add. MS., 14,330). It was made by Samuel Wesley, and from a pretty close examination we have come to the conclusion that the Preludes and Fugues were copied from the Nägeli edition of 1800. It was given to Wesley's friend Joseph Major; at his death it passed into the hands of Vincent Novello, who presented it to the British Museum in 1843.

In the year 1807 C. F. Horn (who, in conjunction with Wesley, edited the "Wohltemperirte Clavier" in 1810) published a "Sett of 12 Fugues composed for the organ by Sebastian Bach," arranged as quartets for two violins, tenor, and bass, with a part for the harpsichord. These were the Fugue in B flat on the name Bach; the great Organ Fugue in D minor; "Wohltemperirte Clavier," Part I., Nos. 1 and 4 (the latter written in C minor); Part II., Nos. 5, 7, 8, 9 (in E flat); 16, 17 (in A); 22 (in B minor); and 23 (in B flat). In the preface, dated May 1, 1807, Horn says: "From the style of the first of these Fugues some of my friends were led to suspect that it was not composed by Sebastian Bach, but by one of his sons—viz., C. P. Emanuel; but the MS. copy from Germany expressly affirms Sebastian to be the author." What has become of this copy?

Another and still more interesting manuscript seems to have disappeared. "I can tell you," wrote Dr. Burney to Samuel Wesley in 1807, "that I have a very curious and beautiful copy of Bach's Fugues, which was presented to me many years since by his son Emanuel, and which I shall have much pleasure in showing you." Wesley waited on his venerable friend, examined it, and was surprised to find it so full of faults that he could scarcely do justice to one of the Fugues with which he was most familiar. Of course it is impossible to say how far this may have been owing to the difficulty of reading the MSS. or to variations in the text. Again, in a letter dated September 17, 1808, and addressed to Mr. Jacobs, organist of Surrey Chapel, in which he gives the above account, Wesley adds: "I must also tell you another piece of news—viz., that this imperfect and incorrect volume, this valuable and inestimable gift of Sebastian's dutiful son, happens to contain only the twenty-four first Preludes and Fugues, all written in the soprano clef (to make them more easily understood, I suppose), and the Preludes so miserably mangled and mutilated that, had I not met them in such a collection as that of the learned and highly illuminated Doctor Burney, I verily believe that I should have exclaimed, 'An enemy hath done this.'"

From Wesley's account it seems extremely likely that the manuscript would throw some light on the vexed question of the shortened forms of ten of the Preludes of the first part of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier" as they appeared in the Kühnel and Hoffmeister edition in 1800 or 1801. Forkel gave them out as coming directly from Bach; he maintained that these Preludes as they appeared in the autographs and copies belonged to an early period, but that he was able to give the master's latest and ripest alterations and improvements. He professed to be in possession of certain documents, and, besides, to have gathered valuable information from Friedemann and Emanuel Bach, the latter of whom he knew personally. With both he carried on a correspondence for many years on the subject of their father's life and art-work. From an examination of Friedemann's "Clavierbüchlein" (1720) Spitta comes to the conclusion that Forkel had some authentic documents (and in support of this opinion we would mention the minute account which Forkel gives in his book of the various versions of the D minor Prelude, Part II.), but that either Bach's sons or Forkel mistook their relative importance, and treated as later forms what were most probably early ones; in the case of the E minor Prelude especially either they or he seem to have got hopelessly confused, for as Forkel gives it it looks like a mere sketch. This is, we fancy, about the truth of the matter; for if Forkel had had any definite information with regard to the dates of the various versions, he would scarcely have failed to impart it. As far as we can make out, he does not seem even to have preserved the copies or autographs of which he speaks. The "mangled and mutilated" Preludes in the Burney copy seem as if they were similar to those of Forkel. The manuscript, as we have noticed, belonged formerly to Emanuel Bach; and it is not at all impossible that Forkel may have seen this very copy. Spitta thinks that he probably got some papers from Friedemann, and Hilgenfeldt indeed asserts that when circumstances forced this careless son to sell his father's MSS. Forkel received many of them.

Fortunately, the Prelude in C major has been handed down to us in no less than three forms, and a comparison of these certainly helps us to test the value of Forkel's assertions. The Forkel form, containing twenty-four bars, would appear to be the earliest rather than the latest. In Friedemann's "Clavierbüchlein," which bears the date January 22, 1720, we find this Prelude only containing twenty-seven bars. If we play the first eleven bars of the Prelude as printed in the Bach-Gesellschaft, Halle, or Pauer editions, they are the same as in the Friedemann book; if we leave out bars 5 and 8, and change bar 11 into a chord of the seventh, we have (making a slight allowance for arrangement of notes) the Forkel form. These two bars and the comfortable close on the tonic of the dominant key add greatly to the interest and completeness of the musical phrase; and one can scarcely conceive it possible that Bach should first have written in this way and afterwards have changed to the Forkel form, whereas the reverse process seems quite natural.

The Forkel versions are to be found in the Wolfenbüttel edition of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier," and if compared with the longer ones the superiority of the latter appears almost self-evident. Even if it were established beyond a doubt that Forkel had given Bach's latest forms, we fancy most musicians would still prefer the earlier readings. The Preludes in question are Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 10, 12, and 15 of the first book. Of No. 10 Spitta says that Bach would have thrown it into the fire sooner than have sent it into the world in the Forkel form.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

ADMIRERS of Cherubini are indebted to M. Pougin for much further information concerning the master in London than was available before the appearance (1882-3) of his articles in Le Ménestrel. Mr. Bellasis, who for the purpose of his biography consulted all known authorities, was driven to dismiss Cherubini's second experience in this country with less than a couple of pages. Within that limited space, however, he presents a translation of an Italian letter, which appears not to have been before published. It is undated and addressed to a Mr. S. Vestri, 6, Rupert Street, Haymarket. Mr. Vestri was, from the terms of the note, collaborating with his illustrious countryman—probably upon the pastoral cantata "Inno alla Primavera," and, like most of his tribe, had failed to keep up a proper supply of "copy." The master writes to hurry him on:—

"Most esteemed Signor Vestri,—Well, I shall expect your work to-morrow morning without fail. I hope you will do me the favour of coming to me, or of letting me know whether I am to go to you. I warn you that I shall be unable to wait longer for those words, as the Philharmonic Concerts are going to conclude, and this piece must be ready for the last, which will take place shortly. Believe me, as I have the pleasure of signing myself, your affectionate friend and servant, L. CHERUBINI."

M. Pougin also prints letters of Cherubini for the first time, but they are of real and high importance, because originally conveying to the master's wife, who remained in France, interesting particulars of his London doings. Unfortunately, the French biographer does not possess the complete set. Cherubini reached London at the end of February, whereas the first printed letter bears date March 22, and it is otherwise evident that he had not neglected to write earlier. The letter just referred to begins with a long account of the circumstances under which Madame Cherubini's third and fourth epistles to her husband reached his hands in inverted order, the fourth coming before the third. Incidentally therefrom we learn that he "dined at the house of Mr. Broadwood, with Erard's son, who was one of the party," Cramer also being present; and that, on the same evening, he went to the Opera, "where I felt thoroughly wearied, so bad was it." Another paragraph has more interest, and should be transcribed entire:—

"Do not be afraid, my dear, of writing at too great length. I am too eager for your letters and for news about you not to relish them deliberately, however long they may be. I have no patience to read long epistles from those for whom I do not care, but I take a pleasure in perusing from beginning to end those of persons whom I cherish. I am now in the midst of dinner parties and society, where I am very well received and petted. The day before yesterday I went to a grand dinner given me by Braham, the best singer in London, and husband of Madame Storace,* whose portrait you saw at that good creature Haydn's. The dinner was given with several directors of the Philharmonic Concerts. H.R.H. the Duke of Sussex, one of the king's sons, a great musical amateur, very affable, and altogether a good fellow, was present. He would have me placed next him at table, and was exceedingly amiable. We drank like fishes, and remained three hours and a half at table. At ten o'clock we had coffee; we then played whist, and left at half-past twelve."

From this truly convivial subject the letter turns to business. Cherubini had in view a benefit concert, and he speculates as to the amount it will bring him in:—

"I think that if the place is full at half a guinea each—and that price cannot be increased without making people cry out—the receipts will amount to 250 or 300 guineas, from which must be deducted the unavoidable expenses. It is better to give the concert in the Philharmonic Rooms than in the Opera House concert-room, which is much larger, and would drag me into greater expenses. Whatever the concert may bring me in will be so much profit, and many a mickle makes a muckle. If, at the end of my visit, I give 'Le Mont St. Bernard' at the Opera House, I think I shall make £700, or a little more. That should be in French money about 14,000 francs."†

The letter ends with a reassuring sentence for the anxious wife whose husband was in the midst of temptation: "Adieu, my dear; I am as good as gold."

Cherubini wrote again on April 7. The Hundred Days had then begun, and communication with France was exceedingly difficult. Letters, however,

* This must be an error. Madame Storace's husband was Fisher, the violinist, who, though he disappeared long before 1815, was not known to be dead.

† M. Pougin corrects Cherubini's arithmetic, and points out that £700 makes about 18,000 francs, which is, of course, right.

could be smuggled from one country to the other through Belgium, and in this way the master and his wife contrived to correspond. The circumstances were exceedingly unpleasant all round, as the following paragraph shows:—

"You reproach me with not often writing to you; your complaint is not well founded, since I have sent you eight letters to your six. Were I sure that the letters would go by the ordinary way, I would write to you oftener; but, being uncertain, I write only when I am sure my letters will go. A time will come when I shall not be able to hear from you nor you from me. This is a distressing prospect, and grieves me very much. Besides this apprehension, I have that of not knowing what road I shall be able to take when I wish to return to France. M. Sorbet told me that, when he is obliged to go back, in six weeks' time, he fears he shall be compelled to reach the Continent by the coast of Spain. Fancy my being obliged to do the same! What a terrible and what a long journey!"

There is next a reference to some negotiations going on between himself and a Prussian Count as to a matter awaiting notice in its place. From this Cherubini passes to his London concerns:—

"Last Monday they played my new overture (in G) at the Philharmonic Concert; it was very successful, and they had it over again. They also sang the 'Incarnatus est' from the three-part Mass, and that also had to be repeated. Despite this success, I foresee that my journey here will be a failure; I expect hardly any profit from it. We have reckoned up the expenses, and they come to 100 guineas. If I have not a full house, I risk, after taking a great deal of trouble, gaining only fifty guineas, if, indeed, I am not something out of pocket. Money runs away here like water, and the slightest things are proportionately dear. The outlay will amount to so much, since I shall not be able to have more than three parts of the band without paying them. There is no longer any idea of the opera of 'Eliza'; this is why I consider my journey a failure, and had I foreseen such a result, I should certainly not have undertaken it, for I should at least have received in Paris the net sum of £200, which, as things now stand, is broken in upon and pledged for my travelling and living here. All this clouds my soul, and I am so affected by it, so sad, that, with the work I am obliged to do, if I do not fall ill it will be a miracle. Already my health, which up to now has been good, is becoming bad; for several days my nerves have been ill, and I suffer from a melancholy which I cannot overcome. All this troubles, consumes, and wears me away."

M. Pougin adds that the English climate had undoubtedly a bad effect upon Cherubini's health, and that, after returning to Paris, he suffered for three years from a nervous affection. Our climate is a trying one, granted; but if gentlemen come here from more abstemious countries, sit three hours and a half at dinner, and drink like fishes, what can they expect?

Mention has been made of a negotiation going on between Cherubini and a certain Prussian nobleman. The distinguished individual in question was Count von Bruhl, Chamberlain of Frederic William's Court, and Intendant of the Royal Theatres. He had been commissioned by his master to organise the Court music on a fitting scale, and his natural desire was to obtain the services of an eminent composer. He thought at once of Cherubini, whom it would be a double pleasure to secure, since the gain of Berlin meant the loss of Paris. Count Bruhl forthwith wrote to Cherubini in the French capital—not knowing that the master was on the other side of the Channel—and asked him his terms for the following duties: To write two operas each year; to conduct them, and, alternately, with the second director, to conduct grand operas by foreign composers; to conduct a Court concert when ordered by the King; and, in case a Conservatory should be established, to act as one of the professors. The Count graciously added: "Everything shall be done to please and content you," and then, like a frugal German, "I only trust that the pecuniary conditions may not be such as place too many obstacles in the way of the treasury of the Theatre Royal."

Cherubini received this letter in London, as we already know, and it seems to have presented a difficulty. He was, of course, doubtful of his position in France, Napoleon having regained the throne. There was a possibility of Louis XVIII. returning, in which case the Berlin appointment would not be needed. On the other hand, the Emperor might hold his ground, and then Cherubini would be glad of such a position. Under these circumstances the master's reply to the Count was adapted to delay a conclusion till the imminent struggle between Napoleon and the Allies should have been determined. As a means to this end Cherubini's letter is skilful. In the first place, he questioned whether, under the altered political circumstances, the offer still held good: "Were the proposal which you made me before this state of things still to be made, sir, would you make it now? Unless you have the kindness to reassure me, I fear, in this storm, to accept an engagement which might afterwards be broken by the force of circumstances. Do you not, therefore, think, M. le Comte, that it would be better to wait till the tempest is over before proceeding with what you propose?" The master then went on to say that he must remain faithful to his French engagement, which was not hopelessly lost, but that he did not decline the Count's, only asking to have it left in abeyance for awhile. On the point of terms, Cherubini asked a salary of 16,000 francs a year (£640), his professorship at the projected Conservatorium to be an extra, as at Paris, where he received 5,000 francs with a residence. He also desired travelling expenses for himself and family, and 2,000 francs down a month before leaving Paris.

When, a few weeks later, the battle of Waterloo—

On that loud Sabbath, shook the spoiler down, there was an end to all palaver with Berlin. The stupid Bourbons went lumbering back to Paris, and Cherubini remained faithful to his French allegiance. The decisive shock had, however, not taken place when the master left London for his old post. He started, in point of fact, twelve days before Waterloo. This we know from a letter written at Calais to his wife, and dated June 5, eight a.m. Therein we read—and, reading, are thankful for the days of steam—as follows:—

"I quitted London at half-past five and, after travelling all night, arrived at Dover at nine in the morning. I made the indispensable arrangements with regard to passports and luggage, then I took my place on board a French packet which was to start in the afternoon for Calais. At half-past six I went on board; the weather was very favourable, but the wind extremely high, which made me as sick as a pig during all the passage, which began at seven o'clock, and we entered the port of Calais at ten in the evening. Not being at that hour able to enter the town, which was closed, we slept on board the packet, and at six o'clock in the morning of to-day the commissary came to examine our passports. . . . About ten they will examine the luggage. . . . The diligence leaves here every day, and if the luggage could have been examined before the hour of its departure, I should have been able to set out to-day. But as that cannot be, on account of the Custom House, I shall not start before to-morrow; and on Thursday, about eleven, I shall arrive in Paris."

The master concludes: "Good-bye, my dear. I can scarcely contain myself for joy at being near the moment of embracing you all after so much bother and anxiety with regard to my affairs and our correspondence. Farewell, my darlings; we shall soon see each other again." It should be mentioned here that Cherubini was returning to Paris as a member of the Institute, having been elected in his absence. Here, also, it may be mentioned that his English works were three—an Overture in G, a Symphony in D (the themes of which were subsequently used for the Quartet in C), and the "Hymn to Spring," of which mention has already been made. None of these had a great success then or later, wherefore the master's second visit to London cannot be accounted as a brilliant episode in his career.

On arriving in Paris Cherubini at once resumed his commanding position. The Florentine's genius was the greatest that France then possessed, and when important work had to be done he was sought as a matter of course. Hence we learn from his Diary that in August, 1815, he composed a "Chorus and Couplets for the Festival of St. Louis"; also that (January 29, 1816) he wrote a "Cantata for several voices with chorus and full band" for the banquet given by the Royal Guard to the National Guard on February 5. Nevertheless, the master's position was by no means satisfactory at this time. The Napoleonic Conservatoire met with little favour from the restored government, who not only changed its name to "Royal School of Music and Declamation," but reduced its allowance to 80,000 francs, dismissed all the professors suspected of attachment to the late régime, and cut down the salaries of those who, like Cherubini, were retained. Our master, however, did not escape scot-free. As Inspector of Instruction and Professor of Composition, Cherubini had been, since 1812, in the receipt of 5,000 francs a year. The Bourbon ministers reduced this to 3,000 by abolishing the first-named office, and from that small amount took off three per cent. to provide a pension. On the other hand, Cherubini received an annual 1,600 francs as a member of the Institute and two yearly allowances from the King of 2,000 francs and 800 francs respectively. These amounts brought his salary up to 7,400 francs, or £296. The master was at this time fifty-six years old, and it is hardly to be wondered at that Fortune thought the hour had come in which to do him a good turn. This she accomplished by removing from earthly life Martini, the Superintendent of the King's music, of whose post, valued at 6,000 francs per annum, Cherubini held the reversion. We take the particulars concerning this matter from M. Pougin, by whom it is shown that Castil-Blaze, and, necessarily, all who have copied him, including Mr. Bellasis, are wrong when they say, "M. Lesueur, Director of Napoleon's Chapel, became Superintendent of Louis XVIII.'s, and shared the sceptre of harmony with an illustrious colleague, Cherubini." In the first place, Lesueur was not Louis XVIII.'s chapel-master, though he had been Napoleon's. This M. Pougin conclusively proves by an extract from the official Moniteur for February 18, 1816, in which we read, after an announcement of Martini's death: "M. Cherubini, who had the reversion, succeeds to the place as master of the music of the chapel." If it be asked how Martini came to supersede Lesueur, the answer is that the Bourbons were accustomed to sell the place, and that, in Louis XVI.'s time, Martini bought the reversion for 16,000 livres. Of course the bargain had no force during the Republic and Empire, but as soon as Louis XVIII. appeared on the scene Martini claimed his right, and Lesueur was dismissed to make room for him. How Cherubini obtained the reversion in turn does not appear, but there is evidence to show that his appointment took place the very day after Martini's death. In the oft-quoted Diary we read: "I did duty with the Royal choir, in the place of M. Martini, ill, February 2, 1816. Martini died February 14, 1816, at five o'clock p.m., and on Thursday, the 15th of the same month, I was appointed to the post of Superintendent." This raised his salary to nearly 14,000 francs, or £560, and relieved him from all anxiety with regard to means of living.

Cherubini's promotion had a most important effect upon his future career as a composer. It took him away from the operatic stage, for which he afterwards wrote but one work of any consequence, and it turned the current of his genius in the direction of the Church with a force and steadiness before unknown. It becomes desirable, therefore, to know something of the conditions under which the master entered upon his new place. He found, we are told, an orchestra and choir "whose equal, perhaps, no other place in Europe could then show." The singers comprised twelve soli and thirty-nine chorus voices; there were fourteen violins—played by, amongst others, Baillet, Habeneck, and Kreutzer—four violas, six violoncellos, four double-basses, flutes, oboes, clarinets, trombones, bassoons (two of each), three horns, two harps, and drums. Two pianists and as many organists were also in the personnel of this really royal band.

It is much to be regretted that Cherubini was not allowed to write as he pleased for the King's fine choir. Louis XVIII., despite abundant reason to feel thankful and devout, did not love long religious services. The shorter they were the sweeter he found them, and his new chapel-master was under obligation to bear the fact in mind. Hence the number of short masses composed by Cherubini subsequent to his appointment, and also the many fragments written in order that at least one movement might be properly developed. One of the complete masses due to this period is the "Requiem" for four voices and orchestra, performed at an anniversary of Louis XVI.'s death. Contemplation of this work opens up the whole question—if question be the right word—of Cherubini's greatness as a religious composer. As to the "Requiem" itself two very different men have spoken—Fétis and Ferdinand Hiller. The one says: "Although we may object, perhaps, that the 'Dies iræ' is too noisy and its forms too dramatic, the art with which the whole is written is so remarkable, and all the other numbers are at one and the same time of so noble and so melancholy a character, that we may class the work among the finest its author ever wrote. The last number, in which he has expressed, with as much simplicity as depth, the exhaustion of all vital sentiment and the entering into eternal repose, impresses the heart, and strikes it with terror." On the same subject Hiller writes: "While speaking of Cherubini's sacred works, I must mention one which may undoubtedly be called the most perfect of all—the 'Requiem' he composed for the anniversary of Louis XVI.'s death. This is a work almost unique in music. It is possible that Cherubini may not have reached in it the ideal beauty or the profundity of thought and sentiment which we find in certain pages of Mozart's 'Requiem.' But, as we know, that 'Requiem' was not completed by its divine author, all the parts are not equally elevated, and the style wants the finished unity which gives even secondary ideas the elevated character they ought to have. In Cherubini's work it appears that everything, as far as the words will admit, is developed out of the eternal lamentation 'Dust thou art; to dust thou shalt return.' What ardent supplication! What depth of lamentation! What dread of the Last Judgment! And how, at the end, life appears to be annihilated in one long moan! In the fugue on the words recalling the promise made to Abraham and his race the daring contrapuntist rouses himself, and not only asserts his rights, but obstinately claims them; the episode being, perhaps, necessary in order that the effect of the work might not be too terrific. This composition is truly surprising from the simplicity of the means employed, the colour of the instrumentation, and the truly vocal manner in which the voices are treated. Had Cherubini left nothing else, this alone would suffice to place every true musician under the obligation of considering him as the most extraordinary and the most sublime of composers."

This is high praise, but few who have made careful study of Cherubini's sacred works will care to contest it. They see in them not only the consecration of great genius to religion, but consecration under the guidance of sound judgment. Cherubini's masses are free with an ordered freedom, and they exemplify the fact that a truly great composer is the master of his art, not its slave, and that to exercise a judicious liberty he need not rise in insurrection against rule. "The fruit of the severe studies to which he had so constantly devoted himself in his youth," writes the critic last quoted, "were now apparent in all parts of his music, and, while he employed every modern harmonic license, that music preserved at bottom a character of austerity which, like leaven, imparted to the composition a healthy mordant."

Referring again to the "Requiem" for Louis XVI., it may be interesting to add that the work was appointed for performance at the funeral of Boieldieu in 1834, but could only be given in the Chapel of the Invalides—a place out of episcopal jurisdiction—because then the Archbishop of Paris, like Cardinal Manning in our own day, forbade women to sing in choirs. Cherubini was much annoyed at this, and said: "Very well, then; since they have resolved that women's voices shall not be heard in a church, I will write for my own funeral a 'Requiem' against which they shall have no objection." This he did, and the second "Requiem," for three-part male choir and orchestra, was duly performed over his body. Cherubini, by the way, attended Boieldieu's obsequies, and made a speech at his grave. This has, happily, been preserved—happily not less for the orator than for his subject, since it shows what real generosity and frank appreciation the master could show towards the memory of a fellow-artist. We make no apology for quoting a few sentences:—

"To-day we have to weep over Boieldieu, my very dear friend, whose death will be for us a never-ending source of regret. I was long connected by the bonds of friendship with this kindly man, with this composer of distinguished genius. I saw him first enter on his musical career, in which he proceeded from one success to another. I will not now mention the admirable works he composed. They are immortal; we all know and shall never forget them. . . . I cannot refrain from expressing the deep grief I feel at his death. I have lost a friend and a brother, of whom I shall have nothing left but a sorrowful recollection. . . . Farewell, Boieldieu, farewell! I preceded you in life and in the career you so nobly followed, yet I now regret you, and weep over the earth about to close upon you, for God has chosen to call you to Him before me."

The year of Cherubini's appointment as chapel-master was one of remarkable fecundity. Besides the "Requiem" already mentioned, the composer wrote the Mass in C (No. 6), nine Kyries, a Laudate, a Sanctus, an O Salutaris, the Mass in E flat (No. 7), several hymns, a cantata ("Le Mariage de Salomon"), and a Lauda Sion. Considering the age at which Cherubini had arrived, this list shows the enthusiasm with which he entered upon his duties and the real devotion he bore to art. Actual production, however, does not represent all his labour. In order to fit himself for Church writing he made careful studies of Palestrina, even going so far as to copy out a number of his works, transposed into other keys, so that the old master's method might become thoroughly familiar. Thus, with all his genius, did Cherubini plod, and only by plodding can genius of any kind reach the highest position. Pegasus is all very well, but his wings are not strong enough for the loftiest place.

BERLIOZ AND RECENT CRITICISM.

AFTER undergoing, during the life of the composer, the strangest vicissitudes, the art-work of Berlioz is now subjected to a critical process which deserves consideration because it is so singularly characteristic of the age. Until late years the few writers who approached the subject in anything like a critical spirit narrowed their vision to a contemplation of what was strange in the compositions of Berlioz, ignoring or neglecting the essential spirit of his work for an accidental phase of its expression. Schumann, indeed, exercised a keener insight, and he did so through that sympathy of genius without which criticism is impotent. A romanticist himself, he could not but be profoundly affected by that marvellous efflorescence of romanticism, the Symphonie fantastique. But he was a romanticist of the Teuton type, passionate only in the derivative sense of the word—not active, but meditative. Hence he could not with prophetic fervour pursue the development of the genius of Berlioz beyond its first astonishing manifestation. But in spite of the subsequent withdrawal of his favour, he at least was first in recognising the unique position of that symphony in musical history. In it he clearly perceived the work of an artist confronted alone by his genius, unhampered by theories, unrestricted by traditions. Since the appearance of Schumann's critique many French writers have exhibited a deeper apprehension of Berlioz's work than was current in his lifetime; but they have all, more or less, betrayed a tendency to criticise what was revolutionary in his work—they have been too much inclined to regard him as a reformer. Revolutionary he certainly was during a period of his development, but never a mere reformer. He was too true an artist to be troubled with theories, however novel; an artist, moreover, as unequalled in resource and in fecundity of idea as he was consummate in expression. If his works are now receiving something of the attention they demand, if his genius is now visible in a serener air than that lurid and stormy atmosphere in which it arose, the change has not been effected by the impertunity of a propaganda. To no such meagre force do we owe the tacking-about of the critical sails, but to the steady breeze of public opinion.

Strong adherents Berlioz always had, and fervent friends, and he found a ready audience in Russia and elsewhere out of France, but criticism respecting him has been strangely hesitating. Setting aside the judgment of those of his friends who, like M. Ernest Legouvé, wrote with a natural predilection, the most recent writings of critics display singular inconsistencies and a spirit of vacillation. The extreme divergencies of Berlioz' critics, the frequency of their "faint praise," and the violence of their denunciation are amusingly illustrated in two articles by Mr. F. Niecks in THE MUSICAL TIMES for 1880, where the field of criticism is reviewed to date, and the final summary reflects the temporising and conflicting verdicts of the critics. Since then criticism of Berlioz at the hands of certain theorists of the advanced school has passed into a new phase. In his comprehensive survey Mr. Niecks alluded to an essay on the Symphonie fantastique by M. Georges Noufflard. That little work, which is chiefly based on Schumann's brochure, has been succeeded this year by another from the same pen which is by far the most curious critical utterance on the subject since Schumann and Ambros. With a passing reference to the criticism of M. Adolph Jullien (1882) and M. Octave Fouque we may pass on to this as being the first attempt conceived in cool critical temper to bring reconciliation into a divided camp. M. Jullien's "Hector Berlioz" is a careful account of the progress of the composer's various works through the music-centres of Europe, with a résumé of journalistic criticism. It is historical, and deals severely with the writings of the numerous following of Scudo, placing in a strong and piquant light the swift retribution of time and the penitential attitude of critics and public towards Berlioz during the last ten years. M. Fouque is principally concerned with the shaping forces that formed the genius of Berlioz, particularly the influence of his old master, Lesueur. His essay is of great value, and deserves the consideration of all students of Berlioz. M. Noufflard's study "Berlioz et le Mouvement de l'Art Contemporain" (Florence, 1883) is emphatically the offspring of our own time. It could only have been produced in an age that denies the ideal in art, that scorns alike classicism and romanticism, that endures M. Zola and professes naturalism, that failed to recognise the genius of Millet while it crowns with the Prix du Salon M. Rochegrosse's "Andromaque." The influence of "naturalism" is, it is true, apparent only in a modified form in M. Noufflard's critique, but the author's theories of art do not differ greatly from M. Zola's. The ancient conception of genius producing work spontaneously and under the influence of a divine afflatus is held to be untenable. This view was good enough for Plato, but it is too simple, too primitive for this age. All work in art must now be evolved in a kind of scientific succession in accordance with preconceived theories. Art is the servant of science, and genius the slave of both. The critics who hold the anti-artistic creed formulate a system, and endeavour to make all the productions of artists square with their system. They have no idea of "genius working out its own salvation." It can exist for them only in the atmosphere of pure reason, and can be allied to no madness whatever; it is never self-centred and self-dependent; it is subject to all those theoretical laws upon which the critic bases his system, from its initial hypothesis to its elaborate development. There would be some merit, as well as convenience, in this scheme for the commensuration of the creations of genius if there were any common ground of accord among these critics. Unfortunately this does not exist.

In reviewing the art-movement of the last century M. Noufflard generalises with some success. Following the pseudo-scientific process of the naturalistes, he arbitrarily divides all art into two great sections—"l'Art de l'Ancien Régime" and "l'Art Moderne." When, however, he arrives at the consideration of Berlioz—with whom genius was a law unto itself—he finds himself in precisely the same predicament as M. Zola when he was confronted in the writings of the elder Dumas with the refutation of his own theory. It is not pleasant to have one's system upset, especially when, but for a single obstacle, it may be so plausibly and triumphantly set forth. Accordingly M. Noufflard is forced to a little gentle violence, and between his two great sectional epochs he places the intractable Berlioz, between the heaven of the old masters and the new world of Wagner. It is a perilous position for genius, and suggestive of Mahomet's coffin. We need only consider our critic on the position of the symphony in music to appreciate the dangers of generalisation. The symphony, according to M. Noufflard, is the last and most perfect creation of the music of the Ancien Régime. He proceeds to say of it: "It expresses nothing beyond an indeterminate sentiment; it is submitted to no end of practical utility; form is essential. One can imagine nothing more frivolous and more exquisite." We do not dispute the justice of this implied censure in certain instances, but, unhappily, it ignores the organic continuity of progress in the symphonies of the great composers. Thus M. Noufflard is forced to qualify this criticism (in a note): "I mean the symphony of Haydn and Mozart. That of Beethoven does not belong to the Ancien Régime." But Beethoven's earlier symphonies, in their adherence to established forms and in other particulars, are so closely allied to those of Haydn as almost to merit classification with them. They follow them in natural art sequence even as his later and nobler examples naturally proceed from these. But the critic doubtless perceived the danger of relegating such a genius as Beethoven to a debatable land in company with Berlioz. Hence his arbitrary and ingenious distinction. The extraordinary variety of the work of Berlioz defies the convenience of classification. It may not be submitted to the measure of the tailor-critic. To him who dearly loves a system there is something tantalising in the versatility of the composer, the triumphant vindication of his genius in so many diverse and opposite fields, the vast range of his work and the facile flight of his imagination. The mere contemplation of "L'Enfance du Christ" and "Benvenuto Cellini" on the one hand, and "Les Troyens" and "Béatrice et Bénédict" on the other, sufficiently accounts for M. Noufflard's inconsistency. It is so clear that the author of these works was not "for an age." He had no mission to propound, no theories to illustrate. The compass of his creative mind ranged from the period of the imaginary "Pierre Ducré, maître de chapelle," to a point in advance of the music of the future. Hence he is consigned by M. Noufflard to a species of limbo. Even there, however, he is in the goodly company of the masters of the romantic revival—the society of Balzac and Delacroix, of Byron, De Musset, and Hugo.

THE close of the London season enables us to look through that portion of our correspondence which, relating not to current events of interest, may be temporarily placed aside for reconsideration; and amongst those communications which seem to demand our first attention we find so many contributions to our "Curiosities of Musical Criticism" that—with thanks to those who so constantly add to our store—we proceed to make a few quotations. The following relates to a performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise": "The fugue, which opened the Symphony, showed the lack of brass instruments—being somewhat perceptible throughout this piece.

As the fugue gave way for the allegro movement we noticed the violins came out well, and the softer part was rendered in a very feeling manner—the changing keys and reintroduction of the air being specially well marked. This movement was brought to a close in spirited style by the reappearance of the fugue, although the time was rather defective towards the end." Of the allegretto movement it is said: "The characteristic of this part is the change of keys, which was well noted and expressly given." This highly original notice upon Mendelssohn's well-known work concludes as follows: "The final chorus opened with the bass—tenors, altos, and trebles following until all blended, each part keeping its distinctness, being brought to a close by the reappearance of the leading subject." In a notice of a performance of Mozart's Opera "The Marriage of Figaro" another critic, after having gone into raptures over a duet, an encore for which, he says, was "double," tells us that this was followed by "the pretty flower chorus, and the intriguing Opera takes up its thread and carries the audience on and on through its mazes." But perhaps the choicest of all the specimens before us is a criticism of a rendering of "The Messiah," in which we are informed that the bass soloist "kept the time well in hand, and was not carried 'off his legs' by the influence of the music"; and that the Conductor "never lost his head in the loudest choruses."

THE article by Mr. William L. Tomlins upon the training of the voices of children, to which we drew attention in the July number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, might certainly have been written with reference to the singing of English instead of American juvenile vocalists, if we may judge from some few experiences we have recently gained in occasional visits to country churches. Mr. Tomlins truly says: "The music-teachers are chosen mainly for their knowledge of notation and the sight-reading of music. They are generally earnest practical teachers, with perhaps a turn for music, but with no systematised training in the physiology of the vocal organs, and without practical acquaintance with the technic of vocal culture." He might add that the organist, who is often also the schoolmaster, is usually intent upon making the boys shout at the top of their voices—carrying, indeed, his school discipline into the church and drilling his pupils in the right notes as he would drill them in the right words of the scriptural text, instead of aiding them in a sympathetic appreciation of their true import. It is quite impossible that there can be any satisfactory reform in this matter unless attention is paid to the training of the voice as well as the training of the ear. The reports of the examinations now so extensively carried on throughout the country, as far as we have seen them, are exclusively confined to statements of the result of tests in sight-singing, and we by no means desire to undervalue this important branch of musical education. But even the correct notes, delivered with voices which repel rather than attract the listeners, can scarcely be said to deepen the religious feeling of a congregation. A village choir may not altogether satisfy musicians, but at least it should not have the effect of keeping them away from church.

A HEARING of the sacred works selected for the late Three Choirs Festival in Gloucester Cathedral has again most forcibly impressed upon us the fact that an Oratorio cannot be listened to with the feeling intended by its composer unless the audience refrain entirely from any audible manifestation of approbation. It might be hoped that, although necessitated by the locality in which they are given at these meetings, the masterpieces of the great religious writers, when rendered under these conditions, must be to all persons so deepened in effect that silence would be enforced upon the hearers wherever such works are presented; but that this is not the case need scarcely be said, for, as a rule, the vocalists in sacred music, when in a concert-room, are received with as much applause and with as strenuous a demand for repetitions as if they were singing at the Opera. In proof of this fact let us extract from a notice, now lying before us, of a recent performance of "The Messiah." After saying that the tenor in "Thy rebuke" and "Behold and see" "secured the warm acknowledgments of the audience," and that the soprano's rendering of "But Thou didst not leave" and "How beautiful are the feet" "was deservedly applauded," we are told that at the conclusion of a fine delivery of "Why do the nations" the singer was recalled by a most determined attempt for an encore. Time, however, did not admit of encores, and therefore the vocalist merely "formally acknowledged the compliment." Then "I know that my Redeemer liveth" was finished "amid an outburst of applause"; and at the end of "The trumpet shall sound," a "most unanimous and enthusiastic encore was called for," and notwithstanding that the singer and the performer of the trumpet obligato bowed to the audience, "the applause continued until the chorus 'Worthy is the Lamb' was actually started." When an Oratorio is given in a Cathedral we are told to respect the sacred character of the building. Should we not also be told, when it is presented in a concert-room, to respect the sacred character of the Oratorio?

WHILST running through some old numbers of Society a short time ago we lighted upon a paragraph relating to Boscobel, the house where Charles II. was concealed after the battle of Worcester. It is described as standing "in a clearing in the middle of a wood"; and the writer of the notice says that he was shown "sundry hiding-places ('priests' holes') in the rooms upstairs, and a trap-door on one of the landings, under which was a flight of steps that gave access to the wood by an underground passage." This graphic account of a house which has become historically so interesting recalled to us a musical curiosity which has been so long in our possession as to require delicate handling to decipher its meaning. It is copied from the original, lent for the occasion by one of the family who had for years resided at Boscobel, and is headed "Song, supposed to be sent by a Loyalist Lady to Charles II. while at Boscobel." Words are placed under the notes of this piece; we have treble and bass clefs, and a time-signature; but, although written with quavers, crotchets, rests, and bars, it is not music, and could never deceive any person who knew anything of the art. The paper, when accurately folded in the centre, discloses this warning: "Conceal yourself; your foes look for you." Of course in the days when this was written music was an unknown language to the majority, so that few entrusted with the delivery of the communication would suspect that it was anything more than a harmless song; but the letters are so perfectly formed that even the unconscious folding of the paper would at once have betrayed the secret; and the loyal authoress had therefore more to fear from accident than design in any attempt to solve the mystery by a suspicious messenger.

THE GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT).

No better instance of the love of music, the exercise of charity, and the devotion of the few to the benefit of the many can be possibly adduced than the calm recurrence of the Three Choirs Festivals, with a list of stewards comprising most of the influential residents of the surrounding country, who not only lend their names to the cause, but render themselves responsible for any deficit which may exist between the proceeds from the sale of tickets and the expenses of the Festival. The amicable solution of the question raised some years ago as to the continuance of these meetings—and to which, happily, it is unnecessary further to allude—has by no means produced that apathy which it might be feared would result from a feeling of safety in the preservation of the Festivals. On the contrary, we have latterly seen an earnest desire not only to move with the times by occasionally introducing new compositions, but to direct public attention towards works of undoubted excellence, both by past and present writers, in religious musical art. At the meeting under notice two Sacred Cantatas—the first by Dr. Stainer, "St. Mary Magdalen," and the second by Dr. Arnold, "Sennacherib"—were specially composed for performance in the Cathedral; an "Elegiac Symphony," by Dr. C. V. Stanford (which had only once been heard at Cambridge) was also selected for one of the mornings; and a choral work, "The Glories of our Blood and State," by Dr. C. H. PARRY, was written for one of the secular evening Concerts in the Shire Hall. In addition to these works, the great success of the last Birmingham Festival, Gounod's "Redemption," and (as specimens of the grand old style of Church music) "Bow Thine ear" (Byrd, 1560) and "Hosanna to the Son of David" (Gibbons, 1604) were chosen—the entire programme being of such exceptional interest as to deepen the feeling both for charity and art which it should ever be the desire of the well-wishers of these Festivals to foster.

Morning service was held in the Cathedral at ten o'clock on Tuesday, the 4th ult.—the first day of the Festival—which was attended by the Corporation of Gloucester in state. The Service Music was Smart in F; the Venite was given to a chant by Aldrich, and the Anthem was that composed by Sir Herbert Oakeley for the enthronement of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, "This is the day which the Lord hath made," a well-written work and thoroughly appropriate to the occasion. An eloquent sermon was preached by the Very Rev. C. J. Vaughan, D.D., Dean of Llandaff, and Master of the Temple, in which he not only warmly advocated the claims of the Charity for the benefit of which the Festivals were inaugurated, but expressed his sympathy with the artistic gatherings annually producing such large contributions to the cause. Punctually at half-past one the performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" commenced, before an audience scarcely inferior in numbers to that of any former opening day at these meetings. In the first part the soprano and contralto solos were assigned to Miss Mary Davies and Miss Hilda Wilson, and in the second part to Miss Anna Williams and Madame Patey; Mr. E. Lloyd singing the whole of the tenor music and Mr. Santley sustaining the part of the Prophet. It is unnecessary to say more than that these artists fully maintained their reputation—Miss Williams creating a decided effect in "Hear ye, Israel," and Miss Davies giving an earnest rendering of the great duet with Elijah. The choruses, under the direction of Mr. C. L. Williams, were perhaps slightly hurried, but much feeling was shown in the management of the tone, and the attacks were taken with decision throughout.

In the evening a miscellaneous Concert took place in the Shire Hall, when a new choral work, composed by Dr. C. H. PARRY, to James Shirley's poem commencing "The glories of our Blood and State," was given. The music of this piece is so decisively founded on the modern German models as almost to seem like an imitation of Brahms's "Schicksalslied"; but we cannot say that there is the slightest suspicion of plagiarism. In the concluding portion, however, we have some relief from the absolute gloom which pervades the composition, and the instrumentation throughout shows the hand of a master. An interesting choral setting of Byron's lines "I wish to tune my quivering lyre," by Dr. A. E. DYER (which received warm and well-deserved applause), and a melodious and charmingly written chorus, "Allan a Dale" (the verses from Scott's "Rokeby"), composed by Mr. C. H. LLOYD (the late Organist of Gloucester Cathedral), were also included in the programme. All these works were conducted by their respective composers. Mr. Carrodus's fine playing of the first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto (with Molique's difficult Cadenza) and the refined and thoroughly artistic rendering of Chopin's Ballade in G minor for the pianoforte, by Miss Amy Hare, were amongst the legitimate attractions of the evening; the orchestral pieces, Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and Cherubini's Overture to "Anacreon," appealing powerfully to the few who—to judge by the apathy of a large portion of the audience—could appreciate classical compositions written only for the band. It must also be said that Miss Mary Davies was eminently successful in her singing of Spohr's "Rose, softly blooming," that Mr. W. H. Brereton gave a very intelligent rendering of Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," and that vocal solos were contributed by Mdlle. Avigliana (who sang with much effect the well-known Scena from "Der Freischütz"), Madame Patey, and Mr. Boulcott Newth.

On Wednesday morning the Cathedral performance commenced with Dr. Stainer's new Sacred Cantata, "St. Mary Magdalen" (conducted by the composer), the words compiled and written by the Rev. W. J. Sparrow-Simpson, B.A., who has certainly most skillfully performed a task by no means easy. Assuming the fact, admitted by so many Church authorities, that the woman who anointed the feet of Jesus in the house of the Pharisee was the same who was present at His death and resurrection, the librettist has been enabled to divide his narrative into three scenes, the illustrations of which, both by selections from Scripture and original verses, show sound judgment and true sympathy with the text. The Overture, commencing Adagio, in common time, with a marked subject, repeated in 3-4 time in the following Allegro, is a thoughtful and well-considered piece, the introduction of two recitatives for the bass voice, which are woven in with the general design of the movement, being an effective innovation. Scene 1—"The Magdalen in the House of Simon"—begins with a recitative for bass, which leads to a pathetic song for St. Mary Magdalen, the wailing solo for the oboe, in G minor, which introduces the voice, most faithfully foreshadowing the heartfelt cry of anguish "Ah, woe is me!" Passing through C major, we have a charming return to the original key, this time major, in sympathy with the hopeful words addressed to the "Saint and Man of many sorrows" by the repentant sinner at His feet. A short choral recitative, "This Man, if He were a prophet," leads to an Angel's song of consolation, in E flat major, the melody of which is happily expressive of the text; a change to the relative minor on the words, "Dread not thou the world's harsh voices," and the brief concluding Adagio being points of extreme beauty. A calm and exquisitely harmonised chorus, in 6-4 time, "Come, ye sin-defiled and weary"—containing an effective enharmonic change of key for the middle verse—is followed by a bass recitative; the concluding chorus of the first scene, "For none of us liveth to himself," being perhaps one of the best constructed and most striking choruses in the work. The second scene, "The Magdalen by the Cross," preceded by a symphony with muted strings, commences with a choral recitative and is followed by a bass solo, a trio and chorus carrying on the narrative with much musical interest and with a contrast which secures the attention of the listener in every phrase. The tenor solo "O thou that weepest," a charmingly melodious piece, expresses the words throughout with a fidelity which proves that the composer has profoundly studied his theme and aimed not at displaying either himself or the singer at the expense of the nature of his subject. The concluding phrase, "How can it cease?" with its appropriately vague accompanying harmony, is extremely beautiful. After a brief soprano recitative, a Chorus of Roman Soldiers, commencing with a bold theme in B minor by the basses and repeated in D minor by the tenors, expresses with much dramatic power the defiant spirit of the Saviour's persecutors. This is succeeded by a chain of recitatives, chiefly choral, and a short tenor solo; the scene concluding with a placid chorus, "Rest in peace." The chorus "Awake, awake," commencing the third scene, "The Magdalen at the Tomb," contains some excellent writing, the treatment of the words "Put on strength"—especially where the G flat and D flat change enharmonically to F sharp and C sharp, on a harmony quite unexpected, yet extremely effective—being well worthy of commendation. The relation of the incidents at the tomb, in a series of accompanied recitatives for bass and soprano, ending upon the dominant of F minor, is followed by a chorus in the tonic major, with contralto solo, the imitative points in which—and particularly the gradual dying off of the reiterated phrase "He is not here" in the concluding bars—give much reality to the scene. Some brief soprano, tenor, and bass recitatives lead to the final chorus, "Magdalena, past is wailing." This piece is peculiar in construction, a quartet being occasionally introduced, sometimes alone and sometimes in combination with the chorus, the choir breaking off in the "Amen," upon a dominant harmony, leaving the bass to finish with a recitative—the chorus merely repeating the "Amen" as a perfect cadence at the conclusion of the work.

It is not because the many beauties of "St. Mary Magdalen" are at this moment fresh in our recollection that we are disposed to rate it at a higher value than Dr. Stainer's former work, "The Daughter of Jairus." In the last-named composition he but indicates a style which he has now boldly proclaimed; and, crediting him with that abstract love of art which he has ever manifested in his professional career, we are inclined to believe that he will move no further in the direction of what is termed the "advanced school" than he has already done. Portions of his new Cantata evidence a laudable desire to shake off those fetters which cramp the free action of an artist who dares to think for himself; but in no place has he shown that he despises the eternal laws which have guided the greatest composers in even their finest works, and heartily indeed do we congratulate him upon a result which he has so legitimately earned. We have now only to hope that the success of his Cantata will stimulate him to renewed exertion, and that his next composition—which should be a full Oratorio—may be as great an advance upon "St. Mary Magdalen" as that work is upon "The Daughter of Jairus." Of the execution of the Cantata we must speak in the very highest terms of praise. Considering the small number of rehearsals which can have been bestowed upon the work, it is indeed marvellous how the choruses could have been given with such marked precision, and with such an obvious appreciation of the intention of the composer. The solo vocalists, too—Miss A. Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. F. King—contributed greatly by their excellent singing to the general success; Miss Williams, in "Ah, woe is me!" Miss Wilson in "Happy art thou, Magdalena"; and Mr. Lloyd, in "O thou that wepest," charming all hearers, and often eliciting, even in this sacred atmosphere, a subdued murmur of approbation.

The second part of the morning's programme began with two excellent examples of old Church music, the selection from which formed a feature in the Festival which cannot be too highly commended. At the meeting in 1880 a resolution was passed to revive some of those noble examples of sacred art which have made the fame of so many composers of a past generation, and two works—the "Dixit Dominus" of Leonardo Leo, in C major, and Palestrina's "Stabat Mater"—were then given and listened to with a keen interest by all who appreciated pure and unexaggerated contrapuntal writing. In continuation of this idea, on the present occasion two anthems—"Bow Thine ear," by Byrd, and "Hosanna to the Son of David," by Orlando Gibbons—were included in the scheme. The singing of both these works was extremely fine, and created a profound impression upon the audience. Beethoven's Mass in C, which followed, was rendered throughout with much success, the solo singers—Miss A. Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. B. Newth, and Mr. F. King—exerting themselves to the utmost to give due effect to the music with which they were entrusted, and the choir evidencing the result of earnest and judicious training.

The evening performance in the Cathedral commenced with "Sennacherib," a Sacred Cantata by Dr. Arnold, Organist of Winchester Cathedral, which was given under the conductorship of the composer. Confessing to a complete ignorance of the many works which we find Dr. Arnold has given to the world, we were perfectly prepared to listen to this composition unprejudiced by any former appeal to our judgment, believing only—as we ever must believe—that some justification for the production of a new Cantata at a Three Choirs Festival must have been decidedly shown. What such justification may have been in this particular case we cannot say; but certainly anything more uninteresting and yet pretentious we have rarely heard. Respecting Dr. Arnold, however, as an able organist, his claim as a sacred composer must not be dismissed in a few curt sentences. "Sennacherib" is tolerably well laid out for musical setting by the Rev. F. H. Arnold, the story being carried on without the intervention of a "narrator" whenever the passing events can be continued either by the principal characters or by the chorus. The Cantata begins with a short orchestral Prelude in C minor, professedly illustrating "The Besieged City," but which can in no respect be said to justify such title. The March of the Assyrians, in the tonic major, has a conventional principal theme, with a melodious subject in the dominant for a "Trio," the commonplace character of the movement being by no means redeemed by the noisy and crude instrumentation. The chorus which follows, descriptive of the power of the Assyrian army, contains some good points, both in the vocal and orchestral parts, but the soprano solo "The soul in anguish" (preceded by a bass and tenor recitative), in B flat minor, is too painfully realistic in the expression of the words to have any musical interest. After a brief recitative, a duet, "O house of Jacob," for soprano and tenor occurs, the following theme of which, in 6-4 time, fairly sympathises with the trustful feeling of the text. This is succeeded by a chorus, "O Lord, Thou art great," a recitative, "With the multitude," and solo for bass in C minor, "Where are the gods?" which contains some effective declamatory phrases, a brief, reposeful melody, in G major, contrasting well with the defiant character of the rest of the music. Preceded by a short instrumental Prelude, "The Besieged City," containing a reminiscence of the lugubrious opening movement of the work, a trio, "O Lord God of Hosts," for soprano, tenor, and bass, with chorus, occurs, concluding with a choral appeal, "Save us out of his hand," a smooth piece of four-part harmony such as any experienced organist could extemporise. A choral recitative for tenors and basses, descriptive of the slaying of the Assyrians in their camp, is followed by a chorus, "The poor are robbed," the instrumental introduction to which—evidently intended to be dramatic—is of a character seldom heard, we may hope, within a cathedral. The soprano solo "God breaketh the battles" is a song of triumph, tolerably well written for the mere display of the voice; and this leads to the final chorus, which contains a tonal fugue commencing on the words "His name alone," the treatment of which shows the composer at his best. Whether Dr. Arnold experienced a sense of gratification at the performance of his Cantata we cannot say; but certainly the audience felt a sense of gratification at its conclusion. It is a matter of extreme regret that we should have thus to speak of one who has evidently seriously studied his art; but an accomplished musician is not necessarily a composer, and when this truth is exemplified by the public presentation of a work, opinions are extorted which need never have had utterance. From a musical point of view we have said our very best for the Cantata; but its utter want of dramatic power made it more tedious to the audience than might be imagined from our description. We have now only to mention that the solo vocalists—Miss A. Williams, Mr. Newth, and Mr. King—loyally performed their duty, and that neither to their efforts nor to those of the choir was the non-success of the work in the slightest degree attributable. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," which formed the second part of the evening's programme, received a highly satisfactory rendering, the principal singers—Miss Davies, Mrs. Warren, and Mr. Lloyd—exerting themselves with much success in the solos, the choruses being sung with admirable precision, and the instrumental movements being played with that artistic finish which might be expected from so fine an orchestra.

The attraction of Gounod's sacred masterpiece "The Redemption," on Thursday morning, amidst the impressive surroundings of a Cathedral, was enhanced by the fact of Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Santley retaining the parts which they made so thoroughly their own at Birmingham, and especially by the last-named artist singing only the music assigned to the Saviour, leaving that for the Narrator to another vocalist. On this important matter we cannot speak too strongly, for, with every respect for the manner in which Mr. Santley has on several occasions exerted himself to give due effect to both these characters, we cannot but think that the intention of the composer should be the primary consideration, and that Gounod has thrown a distinct individuality into each of these parts can scarcely be questioned. At an early hour, even, the approaches to the Cathedral almost recalled the scene on the "Redemption" morning" at Birmingham last year, so earnest was the desire to hear a composition which in such a short space of time has obtained so world-wide a celebrity. The programme commenced with Dr. C. V. Stanford's "Elegiac Symphony," conducted (in the unavoidable absence of the composer) by Mr. C. H. Lloyd. Of course we cannot imagine that any of the numerous late comers amongst the audience had the slightest wish to hear Dr. Stanford's new work, but, unfortunately, the interruption of their arrival and the consequent chattering about seats (which, we candidly confess, was encouraged, rather than repressed, by the stewards) effectually crushed the hopes of those who really desired to listen, and minute criticism upon the merits of the Symphony must therefore be deferred. We think it a pity that the lines from Tennyson's "In Memoriam," which the work (as we afterwards found) is designed to illustrate, did not appear in the printed programme, for in the little that we heard of the music the feeling of the poetry seemed sympathetically expressed. We like the Lento espressivo, Scherzo, and Adagio better than either the opening Allegro appassionato or the final Allegro, but record this as a mere impression, from the cause we have already assigned—the reminiscence of Beethoven, however, in the Scherzo being too obvious to escape notice.

The rendering of "The Redemption" was in every respect worthy of the work, a warm tribute of praise being justly due to Mr. C. L. Williams, the Conductor, who not only took the time of all the movements correctly, but steadily maintained it throughout, and inspired both band and choir with such thorough confidence in his knowledge and judgment as to justify implicit obedience to his direction. It is unnecessary to speak of the manner in which Mr. E. Lloyd and Mr. Santley gave effect to the deeply religious music with which they seem now almost inseparably associated, but the singing of Miss A. Williams in the soprano solos "From Thy love as a Father" and "Ye mountains" calls for special recognition as being truly sympathetic with the composer's feeling; Miss H. Wilson, too, giving the beautiful solo "While my watch I am keeping" with appropriate religious fervour. Mr. F. King, as the bass Narrator, fully sustained his growing reputation—Mr. B. Newth and Mr. Brereton lending efficient aid as the penitent and impenitent thief respectively, and Mdlle. Avigliana ably assisting in the concerted pieces. After our exhaustive review upon "The Redemption" on its production at Birmingham no lengthened notice of the great choral movements which form so prominent a feature in the work is here needed; but we cannot refrain from remarking upon the sublimity of the choruses, when heard in a building consecrated to the purpose which they were especially written to glorify. In the overpoweringly grand chorus "Unfold, ye portals everlasting" the boys' voices in the Celestial Choir, stationed, with the trumpets, above the orchestra, produced a thrilling effect; the perfect balance of each department of the choral body being also admirably displayed in the chorals, which were sung with commendable precision and due attention to the minutest gradations of tone. The orchestra (under the able leadership of Mr. Carrodus) was in every respect most satisfactory, the exquisite colouring of each vocal movement being observed with a delicacy which would have delighted the composer himself, and the purely instrumental pieces—especially the March to Calvary, the Darkness, and the Earthquake—thoroughly realising the incidents of the sacred drama. The work was listened to with an admiration for its musical merit and a reverence for its profoundly religious feeling which are the highest tribute to the genius of the composer; and Gloucester has indeed a right to feel proud at having achieved so decisive an artistic success before the largest audience of the Festival.

The classical character of the Concert at the Shire Hall in the evening was maintained by the performance of Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis-Night"—the solo parts by Madame Patey, Mr. B. Newth, and Mr. Santley (which was only fairly well rendered)—and the two Overtures "Jessonda" (Spohr) and "Prometheus" (Beethoven), both exceedingly well played. Amongst the vocal contributions may be mentioned two of Schubert's songs, sung with much success by Miss M. Davies; "Nicar the soulless" (Anderson), effectively given by Mr. F. King; a song, "To the Immortals" (Miss R. F. Ellicott, daughter of the Bishop of Gloucester), well sung by Miss H. Wilson and encored; Weber's Scena "Ocean, thou mighty monster," in which Miss A. Williams created a marked effect; "Here's a health unto his Majesty," capably rendered by Mr. Santley, who, on being encored, substituted "The Vicar of Bray"; and Pearsall's madrigal, "Why weeps, alas! my ladye love?" so well sung by the choir as to make us wish that other specimens of part-music had been included in the programme. The Concert concluded with the National Anthem.

Handel's "Messiah" was given, as usual, on the last morning of the Festival, the solo vocalists being Miss A. Williams, Miss M. Davies, Miss H. Wilson, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. F. King. The choir showed no symptom of fatigue, and the excellent rendering of the work was a fitting termination to the Festival.

The special free service in the nave of the Cathedral attracted an enormous congregation in the evening, many persons being unable to gain admission. Spohr's Overture to "The Last Judgment" formed an appropriate orchestral voluntary immediately after the entrance of the clergy; and the musical portion of the service, under the direction of Mr. C. L. Williams, was given throughout with excellent effect, Mr. A. H. Brewer presiding at the organ. The Psalms were sung to chants by Battisill, Dr. G. M. Garrett, and Pelham Humphreys; the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were from the Service in D by the late T. A. Walmisley, and the Hymn under the Offertory was by Dr. J. B. Dykes. The principal attraction was an Anthem, "Blessed is the man that considereth the poor and needy," written for the occasion by Mr. C. H. Lloyd, and conducted by the composer. This work, which has full orchestral accompaniment, is of so important a character as to claim a place amongst the best specimens of modern Church music. The composition of a thoroughly trained and accomplished artist, it also impresses the hearer with its true devotional feeling, and that sympathetic colouring of the text which, coming from the heart rather than the head, is beyond the teaching or schools. The opening chorus, in D major, beginning with a melodious subject for the altos, and repeated by the sopranos, accompanied by the other voices, has many points of much interest, the counterpoint throughout being of the highest order; and the tenor solo, in B major, "The Lord comfort him," is extremely vocal, and contains many orchestral figures which do not appear in the organ part. But the gem of the Anthem is the last movement, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel," in which occurs a fugue most ingeniously worked, and evidencing not only profound acquaintance with contrapuntal resources, but a power of interesting the hearers not always allied with technical knowledge. The solo was well sung by Mr. B. Newth, and the choral portion was given with an accuracy remarkable considering the few opportunities available for rehearsal. The service concluded with the "Hallelujah" Chorus from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives."

In conclusion, we must award a meed of praise to Mr. Langdon Colborne and to Mr. Done for their services at the organ, and also to Mr. C. H. Lloyd, who shared with Mr. Done the pianoforte accompaniments to the vocal music at the secular Concerts. But we cannot take leave of the Festival without offering our cordial congratulations to Mr. C. L. Williams on his first appearance as a Conductor, under circumstances which would have severely tested the power of one more experienced in the office. He has, indeed, shown himself fully equal to the occasion, and must doubtless feel a sense of pride at his share in a success which, artistically, has been everything that could be desired. That it has not been so in a pecuniary sense we regret to find, the total receipt from the sale of tickets and books amounting only to £3,250, whilst the expenses are estimated at £3,765, leaving a deficiency of £515 to be made up by the stewards. It is gratifying, however, to find that the sum to be handed over to the charity (including the usual donations of the stewards) is £1,688 os. 3d., an amount only exceeded in one previous year (1877) and larger than any collected in the sister dioceses.

WOLVERHAMPTON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

AFTER carrying on since 1868 a Festival limited to one day, the Wolverhampton amateurs, in view of the celebration for the present year, found themselves under the necessity of breaking fresh ground or of retiring from that already occupied. Their position is easily understood. A one-day Festival cannot be broadly distinguished from an ordinary afternoon and evening Concert, while its exceedingly limited opportunities made difficult, if not hopeless, the acquisition of any sort of status. In point of fact the Festival did not progress—it remained a local event of which even the neighbourhood thought no great deal. Having to consider this state of things, the Committee adopted a wise resolution, making up their minds to double the number of Concerts, occupy two days instead of one, and produce an important new work unheard in that part of England. The result justified their course, for, though no great surplus may have been obtained for the medical charity, the proceedings received an amount of attention such as made them of more than local interest, and lifted the Festival to a recognised rank among its kind. That rank is, of course, a modest one, but it represents a great step upwards and gives earnest of eminence in time to come. In no other respect did the Committee vary their usual procedure; that is to say, they again obtained their orchestra from the neighbourhood—principally from Birmingham—a few artists of renown, such as Mr. Carrodus and M. Dubrucq, being added; while the chorus was entirely supplied by the Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society. Even the Conductor came from Birmingham, the only change being that Dr. Swinnerton Heap replaced Mr. Stockley, who, we believe, had tendered his resignation of the post. In this connection there only remains to add that the Festival performances took place at the Agricultural Hall—a roomy edifice, but otherwise not well adapted for concert purposes—and that, in celebration of the event, Wolverhampton displayed a moderate amount of “bunting,” rang its church-bells lustily, and had the appearance of a place given up for the time to the sober gladness that best comports with English respectability.

The proceedings began on the morning of the 13th ult. with Mendelssohn’s “Elijah,” to hear which a large and fashionable audience assembled. Certain questions were at once decided by the performance. It was clear, for example, that the Committee had obtained a good Conductor in Dr. Heap, though the tempi adopted by that gentleman were not in every case unanimously approved. Dr. Heap has important qualifications for the post he holds at Wolverhampton—among them a decided beat, the faculty of conveying his wishes with clearness, and the presence of mind and power of control, without which a conductor is worse than useless. He seems to be quite at home with his duties as a chef-d’orchestre—to be, in fact, just the man likely to lift the Festival up higher than it now stands. The performance of “Elijah” decided, also, that the Wolverhampton chorus is good enough for anything it may be called upon to do, and that the orchestra, if not quite equal to a picked body of instrumentalists from London, can render fair justice to its theme. These were satisfactory results from the first performance, and they settled all doubts; no one supposing that the principal vocalists—among whom were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Signor Foli—would show themselves at fault. The evening Concert was also well attended, among the distinguished visitors being Sir George Macfarren, whose Cantata “The Lady of the Lake” had a place in the programme, and was, indeed, its chief item. “The Lady of the Lake,” as our readers must be aware, was written for and produced at the Glasgow Festival of 1877, principally through the influence of the late Thomas Logan Stille, at that time the critic of the Glasgow Herald, and the foremost amateur of the great Clydeside town. Since its production the work has not enjoyed the favour deserved by its merits—a fact which supplies an additional reason for satisfaction with the choice of the Wolverhampton managers. I am hardly under an obligation to discuss the Cantata’s claims here—they were exhaustively noticed six years ago; while readers whose memory may not go back so far will be quite ready to assume that Sir George Macfarren’s music shows great technical power, careful adaptation of means to end, considerable “local colour,” and vigorous descriptiveness. It is, perhaps, for its graphic force that the work is most esteemed. Such numbers as those that illustrate the chase, the despatch of the fiery cross, Fitz-James’s dream, the boat song “Hail to the Chief,” the coronach, and the death of Roderick are in their way masterpieces not to be lightly estimated by any man with pretensions to taste and judgment. The performance was heard with sustained interest by an audience to most of whom the subject was entirely new, while the composer is said to have expressed himself much pleased with the interpretation of his work. All the solos were in good hands—Miss Anna Williams representing Ellen, and doing her part with dramatic as well as vocal skill; Madame Patey winning golden opinions by her rendering of the contralto songs, as she did at Glasgow in 1877; Mr. Maas showing himself more than equal to the tenor music; and Mr. King and Signor Foli being worthily associated with their excellent colleagues. The success of the occasion fell, perhaps, to Madame Patey (in Malcolm’s air “My hawk is tired”), but it is almost invidious to mention the fact, so well received were the efforts of all. The band and chorus worked with energy throughout, stimulated by the presence of the composer, who was called for at the conclusion, and greatly applauded. A short miscellaneous selection completed the programme, among the pieces performed being the “Ballet des Sylphs” from Berlioz’ “Faust,” Nicolai’s Overture, “Merry Wives of Windsor”; the Prize Song from Wagner’s “Meistersinger” (effectively given by Mr. Lloyd, and Benedict’s beautiful song “I’m alone,” from “The Lily of Killarney.” This last exactly suited Miss Mary Davies. It should be added that a young contralto, Miss Emilie Lloyd, gained much favour by singing “O mio Fernando” in superior style.

Favoured by beautiful weather, the second Festival day began auspiciously with a large audience and a programme made up of works familiar to all amateurs, but of such a character that they are ever welcome. At their head stood Mozart’s “Jupiter” Symphony—a masterpiece less often heard than it should be, now that public taste demands noise and bluster rather than musicianship. The choice of it proved Dr. Heap’s confidence in his local orchestra, for Mozart’s Symphonies, easy as they may seem by comparison with the elaboration of modern pieces, make a special demand upon executive skill. Instrumental compositions of the “advanced” school easily bear a few wrong notes and false entries—sometimes, indeed, are improved thereby; but those of Mozart show every bit of ragged or uneven work on the part of the performers. It says much for the Wolverhampton players that few faults were noticeable. They dealt lovingly with their theme, and brought to it a delicacy which made the music thoroughly enjoyable. The audience listened to the Symphony with obvious appreciation. They did not regard it as an “involuntary” under cover of which acquaintance could salute acquaintance, and friend exchange words with friend. I wish this could be said of every festival gathering. Following Mozart’s chef-d’œuvre came Beethoven's "Mount of Olives"—solos by Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Maas, and Signor Foli. This was, on the whole, well given, the performance, however, not being free from blemish—as, for example, occasional imperfect intonation. The music of the Roman soldiers proved most fortunate, being sung with accuracy and dramatic force, while a fine effect was made in the grand "Hallelujah," with which the Oratorio ends. Mr. Maas, had, of course, the lion's share of the solo music, and generally acquitted himself well, especially as regards propriety and intensity of expression. Hummel's "Alma Virgo" came next in order, to charm the audience with music which, if nowhere profound, is always graceful and pleasing. The solo in this short work was entrusted to Miss Mary Davies, who did it entire justice and commanded the approval of every one who heard her. Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" brought the proceedings to an impressive end, its sensuous effects and deep religious sentiment being none the less felt because they contrasted with all that had gone before. Miss Davies, who again sang delightfully, Mr. Maas, and Mr. King—fit associates for the Welsh artist—did all that was possible for the solos, materially helping to conclude a very successful Concert in fitting style.

The Festival closed in the evening, when again the Hall was full, with a performance of Mackenzie's "Jason." Amends were due to this work, so badly treated at Bristol last year, and as far as was possible they were given—that is to say, the Cantata had a rendering sufficiently good for the conveyance of a correct idea concerning its merits. Dr. Swinnerton Heap may congratulate himself and his assistants upon a fact so honourable to them all, since the music of "Jason" is by no means child's play, either for voices or instruments. Its style and method, moreover, are anything but familiar to ordinary executants, while the varied character of the pieces demands great adaptability from those who would do them justice. I shall not be expected to declare that there were no faults in the performance, but I cheerfully concede that there were none for which it was impossible to make ample allowance, having regard to the considerations just stated. Many numbers of the work made, apparently, a lively impression upon the audience who heard it for the first time, and the conclusion arrived at by those who had heard it before was that the music gains upon acquaintance—in other words, becomes more acceptable as the composer's method and purpose become better known. Let me not be supposed to intimate by this remark that "Jason" is doubtful at the first. It is never doubtful. The opening chorus declares plainly enough that the writer has something to say worth hearing and the ability to make hearing pleasant. Still, the more one knows of "Jason" the better one likes it. The solos were taken here by Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. King, all of whom sang with intelligence and earnestness worthy of the highest praise, Mr. King especially deserving the applause his audience were not slow to give. The choral numbers, though a few of them tried the Wolverhampton singers, received fair justice, as did, in somewhat less measure, the elaborate orchestral interludes and accompaniments. Following the Cantata came a group of miscellaneous pieces, such as "O ruddier than the cherry," sung by Signor Foli; "Ocean, thou mighty monster," the choice, as need hardly be said, of Miss Anna Williams; and, most important of all, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, played in brilliant style and with great effect by Mr. Carodus.

Let me, in conclusion, again felicitate Wolverhampton upon an extended and successful Festival, wishing it at the same time "long continuance and increasing."

MR. A. C. MACKENZIE'S NORWICH ORATORIO.

THE details of Mr. Mackenzie's new Oratorio being now settled, and the work considerably advanced, amateurs may feel interested to know some particulars connected therewith. It is called "The Rose of Sharon," and presents in a dramatic form the "argument" of the Song of Solomon. The compiler of the book, Mr. Joseph Bennett, has adopted Ewald's reading of the Hebrew poem—a reading with which Rénan substantially agrees—but has permitted himself to take certain liberties with the arrangement of the scenes, showing in action, for example, events that the original simply describes. Mr. Bennett's book is in four parts, respectively entitled "Separation," "Temptation," "Victory," "Reunion," and there are four principal characters—the Sulammitte (soprano), a First Attendant (contralto), the Beloved (tenor), and Solomon (bass). The action opens in Lebanon, is then transferred to Jerusalem, and finally returns to the vineyards and cedar groves where it began. Throughout each scene the simple object is to illustrate the moral of the Song of Songs—"Love is strong as death and unconquerable as the grave." The Sulammitte is taken by Solomon from her native mountains to Jerusalem, and sees the King "in all his glory." But she remains faithful, her one answer being, "My beloved is mine, and I am his." Strong in this strength, she resists, and is at last permitted to return to her village and her vineyard, to be united to him whom her soul loveth. We believe that Mr. Mackenzie finds all his sympathies aroused by the beautiful story, and the no less beautiful Scriptural text.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE musical look-out for the season now commencing is not, so far, particularly bright. Gloucester seems to be resting on her laurels after the late Festival, for I hear of no important Concerts in prospect there. Bath and Exeter are silent, and Bristol seems more than ever indifferent; in fact, it is said that the main feature of the Bristol musical season will this year be conspicuous by its absence, inasmuch as Mr. Risleley, weary at length of the persistent neglect of good music manifested by his native city, has resolved to discontinue his fortnightly Popular Concerts. My authority for this bad news is so reliable that a mistake in the matter seems scarcely possible; and there have been no notices in the public prints of the recommencement of the Concerts; but it is not easy to believe that a city which professes to be artistic will tamely sit down under the self-inflicted loss of the one series of Concerts which gave it a name in the musical world, and permit it to be proclaimed wherever music is spoken of that Bristol has incurred the reproach of crushing energy and enterprise which would soon have given her one of the best provincial orchestras in England. The Monday Popular Concerts have been carried on by Mr. Risleley alone—in the face of difficulties which would long ago have baffled any man with less love of art for art's sake—for the last six years, the improvement in the band each season being more marked; and it is time now that some capitalist should come forward and organise a company or society of guarantors to enable Mr. Risleley to devote himself to his music without perpetual monetary harass and restraint. Unless something of this kind is done very shortly, Bristol will henceforth deservedly lose all chance of reaching that standing in the estimation of musicians which at one time, with her Popular Concerts and her excellent Festival Choir, she seemed on the verge of attaining. Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy's Classical Chamber Concerts (seventh season) recommence in November, and in October the Carl Rosa Opera Company come down for a week. The Festival Concert Society give Gounod's "Redemption" and a miscellaneous selection on the 26th and 27th prox. respectively, with Mr. Hallé's band and London soloists, but the musical horizon beyond this looks gloomy indeed. The "lower ten million," however, are better off than their superiors; they continue to support the People's Concert Society strongly enough to give reason for increasing improvement in the band and choir, as yet in their infancy; and the first Concert this season, which took place on the 22nd ult., was very successful; "The Création" was the work performed.

The first Popular Concert of the season at Salisbury took place on the 17th ult., with an orchestra of between thirty and forty performers, chiefly ladies, but the programme was far from classical. Miss Aylward gave her fourth Chamber Concert at the Assembly Rooms on the 25th ult., the performers being Messrs. A. Burnett and

E. H. Moberly (violins), W. H. Hill and C. Gamblin (violas), W. E. Whitehouse (violinello), Lazarus (clarinet), and Miss Aylward (pianoforte). The programme consisted of the following works of Mozart: Quintet in C; Trio in E flat, No. 2, Op. 14, for pianoforte, clarinet, and viola; Clarinet Quintet in A, Op. 108; and the Pianoforte Quartet in G minor.

From Plymouth I hear that great preparations are being made by the Vocal Association, under the conductorship of Mr. F. N. Löhr, for the performance of "The Redemption" in December. This will be the first introduction of the French master's latest achievement further west than Bristol; and as Mr. Löhr is giving his choir nearly three months' steady rehearsal at that alone, the result ought to be very satisfactory. The local orchestra will be supplemented by London artists, and no pains will be spared, to make the rendering as far as possible worthy of the composition—the more so as this Association has not hitherto, I understand, attempted any work at all approaching the "Trilogy" in importance.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

THERE is already every prospect that the Yorkshire musical season of 1883-4 will be one of unusual interest; for not only will it see the celebration of another Leeds Musical Festival, but also, if we are not mistaken, the production by local Societies of several important works which are almost wholly unknown as yet to an ordinary Yorkshire audience.

At present the attention of amateurs may be said to be confined to the approaching Festival at Leeds, and until this important event is over all work in connection with local Societies will be suspended. The sale of tickets has been unprecedentedly large, and for some of the most attractive Concerts very few places remain to be booked, so that from a financial point of view success seems to be assured. The musical side of the question hardly admits of such a definite statement. It is not in our power to prophesy a complete triumph at every performance, but we have no hesitation in asserting an expectation that when the time comes the Yorkshire chorus will again be found capable of the greatest results. We anticipate, for instance, a splendid rendering of Beethoven's Mass in D and Raft's new Oratorio, provided, of course, that the orchestra is able to perform its share of the work, of which we have no fear.

The Leeds Philharmonic Society promises, as usual, two Concerts for the next season—one in November and another in February. At the former Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri" and Gade's "Psyche" will be performed on a complete scale, and at the second Schubert's Mass in E flat with Bach's Magnificat and Beethoven's "Mount of Olives." These works are already in rehearsal under the care of Mr. James Broughton, the talented chorus-master of the Leeds Festival.

The Leeds Choral Society, which is conducted by Dr. Creser, the Organist of the Parish Church, will give performances of "Eudora," a Cantata by Dr. Creser, first produced in Leeds last winter, and some other work taken from the Festival programme.

The Leeds Chamber Concerts will also be resumed this season under the able direction of Mr. Rawlinson Ford, and performances will be given on November 6, February 12, and March 11, for which the following artists have been engaged: Mdlles. Marie Krebs, Agnes Zimmermann, and Dora Schirmacher (piano); Herren Joachim and Otto Peiniger and Mr. Carrodus (solo violin); Messrs. Speelman and Bernhard Carrodus (second violin); Messrs. W. H. Hill and Doyle (viola); and Messrs. Charles Ould and Howell (cello); with vocalists for each Concert. With such an imposing array of names to attract them we hope that the people of Leeds will give more support than last year to this praiseworthy and disinterested effort to spread a taste for classical music.

The Bradford Subscription Concerts will complete another season with the usual number of performances, including two Orchestral Concerts, for which the services of Mr. Charles Halle's Manchester orchestra have been secured, and two Oratorios, which will be given by the aid of the Bradford Festival Choral Society, as in previous seasons. There will also probably be two Ballad Concerts.

The Bradford Festival Choral Society proposes to give Bennett's "May Queen" and Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" on the 26th inst., Rossini's "Mosè in Egitto" on November 30, Handel's "Messiah" on December 19, and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis-Nacht," with Mackenzie's "Jason," on January 11. Besides these there are other performances to be arranged at a later time. It is worthy of remark that this Society has been now established no less than twenty-eight years, during which time it has given a very large number of excellent Concerts, the result of which may be seen in the crowded audiences which assemble in St. George's Hall when there is an opportunity of hearing good music well performed.

The Huddersfield Choral Society announces that Costa's "Eli" will be given on the 26th inst., Handel's "Messiah" on December 21, and Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" on March 7, and there is already a very large list of subscribers.

The Highfield Lectures in the same town will include an Orchestral Concert by M. de Jong's band on November 13, a Classical Chamber Concert on February 5 (when Mr. Carrodus, M. van Biene, Mr. Walter Parratt, and Madame Marie Roze will be amongst the artists), and a Vocal and Instrumental Concert by Mr. Edwyn Frith's company.

"COLOMBA" IN LIVERPOOL.

THE effect created by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Opera "Colomba" at Liverpool, where it has been recently performed by the Carl Rosa Company, may be accepted as a real triumph for the composer; for it is evident that neither audiences nor critics have been influenced by its London success, but have taken the liberty of judging the work solely on its own merits. The interest of the libretto and the highly dramatic character of the music seem to have produced an impression so decisive on the first night that a desire for a repetition of the Opera was strongly and universally expressed, and many appeared surprised that a work evidencing such mature power should have been the writer's first effort of the kind. In accounting for the exceptionally attractive nature of the Opera, the Liverpool Mercury says:—

"On the one hand is a strong story conveying an aggressive suggestion of revenge, mingled with a tender love interest, and on the other a composer whose grasp of every vocal and instrumental resource confers on him the power of making new melodic and harmonic combinations. Schumann, more than any other composer, seems to have influenced Mr. Mackenzie, and the spirit of Wagner is ever present in his music; but, notwithstanding evidences of his devotion to the methods of those masters, his first and only Opera asserts the dignity of originality. Its musical characterisation is well-nigh perfect, not a little of this happy result being due to Mr. Mackenzie's admirable application of the Wagnerian system, which involves certain incessantly recurring leading motives, and the conveyance of dialogue through striking declamation, associated with an independent accompaniment. Like Bizet's 'Carmen,' 'Colomba' possesses deep local colour, and this is an element which speaks eloquently of Mr. Mackenzie's power. The vocal section of the Opera is distinguished by beauty of proportion, and the orchestration constantly unfolds a picture of tenderness and passion. 'Colomba' is indeed a noble work."

The critic of the Liverpool Daily Post, after remarking that Wagner finds a follower in Mr. Mackenzie, continues thus:—

"But this use of leit-motiven, as they are termed, is resorted to in this case with discretion and good taste, and not so largely as to become wearisome or monotonous. Mr. Mackenzie has been fortunate in obtaining a libretto with plenty of incident and dramatic point, and he has clothed it with music of unmistakable power and originality. His ideal is evidently a very high one, and he has striven—and with great success—to keep his music up to the level of his high aspirations. The consequence is, we have a composition which will be increasingly admired as further hearings shall familiarise its beauties to us. It may perhaps require a little effort for those whose ideal does not soar above the

First system of the musical score. It consists of four vocal staves (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and a piano accompaniment with grand staves for Treble and Bass. The key signature is one flat (B-flat major or D minor), and the time signature is 4/4. The lyrics are: "To take the air a bon-ny lass was walk - ing One morn in rise, To take the air a bon-ny lass was walk-ing One morn in . . .". The piano part features a simple harmonic accompaniment with a melody in the right hand and chords in the left hand.

Second system of the musical score. It continues the vocal and piano parts. The lyrics are: "May, as Phœ-bus 'gan a - rise. Full soon . . . I greet-ed". The piano part continues with the same harmonic accompaniment, featuring a melody in the right hand and chords in the left hand.

Third system of the musical score. It continues the vocal and piano parts. The lyrics are: "her, full soon . . . I greet - ed her, her, full soon . . . The musical score is written for four voices (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and piano accompaniment. It is in 2/4 time and features a key signature of one flat (B-flat). The score is divided into three systems. The first system contains the first two stanzas of the song. The second system contains the third stanza, which includes a dramatic interlude marked with 'Ah!' and 'well-a-day!'. The third system contains the final stanza. The piano accompaniment is written in the lower staves of each system, providing harmonic support for the vocal parts.

ballad opera to appreciate a work of art whose aims are high, and whose structure is symmetrical and in harmony with modern developments, but Mr. Mackenzie will certainly find a public if he gives us work of this kind, and we trust that Mr. Carl Rosa will not grow weary in well-doing."

The space devoted to the discussion of the salient characteristics of "Colomba" by the leading Liverpool papers sufficiently proves that, apart from the beauty of the music, the work is regarded as an attempt to present a model for the English opera of the future, and in this light it appears to have received a warm welcome.

As the following has been printed for circulation amongst the numerous admirers of Sir Michael Costa, we may mention that at a recent meeting of the Committee it was announced that, in consequence of an unfortunate investment, the presentation of a sum of money would be the most acceptable form the proposed testimonial could assume: "Sir Michael Costa came to England in 1829, and made his first appearance in this country at the Birmingham Musical Festival of that year. By a curious coincidence his last appearance in public was as Conductor of the Birmingham Musical Festival of 1882. He therefore continuously pursued his profession in England for the long period of fifty-three years. A few years after his settlement in this country he became Conductor of the Italian Opera at the King's (now Her Majesty's) Theatre. In 1846 he was appointed Conductor of the Philharmonic Society, where he entirely reorganised and immensely improved the orchestra, and raised the concerts to a higher degree of excellence than they had before attained. In 1847 he organised the then newly constituted Royal Italian Opera at Covent Garden Theatre with the greatest musical results. In 1848 he undertook the conductorship of the lately dissolved Sacred Harmonic Society, and very much improved the character of its performances. That position he retained until the dissolution of the Society at the close of its fiftieth season in 1882. In 1849 he became Conductor of the Birmingham Musical Festival, and at once elevated it from a gradually sinking state to the very high position it has ever since enjoyed. In 1857 he organised the orchestra for the first Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace, and laid the foundation for that series of triumphs achieved at the succeeding Festivals. He was engaged to conduct the Festival of 1883, but was compelled by fortuitous circumstances to abandon it. It is felt that Sir Michael Costa should not be allowed to pass into retirement without some recognition of his services in the cause of music, both as composer and conductor, and more especially of his strenuous efforts to improve the position, elevate the character, and raise the social status of the professors of music engaged under him—efforts which have been attended by the most beneficial results. The under-mentioned gentlemen have consequently formed themselves into a Committee to promote the above-named object, and solicit subscriptions from Sir Michael Costa's friends and admirers for carrying it into effect. The desire of the Committee is to procure the contributions of as large a number of persons as possible, in order to testify to the wide esteem in which Sir Michael Costa's services are held. Sir Julius Benedict, Joseph Bennett, Esq.; Francesco Berger, Esq.; Hume Burnley, Esq.; T. Chappell, Esq.; W. G. Cusins, Esq.; J. W. Davison, Esq.; J. W. Dow, Esq.; A. Durlacher, Esq.; John Ella, Esq.; L. Engel, Esq.; Sir George Grove, M. Hanhart, Esq.; H. B. Heath, Esq.; Rev. Thomas Helmore; D. Hill, Esq., J.P.; H. W. Hill, Esq.; W. H. Husk, Esq.; H. Lazarus, Esq.; Henry Leslie, Esq.; J. M. Levy, Esq.; Henry Littleton, Esq.; Stanley Lucas, Esq.; Sir G. A. Macfarren; E. H. Manering, Esq.; A. Manns, Esq.; W. Mitchell, Esq.; J. M. P. Montague, Esq., J.P., D.L.; Costantino Perugini, Esq.; Captain Philips; A. Randegger, Esq.; P. Sainton, Esq.; C. Santley, Esq.; F. Schira, Esq.; T. Sherrard, Esq.; G. M. Smith, Esq.; John Stainer, Esq., Mus. Doc.; Sir Arthur Sullivan; F. W. Willcocks, Esq.; C. E. Willing, Esq.; with power to add to their number. Subscriptions will be received by the Treasurer, W. Mitchell, Esq., 33, Old Bond Street; the Honorary Secretary, W. H. Husk, Esq., 161, Piccadilly; or any member of the Committee; or by the bankers, Messrs. Drummonds, Charing Cross."

THE prospectus of the Sacred Harmonic Society for the coming season is one of much interest. Six Concerts are announced, to be followed by a Conversazione at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly. At the first Concert, on November 15, Sir G. A. Macfarren's Oratorio "King David," composed for the Leeds Festival, will be performed for the first time in London; Handel's "Messiah" at the second Concert; Schubert's Mass in E flat, an instrumental Symphony, and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Nacht" at the third; Bach's Christmas Oratorio at the fourth; Mendelssohn's "Elijah" at the fifth; Gounod's "Redemption" at the sixth; and the Conversazione will take place on Friday, May 9. Engagements have already been made with the following artists: Misses Anna Williams, Mary Davies, Annie Marriott, Carlotta Elliot, Thudichum, Fusselle, Marion Burton, M. Hancock, Mrs. Suter, Madame Enriquez, Madame Fassett, and Madame Patey; Messrs. E. Lloyd, Joseph Maas, W. H. Cummings, Harper Kearton, Newth, Arthur Thompson, F. King, Bridson, Burgon, Pyatt, and Santley. Mr. Charles Hallé resumes his position as Conductor, and Mr. W. H. Cummings as Assistant Conductor; Sir Arthur Sullivan—under whose direction the work will be produced at Leeds—however, conducting the new Oratorio, "King David." The organist is Mr. Fountain Meen. We can scarcely doubt that such exceptional attraction will ensure the warmest patronage of all lovers of sacred music. The offices of the Society are now at 12, John Street, Adelphi.

THE prospectus of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society announces ten Concerts for the season 1883-4, a special interest attaching to this series of performances by the production of Wagner's "Parsifal," which will be given (by arrangement with the publishers, Messrs. Schott and Co.) for the first time in England. Beethoven's Mass in D (postponed from last season) will also be performed, and the programme will likewise include Gounod's "Redemption" (the rendering of which created such an effect last year), Berlioz's "Faust," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" and "Messiah." The directors call attention to the enormous attendances at the Society's Concerts last year in justification of the increased expenditure incurred in augmenting the band; and as the conductorship remains in the hands of Mr. Barnby, who has sufficiently shown his zeal and ability in the cause, there can be no doubt that the works named will be placed before the public in a manner worthy of their composers. The vocalists engaged are Madame Albani (who will sing in "Faust," "The Redemption," and "Elijah"), Miss Anna Williams, Miss Robertson, Madame Patey, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, Mr. Santley, Mr. F. King, Mr. R. Hilton, and Mr. H. Pyatt. There will be a band and chorus of 1,000; organist, Dr. Stainer. The first Concert takes place on November 7.

THE fifth season of Mr. Stephen S. Stratton's Popular Chamber Concerts at the Masonic Hall, New Street, Birmingham, is announced to commence on the 16th inst. One feature in these Concerts has been the introduction in each programme of a work by a British composer, and this season the selection will comprise the MS. composition of Mr. F. E. Bache (postponed from last Spring), a Pianoforte Trio by Mr. F. H. Cowen, a Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello by Mr. Edward Sharp (a part in which will be taken by the composer), a Sonata for Pianoforte and Violin by Dr. Heap, the Pianoforte Quartet in B flat by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, and a new String Quartet by Mr. Thomas Anderton. For the rendering of the works during the season eminent artists have been engaged. The series will consist, as usual, of six Concerts.

THE members of the St. George's Glee Union, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Monday, held their 176th monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on the 7th ult. The programme was miscellaneous. Vocal solos were contributed by Miss Annie Matthews, Miss N. Watts, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Theodore Distin. The selection of part-songs was very good, and included "All among the barley" (Stirling), "When the sun sinks to rest" (Bridge), "Love you for beauty" (Clarke), "See the chariot at hand" (Horsley), &c. The pianoforte accompaniments were played by Miss C. Ogilvie, Miss Louisa Distin, and Mr. F. R. Kinkead.

It is with sincere regret that we announce the death of Miss Orridge, which occurred on the 16th ult. at Guernsey, where she had gone to join her family for a short holiday. Miss Orridge was a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, and studied singing under Senor Manuel Garcia. During her studentship she gained a bronze and a silver medal at the ordinary examinations, besides the Llewellyn Thomas gold medal for declamatory singing, the Parépa-Rosa gold medal, and the Christine Nilsson prize. As an oratorio and concert singer she had already attained a good position, and indeed was a general favourite—in public from her talent as a sympathetic and accomplished vocalist, and in private from her amiability and kindness of disposition. The funeral took place on the 21st ult. at Kensal Green, in the presence of a large number of professional and private friends. Among others present were Mr. Santley, Signor Foli, Mr. Maybrick, Rev. Edward White, Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke, Mr. Stanley Lucas, Mr. Vert, and Mr. Barnard.

MR. STOCKLEY'S Orchestral Concerts at the Town Hall, Birmingham, are announced to commence for the season 1883-4, on November 8. A series of four Concerts will be given, the programmes of which will include Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Schumann's Symphony in B flat, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, Stanford's Serenade, Mackenzie's "Scotch" Rhapsody, Rhapsody Norwégienne (Svensden), Sullivan's "Tempest" Music, a new Overture by Herbert Wareing, two Sketches by Anderton, &c. The vocalists engaged are Madame Lemmens-Sherrington (her farewell appearance in Birmingham), Miss Anna Williams, Miss Clara Samuelli, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, Mr. Franklin Clive, and Signor Foli; and the solo instrumentalists Miss Agnes Miller (pianoforte), Mr. Carodus (violin), Mr. Reynolds (contrabasso), Mr. Stimpson (organ), and Messrs. Abbott and Ward (duet violin). The orchestra will be complete in every department.

THE second series of Grand Operas at the Crystal Palace, under the direction of Mr. Faulkner Leigh, commenced on September 1 with "Lucia di Lammermoor," followed by "Il Trovatore," "Sonnambula," "Martha," "Fra Diavolo," "The Lily of Killarney," and Benedict's "Graziella" (produced for the first time on the stage in England, conducted by Sir Julius Benedict). The principal artists have been Madame Cave Ashton, Miss Palmer, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, Mr. William Parkinson, Mr. Charles Lyall, and Mr. Aynsley Cook; and the series has been conducted by Mr. August Manns. Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" has been unavoidably postponed from the 29th ult. to the 16th inst., when it will be produced for the first time in England, conducted by Mr. Manns.

UNDER the title of "The Cape Musical Monthly" a journal exclusively devoted to the interests of the art is announced to appear for the first time, in South Africa, on January 1, 1884. The publishers (E. Mendelssohn and Co.) intend to give prizes for the best compositions from natives of South Africa, with the hope of awakening creative musical talent in the Colony. Monthly letters from the large musical centres, as well as the latest intelligence of the musical world, will be especial features in the paper; and those interested in Choral Societies are invited to send notices of Concerts and to assist in making the journal an unqualified success. It need scarcely be said that we heartily wish every prosperity to so earnest a fellow-labourer in the cause we have at heart.

AT St. Augustine and St. Faith's Church, Watling Street, E.C., a Festival will be held on Friday evening next, the 5th inst., commencing at 7.30, the occasion being the eve of the festival of St. Faith, the virgin-martyr—in whose honour the church is in part dedicated. The service will commence with Schubert's psalm "The Lord is my Shepherd"; Stanford's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A (written for the Sons of the Clergy Festival in 1880) will be sung, and for the Anthem a short selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." At the conclusion of the service Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" will be sung in its entirety, and with an augmented choir, Mr. C. E. Miller, the Organist of the church, presiding at the organ.

A STAINED glass window has recently been placed in Westminster Abbey in memory of the late Mr. James Turle, its Organist for the long period of fifty-one years. The window—which is on the north side of the nave, nearly facing the Purcell monument, and is, we understand, by Messrs. Clayton and Bell—is divided into two chief compartments, David and Asaph, Miriam and Deborah, and Jubal and Moses being represented in one of these, and in the other St. Ambrose and Aretinus, the Blessed Virgin and St. Cecilia, and Zacharias and Simeon. At the foot of the window are portraits of the late Mr. and Mrs. Turle, which will doubtless impart to it additional interest for musicians. Apart from its associations, however, the window, as a work of art, is worthy of its situation. It would be but negative praise were we merely to speak of it as superior to its surroundings, since execrable glass abbots perhaps nowhere more freely than in Westminster Abbey.

MR. J. A. MATTHEWS announces that at the Concerts of his Choral and Orchestral Society at Cheltenham, during the coming season, the following works will be given: Gounod's "Redemption"; the Handel Festival Selection, as performed at the recent Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace; Dr. Stainer's new Cantata, "St. Mary Magdalen," composed for the late Gloucester Festival; Haydn's "Creation," and other classical works. The first Concert will take place on November 6. The classes in his School of Music (enrolled in union with Trinity College, London) are also advertised to commence; and in the regulations for the Singing Competition in the spring of 1884 it is said that the adjudicators will be all members of the profession.

MR. E. J. SPARK announces that, for the season 1883-4, he will give, as usual, three Subscription Concerts at the Public Hall, Worcester. The following artists are engaged: Miss Robertson, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Enriquez, Miss Clara Samuelli, Mr. Herbert Reeves, Mr. Maybrick, Mr. Redfern Hollins, Mr. Bridson, Mr. Henry Guy, and Signor Foli; solo pianoforte, Mr. Oliver King, Mr. Frederick Cliffe, and Signor Bisaccia; solo violin, Herr Emil Mahr; solo violoncello, M. Hollman; chorus, the Worcester Amateur Vocal Union; Conductors, Messrs. Oliver King, Cliffe, Bisaccia, and Spark. The first Concert will take place on the 30th inst.

ARRANGEMENTS are being made for the performance of the first and second parts of Haydn's "Creation" at Holy Trinity, Tulse Hill, at the annual Harvest Festival on the 13th inst. The Oratorio will be rendered with full orchestral accompaniment, and Mr. Humphrey J. Stark's festival setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis will also be performed. The choir will be largely augmented for the occasion, the extra voices including a number of Mr. Stedman's choirboys. The service will be under the direction of the Organist of the church, Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. Bac., Oxon.

WE are glad to find that Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Cantata "Jason" is steadily making its way among Choral Societies. In another part of our columns we record its success at the recent Wolverhampton Festival, and we learn that during the forthcoming season London amateurs will have an opportunity of making the acquaintance of the work, performances being promised by the London Musical Society and the Borough of Hackney Choral Society. Besides these, it will be heard during the winter at Edinburgh, Blackburn, Bishop Auckland, and Bradford.

THE members of the South London Musical Club gave their twenty-fourth Smoking Concert on Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., at Gresham Hall, Brixton, under the able conductorship of Mr. Charles Stevens. The part-music was interpreted with a very commendable degree of artistic precision. Pianoforte pieces were played with marked ability by Mr. Alfred Izard, and Messrs. E. G. Richardson and Joseph Hay gained well-merited applause for their vocal solos. Mr. G. B. Lissant accompanied.

MR. GARTON, Organist of Dudley Parish Church, has been appointed Organist of St. David's Cathedral at a salary of £100 per annum. Mr. Garton was a pupil of Mr. Done, of Worcester Cathedral, and for some time acted as his assistant.

THE Tufnell Park Choral Society, under the able direction of Mr. W. H. Thomas, commences its season 1883-4 on Tuesday evening, the 9th inst., with a rehearsal of Dr. Stainer's new Cantata, "St. Mary Magdalen," which will be probably followed by two short works, Eaton Fanning's "Liberty" and Handel's "Let Thy hand be strengthened"; a selection being afterwards made from a long list of classical compositions named in the prospectus. Two Invitation Concerts will be given, and also, it is hoped, a public Concert. The Society is now entering upon its twelfth season, and numbers nearly one hundred effective members.

THE examinations for the Henry Smart Scholarship and the Sir Julius Benedict and Sims Reeves Exhibitions at Trinity College, London, took place on Tuesday, the 18th ult., when the Benedict Exhibition was awarded to Olive B. St. Clair, of Wandsworth, and the Reeves Exhibition to Maud Lee (Student of the College). The examiners were Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. B.; Dr. Gordon Saunders, Mr. John Stedman, Mr. Bradbury Turner, Mus. B.; and Mr. E. H. Turpin. The Henry Smart Scholarship was postponed, as no candidate of sufficient merit came forward.

THE Committee of the Auckland Musical Society announce that they have decided to put in practice, with a view to its performance about December next, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Cantata "Jason." As it is stated in the prospectus of the coming season that this work is selected with a view to giving, "in however humble a manner, a substantial impulse to contemporary art," we sincerely hope that the efforts of this energetic Society will be rewarded as they deserve.

A SERIES of three Subscription Concerts is announced to be given by the Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society at the Royal Pavilion, commencing on the 9th inst. During the season the following works will be performed: Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," Spohr's "Calvary," J. F. Barnett's "Building of the Ship," Gade's "Crusaders," A. J. Caldicott's "Widow of Nain," and Handel's "Semele." The Conductor is Mr. Robert Taylor, and the organist Mr. R. F. Burton.

THE Report of the Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union announces that the past season has been highly prosperous. The late Hon. Conductor having retired from that position, Mr. A. J. Sutton has been elected in his place, one successful Concert under his direction having amply proved his fitness for the office. The Committee state that if a sufficient number of honorary members join the Society two Concerts instead of one will be given during the season.

MESSRS. ALDERSON and BRENTNALL announce their second series of Orchestral Concerts at the Town Hall, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, with Mr. Charles Hallé's band of fifty performers, and the following solo artists: Mr. Charles Hallé (pianoforte), Madame Norman-Néruda (violin), and Mr. and Miss Santley (vocalists). Three Concerts will be given, commencing on November 12, and a special Chamber Concert on December 7.

THE "farewell appearance" of Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, announced in Birmingham, is understood to be a preliminary step towards her retirement from public life. We need scarcely say how much this accomplished artist will be missed in the many concert-rooms where she has for so many years been an established favourite. Two of her daughters—Misses Mary and Ella Lemmens—have already made a name in London as concert vocalists.

With reference to our remark upon "whistling," in the last number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, we have received a communication from Mr. G. S. Graham, who styles himself an "organophonic artist," and calls our attention to a number of highly laudatory press notices upon his public performances with the pianoforte and "natural whistle" combined. This decides our question as to whether a "whistling recital" has ever been given.

THE Beckenham School of Music—Principal, Mr. Ridley Prentice—with an excellent list of professors, has recently commenced, and appears to offer both to elementary and advanced students a sound education upon reasonable terms.

THE South London Choral Association announce six Concerts to be given at the Institute, Camberwell New Road, during the ensuing season. The works to be performed include "St. Paul," "Hymn of Praise," "The Messiah," Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," Coward's "Magna Charta," Birch's "Eveleen," Beethoven's First Symphony, and selections. The first Concert takes place on the 26th inst. The Advanced Choir will give a Concert of unaccompanied part-music at St. James's Hall during the spring. The Concerts continue under the direction of Mr. L. C. Venables. The various classes for the study of vocal and instrumental music connected with the Institute are held as usual.

AMONG the places at which Gounod's Sacred Trilogy "The Redemption" will be performed during the ensuing season may be mentioned Paris (two performances), Vienna, London (two performances), Birmingham (two performances), Bristol, Burton-on-Trent, Cardiff, Cheltenham, Cork, Derby, Glasgow, Gravesend, Ipswich, Manchester, Middlesbrough, Newcastle, Northampton, Nottingham, Plymouth, Stockport, Swansea, Wolverhampton, Trinidad, Melbourne, and Sydney, and many cities in the United States of America.

ON Monday evening, the 17th ult., a very successful Concert was given at the Bow and Bromley Institute, the vocalists being Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Mr. Bevan Jones, Mr. Frederick Bevan, and the St. Paul's Glee Union; solo pianist, Miss Ettie Wieland; accompanist, Mr. Arthur Dorey. Encores were awarded to Madame and Miss West, Mr. Bevan, and Miss Wieland.

THE Harvest Festival at St. James's Church, Battersea, was held on Sunday, the 16th ult. Special Psalms were sung to Dr. Crotch, Lawes, Boyce, and Arnold in A, and the Anthem was Vaughan's "O Lord our Governor"; the solo vocalists being Misses King and Brown. After the service a short Organ Recital was given, including "With verdure clad," "The heavens are telling," J. B. Calkin's "Festal March," and Handel's "Hallelujah."

ON Thursday evening, the 6th ult., an excellent performance of Root's Cantata "Belshazzar's Feast" was given at the Whitefield Tabernacle by the Tonic Sol-fa Choral Society in connection with the church. The solo vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Mr. J. Cornwall, and Mr. C. Prickett; pianoforte, Mrs. J. Hoyles, R.A.M.; harmonium, Mr. J. Camplin; Conductor, Mr. H. Hurlin.

THE Bow and Bromley Institute Choir, under the direction of Mr. W. G. McNaught, announce a performance of Dr. Stainer's new Cantata "St. Mary Magdalen," with full orchestra, for the 30th inst. The choir will give Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" and a portion of Haydn's "Seasons" at the Concert in December.

MESSRS. HELE, the organ builders, of Plymouth, have been commissioned by the Admiralty to build an organ for the new Church of the Royal Naval Hospital. The instrument is to be of full compass, and will contain some of the newest stops. This is, we believe, the first time that Government work of this description has been entrusted to a provincial firm.

THE Borough of Hackney Choral Association has issued its prospectus for the coming season. The chief works to be performed are Prout's "Hereward," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Mackenzie's "Jason," and Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." Mr. Ebenezer Prout will continue to hold the post of Conductor.

We understand that Mr. Sinclair Dunn is engaged to give his entertainments "Songs of Britain," "Scotch Poets," and "Songs of Ireland" for twenty-eight nights in Scotland, extending from the 27th ult. to the 29th inst.

MR. WILLIAM AGATE has obtained at the Leipzig Conservatorium a diploma proceeding from a foundation of the year 1863, the highest award given by the above Institution.

THE Opera "Faust," recently given by the Carl Rosa Opera Company at Manchester, was, it is said, successfully heard at Warrington by means of the telephone.

MR. CHARLES E. TINNEY has been appointed Professor of Singing at the Guildhall School of Music.

CHORAL Societies will be interested in knowing that Rossini's Oratorio "Moses in Egypt" can now be performed without the payment of any fee, Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. having acquired the rights of Sir Michael Costa in the arrangement of the work made by him for production by the Sacred Harmonic Society.

MR. A. C. MACKENZIE'S Orchestral Ballad "La Belle Dame sans Merci," which was so successfully performed by the Philharmonic Society last season, will, we understand, be included in the first Concert of Mr. Theodore Thomas's orchestra in the coming season in New York.

MADAME CHRISTINE NILSSON left London at noon on the 21st ult. for Liverpool, en route to New York.

REVIEWS.

A Study of Ch. Gounod's Sacred Trilogy "The Redemption." By Joseph Goddard. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

A SHORT time after the production of M. Gounod's work at Birmingham Mr. Goddard published a small pamphlet entitled "Reflections upon Ch. Gounod's Sacred Trilogy 'The Redemption,'" to which we drew attention in THE MUSICAL TIMES for December, 1882. The author—who has sufficiently proved his fitness for the task by some thoughtful works upon the art which obtained highly favourable notice a few years ago—has now made a more elaborate study of M. Gounod's composition, and issues the result of his meditations in a considerably amplified form, and with musical illustrations which materially aid the reader in following the minute analysis here offered. Now that "The Redemption" has made its way to the sympathies of the musical public of many countries besides our own, it seems almost superfluous to point out upon paper those beauties which we have all so deeply felt; but as we can usually appreciate more fully the salient points of an artistic creation when accompanied by an intellectual and sympathetic guide, we feel assured that an attentive perusal of Mr. Goddard's book will not only immeasurably add to the pleasure of listening to the work upon which it treats, but will even reveal effects which may have before escaped notice. Respecting the Introduction to the work, descriptive of Chaos, after deprecating the idea of making comparisons with Haydn in his "Creation," Mr. Goddard truly says:—

"We believe the fine harmonic changes—the grand waves of sound—which M. Gounod marshals before us in this short prelude form a tone-picture such as has not hitherto been painted by composer. Though fraught with dissonance, it is well within the sphere of ordered sound—is as free from noise as the softest melody. Though devoid of theme or special rhythmic design, it may still, in its progressive unfolding of effect, be said to possess a certain subtle form. Though without charm of melody or of concord, it is rich in new primal beauty; and though made up of effect peculiarly abstract, it contains deep meaning. Taken from a new standpoint of musical development it displays new effects—effects drawn from the confines of the known world of sound."

The sparing employment of "song" throughout the work Mr. Goddard looks upon as a "development of that tendency to directness of expression, to that close relation of effect and the emotions and ideas it attends, which has always been strengthening throughout the development of modern music, and which has become particularly conspicuous in great composers of the present day." As M. Gounod makes recitative so important a feature, we cannot refrain from quoting our author's opinion of its effect both upon the listener and the executant:—

"In M. Gounod's simple tones and original harmonic successions are these qualities—intensity of expression, fulness of effect, with brevity, force, grandeur, and chastity. By the resource of change of harmony to a prevailing or slightly moving note the voice part breathes expression and grandeur without undue motion; thus it preserves peculiar calmness and elevation, however moving or exciting may be the import of its message. The fact that the qualities of calmness and elevation attach to this music, through its very form, has a result which, though subsidiary in M. Gounod's main structural purpose—expression by harmonic change—is still important, taking into consideration the sacred nature of the art-circumstances: it invokes, it compels the higher spirit of the singer."

With this we perfectly agree, and shall be glad if our author's acute observations upon the subject prove the means of drawing attention more closely to the natural eloquence of these settings of the text. Mr. Goddard criticises very closely the music which depicts the incidents of the Crucifixion, and especially dwells upon the touching musical phrases "He, though His eyes are dim with more than mortal anguish" and "Pardon their sin," which are accompanied by the melody typical of the Redeemer. "The Reproaches," "The Holy Women at the Sepulchre," "Jesus appearing to the Apostles," and, indeed, all the scenes are most carefully and impartially considered, and we much regret that our space prevents the quotation of many of the author's excellent remarks; but the following criticism upon the design of the great chorus "Unfold, ye portals everlasting" must have a place:—

"Two generally different modes appear to be available for the treatment of this passage. One is to treat it largely from a moral point of view—to regard its imagery as the expression of religious enthusiasm—and, whilst allowing this imagery to impart to the music certain characteristic features, to render the composition mainly the outpouring of varied and deep religious emotions. The other is to treat it in a purely poetic spirit—to clothe with music the poetic forms—and thus render the composition expressive of a positive though large situation. In the one case the attitude of the composer is devotional; in the other it is akin to that of Milton, as expressed in the lines:—

— Into the heaven of heavens I have presumed,
An earthly guest, and drawn empyréal air,
* * * *

Notwithstanding M. Gounod's strong proclivity toward the more devotional side of the sacred style, he is in the present instance governed by his equally strong dramatic instinct. The chorus "Unfold, ye portals everlasting" is a definite though supernatural picture. The composer's attitude, in its peculiar mingling of poetic daring and religious earnestness, resembles that of Milton to which we have referred. Musically this chorus is distinguished by simplicity and breadth of form, boldness of harmonic progression, massiveness of effect. Its intention, as we have already conveyed, is scenic and dramatic. It would unfold the 'pure Emphyrean' echoing seraphic service of praise; picture the immortal phalanxes lost in the 'unapproached light.' As the last note of the chorus is singing the melody typical of Christ breaks forth in a character of triumph."

In our observations upon Mr. Goddard's early sketch of this Study, published in December last, we expressed our regret that he had not alluded to the text of "The Redemption," which certainly the composer considered almost as important as the music itself. This is remedied in the present essay; for, although the author truly says that it would be out of place to treat at length of the literary basis of the work, he continues thus:—

"We may, however, refer to one feature among several it contains which render it highly favourable for association with musical effect; this is a certain directness in the bearing of the imagery—a certain point in the sacred musing, not always visible in sacred poetry selected for musical illustration."

After giving the words of the Reproaches and the Beatitudes, he says:—

"These are not simply phrases having religious association, of high emotional temper and pure poetic vein; they are also an essential portion of the moral thread of the great sacred drama; their application is clear. The English version of these passages is not less forcible than the original French. M. Gounod has taken not only his subject from the Bible, but also the imagery of his expression, and Mr. Troutbeck, with judgment that cannot be too highly commended, has reproduced this imagery largely in the actual language of the English Bible."

In view of the many performances of M. Gounod's work announced during the coming season Mr. Goddard's Study is well timed, and will no doubt secure a large number of readers.

The Great Musicians. Edited by Francis Hueffer.

Mozart. By Dr. F. Gehring.

[Sampson Low, Marston, Searle and Rivington.]

THE meagre records of the career of our greatest composers which only some few years ago satisfied the English people, may be adduced as a proof of the small amount of interest created by their works in this country; for there can be no question that in proportion to the knowledge of, and love for, the productions of the artists of the world, grows our desire to become acquainted with the personality of the artists themselves; to linger over the chequered events of their lives, and to read how they gradually advanced to that high position the security of which is but strengthened by time. The rapid appreciation of their compositions, however, led speedily to the introduction of English translations of biographies of the composers; and so thoroughly have these works obtained a place among the general public that they are now to be found in the lists of our best libraries, and are eagerly perused, even by young lady readers, in preference to the novels of the day. The series published by Messrs. Sampson Low—of which the volume now under notice forms the latest part—already includes the lives of some of our best composers; and in spite of Jahn's exhaustive work on Mozart, there is every reason to believe that Dr. Gehring's excellently compiled biography will obtain a large circulation. The author has by no means confined himself to a mere statement of facts, but has in many places ventured upon opinions which are always dictated by good taste, and never obtrusive. As a specimen of his style we quote a few remarks upon "Don Giovanni," the libretto of which, with all its defects, Dr. Gehring justly praises for the skillful manner in which Da Ponte has fitted it for musical treatment. "Goethe's penetration," he says, "was not at fault when he observed that Mozart would have been the man to compose his 'Faust.' 'Don Giovanni' is the expression of a universal genius which could reproduce in music every emotion of the human heart—great and small—with equal truth to nature. For this reason the work never wearies, however familiar it may be. We feel drawn into the very heart, as it were, of each situation as it presents itself; with marvellous consistency the master carries us along with him, always keeping our imagination on the alert. We follow him willingly, for we always feel the ground safe under our feet. Perfection of form is the basis of his highest flight of enthusiasm; but the fetters with which Mozart has bound himself are not perceptible. The master's achievements in 'Figaro,' in the management of the form of the finale which was so peculiarly his own creation, are child's-play compared to the two finales of 'Don Giovanni.' He had but to recognise the magnitude of the task before him to obtain a complete mastery over it." At the end of the volume mention is made of the monument to Mozart, erected by the city of Vienna in the Churchyard of St. Mark, and also of the bronze statue of the composer in the Square of St. Michael, at Salzburg; but unquestionably the greatest tribute to his genius is the magnificent edition of his works published by the well-known firm of Breitkopf and Härtel, and only recently brought to a conclusion.

The Material used in Musical Composition. By Percy Goetschius.

[London: Novello, Ewer and Co.; Stuttgart: E. A. Zumbsteeg.]

A CURIOUS feature in connection with the publication before us is that in a preface by Dr. Faisst he tells us that Mr. Goetschius was a pupil of his, and that the system here given forth was used by him (Dr. Faisst) for a period of ten years at the Stuttgart Conservatory of Music. The work, however, being published with his assent, may be presumed to embody the ripest thoughts of both these theorists; and with the public, therefore, it is a matter of no importance how much credit in the compilation of the book is to be assigned to each professor. We may agree with the assertion, in the preface by the author, that the efforts of the students in England and America have been "but ineffectively supported by such superficial harmony books as have sprung up in our own soil, or such incomprehensible, prolix, and needlessly profound treatises as have been translated from the German," but these

"incomprehensible" and "needlessly profound" works have been surely accompanied by others we could name which are even now accepted as text-books in the science. Without unreservedly admitting that many features in the system now before us are absolutely new, there can be no question that the explanation of the chords is clear and logical. In justification of this praise, we may point to the description of the "principal" and "subordinate" triads in the key, in which no more words are used than the proper elucidation of the subject demands. Many modern theorists, however, will be astonished at the following sentence. Having given us the dominant ninth in the key of C, the author says that "the addition of one more third would increase the sum of dissonances to such a degree that there would barely be a preponderance of consonances. This is wrong, and proves that the number of component intervals of a chord must be limited to five." The chords of the eleventh and thirteenth, therefore, are absolutely discarded; and when we say that he accuses Mendelssohn of having written the chord which we are accustomed to term the "German sixth," A flat, E flat, and F sharp, instead of A flat, D sharp, and F sharp, as it ought to be, it will be seen that the method taught in the Conservatory of Music at Stuttgart materially differs from those which have gradually gained ground in this country.

Morley's New Singing-Tutor. By Hugh McNabb.

The Sprig of May. Song. Written by Helen M. Burnside. The music (founded on a Hebrew melody) composed by Jacques Blumenthal.

Once and for evermore. Song. Words by Mark Lemon. Music by Berthold Tours.

The Harbour Lights at Sea. Song. Words by J. P. Douglas. Music by Signor Pinsuti.

[W. Morley and Co.]

"It is obvious," says the author of the new Singing-Tutor, "that teaching singing means something more than merely helping a pupil to 'get up' a few songs, and that a proper course of study must aim at much more." This truth seems now generally admitted; and we are glad to find, therefore, that books effectually smoothing the path of students are rapidly multiplying. Amongst the best of these may be classed the work of Mr. McNabb, every page of which thoroughly proves that he is a master of his subject. The exercises are extremely good, the directions for voice culture well written and clearly expressed, and the exercises carefully prepared for the purpose intended. The song of Mr. Blumenthal's, which stands first on our list, is certainly not one of his best efforts; although, as he tells us that it is "founded upon a Hebrew melody," we are not quite certain for how much we must hold him responsible. It is a musician-like composition, however, and, if well sung, would be sure to produce an "effect" with a drawing-room audience. The extreme simplicity of "Once and for evermore" shows that Mr. Tours can thoroughly adapt his powers to the words he has selected for musical setting. The story is well told both by the poet and musician, and will certainly find favour wherever it is heard. "The Harbour Lights" is a capital song in Signor Pinsuti's happiest vein, the temporary change into the tonic minor being most sympathetic with the words. It is published in three keys, but we should imagine that the medium key, G major, will be the favourite with those amateurs for whom the composition is evidently intended.

Thirty-four Original Tunes. Set to Favourite Hymns by Milton, Heber, Montgomery, Keble, &c. Composed by Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew. [James Nisbet and Co.]

THIS book will be found to be of considerable interest to those in search of good and attractive tunes to words already well known—in fact, it is some time since we have seen a collection by a single composer of such uniform merit. The modulations are frequently to keys beyond the range generally adopted in this style of music, but they are always managed with musicianly skill, and are therefore apparently natural and easy. The ideas are well expressed, and the harmonies are vocal and interesting. We can heartily recommend this little work to all Church musicians.

Out of Town. A Set of Humorous Part-songs for Mixed Voices. By Walter Maynard.
[Duncan Davison and Co.]

THE composer of this series of Part-songs is sufficiently modest, for he tells us in his preface that they "can be sung by the full choir throughout, or by a quartet, or double quartet of voices, supported by the choir at such points as the conductor may decide"; and that the work "can be shortened by omitting any of the following part-songs, or prolonged by introducing, at appropriate intervals during the day, 'Hark! the lark,' 'All among the barley,' 'Under the greenwood tree,' or other solo and choral music." We think that Mr. Maynard somewhat underestimates the merit of his composition when he candidly asserts that it may be lengthened or shortened at will by the introduction of perfectly extraneous matter; for, although merely intended as a piece of musical pleasantry, it is exceedingly good of its kind, whatever little story there is to tell being told agreeably enough both in the words and music. No. 1 is taken from the first movement of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," No. 2 is from the Notturmo, and No. 3 from the Dance of Clowns, in Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the rest of the songs being, we presume, original. All these are extremely well arranged, and many of them attractive enough to be welcomed apart from the work to which they belong. It is announced on the title-page that all the songs can be sung with or without accompaniment; but as the pianoforte has occasionally an independent part, the aid of this instrument would certainly improve the general effect.

Hornpipe. For the Pianoforte.

Moresque. For the Pianoforte.

Composed by Edward Hecht.

[Forsyth Brothers.]

ALTHOUGH inundated in the present day with music modelled upon the dance forms of a past day, it is only very rarely that a Hornpipe is added to the store. Mr. Hecht, however, who has already proved his power in works of more importance, has furnished us with so excellent and highly characteristic a specimen of this dance that, were it not for the two fifths between the melody and accompaniment in bar 5, we might pronounce it absolutely perfect. The movement is full of life throughout, and, being quite within the reach of moderate players, will no doubt achieve the popularity it deserves. The Moresque, in A minor and major, has a highly attractive principal theme, the treatment of which is thoroughly in keeping with the design of the piece. Many of the modulations are extremely striking, but none appear written with any desire to display the profundity of the composer's knowledge. Both for practice and performance we cordially commend this piece to the attention of pianists who, in addition to the possession of average executive powers, can appreciate artistic and unpretentious writing.

Offertory Sentences: Set to Tunes from "The Hymnary."
By J. Powell Metcalfe. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE title of this little publication might lead the reader to imagine that the Offertory Sentences have here been subjected to a process similar to that which the Psalms underwent at the hands of Tate and Brady. Nothing, however, could be further from the fact, the text being given precisely as it stands in the Prayer Book. The object of the work is to provide a musical setting of the Sentences simple enough for congregational singing, the anthem-like settings of some composers being too elaborate for this purpose. It is surprising to note how readily the words agree with the tunes selected from "The Hymnary." In some instances absolutely no alteration has been required, while in others we find only a few trifling repetitions of a word or two. Among the best examples are "Whatsoever ye would," set to Barnby's beautiful tune No. 91; "While we have time," to Macfarren's, No. 70; "Whoso hath this world's good," to Berthold Tours's, No. 241; and "Blessed be the man" to Barnby's, No. 353. Regarding these it may be said that if the music had been written expressly for the text it could not have fitted it more exactly in accent and general appropriateness. Mr. Metcalfe has supplied a distinct want in service music.

Jubilate in F. By E. E. Carrington.

The Office for the Holy Communion in A flat. By Thomas Adams.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A. By E. J. Crow, Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F. By James Greenwood.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THERE must be a strong and increasing demand for new settings of the musical portions of the Liturgy, judging from the liberal supply. It would be unreasonable to expect any strongly marked individuality in simple arrangements intended for ordinary choirs. All that we have a right to look for is grammatical correctness, general musicianly feeling, and church-like dignity of style without dryness or pedantry. Mr. Carrington's Jubilate may be accounted somewhat old-fashioned at the present time. It is written in the simplest diatonic style, with an air of frankness akin to the Services of King or Jackson. The Communion Service of Mr. Adams is more modern in feeling, without being unduly free either in melody or harmony, and may be generally commended. It is surprising, however, to find a composer who exhibits intelligence in matters of stress and phrasing placing the accent on the first syllable of the word "upon" in the Kyrie. The setting includes the Benedictus and Agnus Dei, the whole being in four-part harmony except the Credo, which is in unison. Dr. Crow's Evening Service is a composition of some importance and is evidently intended for large and well-trained choirs. Contrapuntal elaboration is freely employed in the voice parts, and the accompaniment is for the most part independent. The exclusive use of triple time occasionally leads to some rather flippant effects; but, on the whole, the Organist of Ripon Cathedral may be congratulated upon the production of a fine original Service, worthy to compare with the best of its contemporaries. The last composition on our list is extremely unpretentious. It is written for voices in unison, and the accompaniment is simplicity itself.

Evening Bells. Reverie, for the Pianoforte. By Oliver Cramer. [Weekes and Co.]

A MELODIOUS theme, accompanied with arpeggios for the right hand, with a simple bass marking the divisions of the bar for the left, may be easy enough to write and easy enough to play; but, knowing the large amount of public favour accorded to pieces formed on this model, we can scarcely wonder that the talents of good writers and good performers are somewhat too much exercised upon these works. Without here considering, therefore, whether the art is benefited or deteriorated by an addition to this store of what are usually termed "teaching pieces," we may say that Mr. Cramer has in his "Evening Bells" given us a very effective specimen, which is well worthy the attention of all who do not direct the energies of their pupils exclusively towards the "classics." The subject is extremely tuneful; and the passages lie well under a hand trained to arpeggio playing.

Songs from Wonderland. Words by Lewis Carroll. Music by Philippa Pearson (Mrs. A. Cyril).

[Weekes and Co.]

THE popularity of the work from which these songs are taken will no doubt ensure a wide acceptance for them in union with the very appropriate music which appears in the neat little edition before us. Mrs. Cyril has been evidently a most sympathetic reader of the quaint words of Mr. Carroll; and, in musically adapting them for the use of children, has been sufficiently mindful of their limited capabilities both as vocalists and instrumentalists. As an addition to the Kindergarten store of music, the book will be invaluable.

The Lord hear thee. Anthem. Composed by J. E. Barkworth. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS is a small four-page chorus Anthem, and contains much that is beautiful, both as regards harmony and melody. It also contains evidence in the way of doubtful notation, &c., which we think shows a want of experience in part writing. We do not wish, however, to be thought to discourage the composer—in fact we think there is much in the anthem to like, and we therefore recommend it.

A Handbook of Musical Biography. Compiled and Edited by David Baptie. [W. Morley and Co.]

WE know how difficult it is in the limited space of 256 pages to compile a Musical Biography which shall do anything like adequate justice to the artists whose names are included; and we can also sympathise with an editor in his delicate task of selecting these names. We are content, therefore, to accept in the small volume before us the bald accounts of the career of some of the most celebrated musicians; and, in view of Mr. Baptie's statement in his preface that he is desirous of "bestowing infinitely more attention upon the claims of our native musicians than has yet been given them," we cannot blame him for omitting the names of some of those forgotten artists which have so long appeared in more voluminous works. But we fail to see why, for example, such names as Miss Anna Williams, Miss Marian McKenzie, and Mr. F. King should be absent, whilst others who certainly do not hold so high a position in the profession are awarded a place. Brief, too, as the notices must necessarily be, something more might surely be said of Herr Staudigl, the bass singer, than that "he sang with great acceptance in many of the best operas," considering that he was the original Elijah at Birmingham when Mendelssohn produced his Oratorio there. We may also mention that much of the information contained in the book would be somewhat misleading to strangers, an instance of which occurs in the few lines devoted to Mrs. Weldon, who is said to have done "much to introduce M. Gounod to the notice of the English public." Apart from these objections, however, and merely, therefore, looking upon the book as one of reference for dates and descriptions of about 3,000 artists, there is a great deal to commend; and we trust that Mr. Baptie may reap that reward which he deserves for his arduous labours, which, as he tells us, extended over fully five-and-thirty years.

The Child's Pianoforte Book: Being a First Year's Course at the Pianoforte. For the Home, the Kindergarten, and the School. With upwards of fifty Original Tunes and Songs. By H. Keatley Moore, Mus. B., B.A., &c. [W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.]

"This little book," says its author, in an address to the teacher, "was written to supply a special need; and as it is certain that many teachers and parents must have felt themselves in like case with ourselves, it has been thought well to publish it." This "need," it must be said, was especially felt by those who taught upon the Kindergarten system; for the writer of the work informs us that when the Croydon Kindergarten and Preparatory School Company placed the department of pianoforte-teaching in his hands he found nothing already published which did not in some way or other run counter to the method of education adopted in the school. A review upon the book, therefore, must be a review upon the Kindergarten system, for certainly it appears admirably adapted to the purpose intended, and the only question is whether the foundation laid upon this principle is really a solid one. Into this matter it is unnecessary here to enter, and we need only say, therefore, that those who teach upon this method will fully appreciate the merits of Mr. Moore's work, which, it must be mentioned, is excellently got up, and contains some highly artistic illustrations.

Deux Valses Impromptu. Pour Piano. Par Ignace Gibsone. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

WE have never been able to discover the difference between a "Valse" and a "Valse Impromptu." Presuming, however, that this title is used to ward off any severe criticism, we scarcely think the qualification necessary in the two compositions before us. Mr. Gibsone invariably writes gracefully; but both these Waltzes are far above the average of mere dance music. No. 1, in A flat, has a melodious theme, which is well treated throughout, the changes of key preventing any undue feeling of monotony, and the passages lying easily under the hand. No. 2, in D flat, is perhaps even more popular in character, the subject being played with accompanying quavers in the right hand against a crotchet bass for the left. At the double bar we have a melody in the style of Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," which, although now almost common property, is always effective.

The Desert. Symphonic Ode, in Three Parts. The words translated from the French of Auguste Colin by the Rev. J. Troutbeck. The music composed by Félicien David. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

NOW that the music of Berlioz has been rescued from that neglect which evidently arose rather from the apathy of those who cater for the public than from the want of appreciation of the public itself, it may reasonably be expected that the works of another French composer of somewhat kindred spirit, Félicien David, should be brought up for judgment. Although a prolific writer, there can be little doubt that his fame will chiefly rest upon "Le Désert," a composition which requires but to be known to receive that recognition due to its merit. The three parts into which the work is divided are each introduced by some descriptive lines, the music throughout depicting with remarkable fidelity the various scenes through which the caravan is passing—the Prayer to Allah, the Chant of the Muezzin (founded, it is believed, upon an Arabic melody), and the Dance painting in the most vivid colours the impressions of the composer during his long residence in the East. A folio edition of this work was published some years ago; but it has been reserved for Messrs. Novello to place it within the reach of Choral Societies by issuing it in the well-known cheap octavo form; the excellent translation of the text, by the Rev. J. Troutbeck, rendering it additionally valuable for general circulation in this country. The many beauties of this charming tone-picture can only be perfectly realised with the aid of a full orchestra, but the pianoforte accompaniment is so arranged as to give a very fair idea of the score.

Gyp. Song. Written by T. Ashe. Composed by Ciro Pinsuti. [R. Cocks and Co.]

EVEN in his most unpretending vocal pieces Signor Pinsuti always evidences that artistic culture which makes him stand apart from the conventional song-writers of the day. The little trifle before us is really charming in its simple beauty, the tuneful theme being surrounded by delicate figures in the accompaniment which materially enhance its effect. We are especially pleased with the use of the minor supertonic of the key (G minor); and the ascending and descending scale passages, with the minor sixth and major seventh, are extremely welcome to those who fully recognise the real characteristics of the minor scale. Both words and melody of this song must ensure for it a hearty welcome wherever it is heard.

Motivo Piacevole. For the Organ. By Neville George Barnett. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of this piece seems to be a victim to the prevailing mania for chromatic harmonies. In form it is simple enough, and its manner is that of a slow minuet. The subjects are agreeable, but the effect is injured by progressions which jar upon the ear of the cultured musician. Discords of the ninth left unresolved and inversions of sevenths in one key resolved in another may be tolerated in an elaborate composition, but sound harshly in a brief, formal movement of six pages. In future efforts Mr. Barnett should endeavour to preserve more dignity and simplicity of utterance.

If ye love Me. Anthem. By Harry Dancey. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IN choral music of every description repetitions of words are frequently not only inevitable but desirable. With Mr. Dancey, however, liberty in this respect degenerates into license. The first sentence is repeated no less than eight times, and the effect is painful because bordering on the ludicrous. In other respects there is nothing remarkable in this brief full Anthem. It is smoothly written and within the reach of the most ordinary choirs.

Andante con Variazioni e Fuga, for the Organ. By Thomas J. Dudeney. [Chappell and Co.]

THIS is altogether an interesting and useful work. The variations (seven in number) are in many respects admirable, and will not be found troublesome to the executant. The fugue is a little more difficult, but it will repay the trouble of learning it.

*Rondo gioioso, für Piano zu vier Händen.
Symphonisches Adagio, für Piano zu vier Händen.
Fünf Gesänge, für eine Singstimme mit Begleitung des Pianoforte.*

Laterna Magica. Sechs Original Tonbilder für Pianoforte.

Componirt von Fr. Wilh. Jähns.
[Berlin: T. Trautwein.]

THESE works are all worthy of attention, to which we distinctly recommend them. The Rondo is an Allegro vivace in E flat, of well sustained interest, simple, bright, and animated. It makes an excellent addition to the repertory of pianoforte duet players, who will find the passages by no means difficult. The symphonical Adagio is, we need hardly say, a work of higher pretensions, and, because successful, entitled to higher praise. Its structure is symmetrical, the themes are well contrasted, and the imaginativeness of the whole marks the composer as one who justly prefers a claim to respectful consideration. This appears with equal force in the songs, which, though not equal in merit, are of a high class, and show the hand of an able and practised musician. The group of little pieces called "Laterna Magica" is charming in their varied fancy and effective contrasts. Evidently the music of Herr Jähns should be better known in England than it is.

*Original Compositions for the Organ. No. 1. Two Introductory Voluntaries, by George J. Bennett.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]*

THESE pieces, by the clever young Royal Academy student of whom such high hopes are entertained, will make a very favourable impression as to his skill in writing for the organ. Mr. Bennett seems able to turn his hand to anything in the line of composition, but he is not the least happy in the class of work now before us. Both voluntaries are written with transparent clearness; they are in good "form," having a beginning, a middle, and an end, and their themes are, within the limits imposed, properly worked out. The effect in each case, moreover, is extremely pleasing, and when we add that the music presents no difficulty, it is clear that these pieces have more than a chance of popularity. Our organ-playing readers will do well to keep a look-out for Mr. George J. Bennett's compositions.

*Air de Danse. Pour Piano.
Sea Breezes. Sketch for the Pianoforte.
Composed by D. R. Munro.
[Duncan Davison and Co.]*

As there is something of the Scottish character about the theme of the first of these pieces, we are puzzled to find why it has a French name and is said on the title-page to be "par" D. R. Munro. The trifle, however, has sufficient liveliness to justify its title, and may be found attractive by young players. If it were not for a descending chromatic scale and an arpeggio of the chord of the dominant seventh, there would be little to suggest "Sea Breezes" in the Sketch so called; for both the melody and accompaniment are decidedly heavy and oppressive. The piece is inoffensive, but we cannot see why such music is written—or, rather, why it should be published.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AFTER several attempts the right of performance of Wagner's "Nibelungen Tetralogie" has been secured for the Royal Theatre, Berlin. During the life of the composer the fact of his persistently refusing to allow any one of the four parts to be performed singly was the chief difficulty in the way of the production of the work, it not being thought advisable to attempt the representation of the entire Tetralogy on consecutive nights. Another difficulty arose from Wagner's insisting on the employment of Herr Anton Seidl as conductor. These obstacles have at length been surmounted, but not without some trouble, as since the composer's death a lawsuit between his heirs and Herr Angelo Neumann has been threatened, in consequence of the action of the latter in selling the performing right of the "Ring," which he alleged was his own property, to the managers of the Berlin Opera. "Die Walküre," an established favourite with the Berlin public, is announced for the autumn season, with Frau Sachse-Hofmeister as Brunnhilde, Herr Niemann as Siegmund, and Herr Betz as Wotan. The work has hitherto been given at Berlin at the Victoria Theatre by the Bayreuth company, and always with success; but now that it has become part of the répertoire of the Royal Opera, a test will be supplied as to its lasting popularity.

Herr von Hülsen, the Intendant-General of the Royal Plays at Berlin (Director of the Royal Opera House and the Royal Theatre for Dramas), celebrated on the 1st ult. the fiftieth anniversary of his entry into the Royal service. He joined the army in the year 1833, and has held the above-named office for thirty-two years. In honour of the occasion a performance of Lessing's drama "Minna von Barnhelm" was given, this being the play with which he commenced his career as director of these two important theatres. Although this celebration has given occasion to many—particularly to those belonging to the advanced school in musical matters—to raise a dissentient voice at what they consider the too conservative standpoint adopted by Herr von Hülsen during the time he has held his very important office, yet numerous congratulations and deputations from the most important German stages and musical societies have been received by the much respected director. A "Herr von Hülsen Provident Fund," intended for the benefit of veteran members of the stage, was founded on this occasion; and as it was announced that 52,000 marks were subscribed at once, it will be seen that the fund starts with fair prospects of success. Whatever the artistic merits of Herr von Hülsen may be, it is certain that he has considerably helped the material interests of the numerous body of public servants of which he is the influential and omnipotent head.

Musical festivals are becoming more and more en vogue in Germany. We hear that it has been decided to hold a festival at regular intervals at Hamburg, the first of the series being announced to take place at Wandsb., 1884. Four Hamburg societies and one society each from Brunswick, Bremen, Hanover, Kiel, Lübeck, and Schwerin will form the choir, and a numerous orchestra, with a solo violinist and four solo singers, will be engaged. Two concerts will be given at the first festival, and the programme will include a great oratorio by Handel, a work by Brahms, and a symphony by Beethoven. Herr von Bernuth will be the conductor.

E. W. Fritsch, of Leipzig, the publisher of Wagner's "Gesammelte Schriften," is about to publish the tenth and last volume of the master's literary works, completing the series. It will contain his contributions to the "Bayreuther Blätter," letters to Weber, Wolzogen, Stein, Fritsch, and Schön, and the libretto of "Parsifal."

A Wagner-Cycle is contemplated at the Imperial Opera House at Vienna during the coming season. All the composer's operas, from "Rienzi" to "Parsifal," will be given in succession, with an interval of three or four days between each performance. The tenor, Herr Winkelmann, has undertaken the arduous task of singing the parts of Rienzi, Tannhäuser, Waller von Stolzing, Tristan, Siegmund, and Siegfried.

The following works are announced for performance at the first series of Herr Joachim's subscription concerts at Berlin, which take place during the last three months of the year: Beethoven's "Eroica" and F major Symphonies, Schumann's D minor Symphony, Haydn's B major Symphony, Bizet's Suite "L'Arlésienne," Handel's "Belshazzar," "Gesang der Parzen," by Brahms, and "Idylle," by Kiel.

Herr Pollini, who entered the tenth season of his directorship of the Hamburg Town Theatre on the 1st ult., seems to be the most successful director of any German theatre, he having secured a subscription of no less than half a million of marks. Mackenzie's "Colomba" will be, as our readers are aware, one of the many novelties proposed to be brought forward during the ensuing season. It is reported that Herr Pollini has discovered a new tenor of the first rank, Herr Gustav Memmler. The débütant has appeared as Tristan, and is said to be even superior to Herr Winkelmann, his predecessor at Hamburg in this trying part.

We regret to learn that Frau Vogl, the celebrated singer and representative of the part of Brunnhilde in Wagner's "Ring der Nibelungen," has had the misfortune to be thrown from her horse at a rehearsal of the "Götterdämmerung" at Munich. Besides the severe shock, she sustained an injury to her left hand by a kick from the horse's hoof. We are, however, glad to hear that the latest news from Munich reports her to be making good progress towards recovery.

At the two town theatres of Leipzig 635 performances were given from August 1, 1882, to July 31, 1883, of which 202 were representations of operas. Amongst the novelties produced we find Rubinstein's "Makkabäer" ten times, the same composer's "Dämon" six times, and Reintal's "Käthchen von Heilbronn" seven times.

The Cologne Town Theatre began a series of operatic representations on August 31 with Meyerbeer's "Hugue-nots." Liszt's "St. Elizabeth" will be given during the winter.

The excellent pianist Theodor Kirchner, who lately left Leipzig for Dresden, has been appointed teacher of the pianoforte at the Royal Conservatoire of the latter city.

The monument erected by pupils and friends on the grave of the composer and pianist Theodor Kullak, at Berlin, was unveiled on the 12th ult.

Johannes Brahms has left Vienna for Wiesbaden, which will be his future place of abode. He has just finished a new symphony, which will be performed at Berlin by Wüllner's orchestra.

A work on Richard Wagner in Dutch, called "Richard Wagner: zijn Leven en zijne Werken geschetst," by G. Viotta, has been published in Amsterdam.

Signorina Teresina Tua, the young violinist who was heard in London during last season, will play at the second Gewandhaus Concert at Leipzig.

Gluck's "Armida," with Frau Antonie Schreiber in the title-part, has been performed at Bremen, under the management of Herr Angelo Neumann.

The programme of the Paris Grand-Opéra for the coming season has been issued, and promises as novelties the ballet "Farandola," music by Dubois; Gounod's almost rewritten opera "Sappho"; and a two-act opera, "Tabarin," by Emile Pressard.

The revived Italian Opera at Paris announces as novelties for the forthcoming first season "Simon Boccanegra," by Verdi; "Hérodiade," by Massenet; "Giocanda," by Ponchielli; and "Guarany," by Gomez.

The Opéra-Comique will produce the following novelties: "Le Joli Gille," by Poise and Monselet; "Manon," by Massenet; and a new opera by Paladilhe, of which the title has not yet been announced.

A great competition of male choral societies took place at Aachen (Aix-la-Chapelle) during August. The first prize in prima-vista singing was gained by the Cercle Vieux-temps from Verviers, and the second prize in the same competition by the Kölner Sängerkreis. The principal competition of the festival took place on the evening of August 27, in the theatre, when the highest prizes were gained by two Belgian societies, La Legia from Liège and L'Orphéon from Brussels.

The result of the "Prix de Rome" at the Brussels Conservatoire this year has been that no candidate has shown sufficient merit to justify the first prize being given. The second prize was awarded to M. Heckers, of Ghent, and M. Soubre, of Liège.

Benjamin Godard is engaged on a new opera, "Pedro de Zalamea," which, it is expected, will be performed at Antwerp in January, 1884.

Sir Michael Costa has presented to the Naples Royal College of Music the manuscript scores of four operas and four ballads. Each score bears the inscription "To the famous Archives of the Naples Royal College of Music, in memory of M. Costa. London, August 15, 1883." Besides these scores, the gift includes a bâton of ebony, with coral mountings, which Sir Michael used for ten years.

Mr. Theodore Thomas has finished a most successful concert tour through the United States, and the new series of the Philharmonic concerts will begin at New York, under his conductorship, at the end of this month. Amongst the new works we find that Mackenzie's orchestral ballad "La Belle Dame sans Merci," which, our readers will remember, was performed with great success at one of the London Philharmonic Society's concerts last season, will be given at the first concert.

A musical and theatrical paper has been started at Buenos Ayres. It is entitled Frou-Frou, and is printed in four languages—English, French, Italian, and Spanish.

A new opera, entitled "Marion Delorme," has been written by the composer Ponchielli.

The novelties in preparation at the Italian Opera at St. Petersburg are Salvyre's "Riccardo III.," Rubinstein's "Nero," and two comic operas.

It is seldom that the continental musical papers condescend to mention the doings and whereabouts of English composers and musicians, but when they do so the names are given in such a careless manner that it is often difficult to recognise to whom allusion is intended. Messrs. Mackenzie and Thomas, our rising stars in the operatic sky (as one German paper has it), have been often mentioned lately on account of their great success with the operas written for the Carl Rosa troupe, but their names have mostly been twisted about in the most merciless manner. The latest version we find in No. 39 of the "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik" (the well known Schumann-Brendel paper), which reports that Carl Rosa has commissioned three English composers to write new works for his coming campaign—viz., "Herren Mackenzy-Goring, Thomas, and Villieu Stanford." In the same paper we find that the ballad concerts under "Bonsey" begin on November 21, and that the Crystal Palace Concerts are under the direction of "Mans."

Léon Halévy, brother of the famous composer of "La Juive" and several other operas, and father of the well-known author Ludovic Halévy, lately died at St. Germain-en-Laye, aged 81.

Victor Massart, a celebrated teacher of the double-bass, died at Liège on the 6th ult.

Carl Kuntze, a very popular composer of comic songs and part-songs in Germany, died on the 7th ult. at Delitzsch, in Saxony.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN OLD TUNE-BOOK.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have an old tune-book (old 8vo, pp. 100) the title-page of which is lost, and I should be very thankful if one of your readers could furnish me with a copy of the same. The following marks, taken from the book, will I trust be sufficient to identify it. The preface runs thus: "It was the design of the editor in this publication to furnish schools with a set of Psalm Tunes, Hymns, and Anthems," &c. Then follow "Graces or Ornaments of Music, Tuning the Voice," &c.; on page 2, "General Remarks"; on page 3, "Composition"; on page 4, "Index" of tunes, &c., and these are succeeded by pages of musical instructions. It contains forty-six tunes, and thirteen anthems. The first tune in the "Index" is "Amsterdam" (p. 7), by Williams. Then tunes by the following authors: West, Arnold, Dr. Madan, Gillet, &c. The anthem index is put after that of the tunes and the first anthem in this index is "Arise, shine, O Zion" (page 85), by Williams. Then follow anthems by Stephenson, Ashworth, Knap, West, and number nine in this index is "O Lord God of Israel" (page 36), by Williams again; and the last of all is "The beauty of Israel" (page 29), by Arnold. From these indications I hope that some of my musical friends may be able kindly to favour me with a copy of the title-page.—Yours, &c.,

EOS LLECHYD.

BAPTIE'S "BIOGRAPHY OF MUSICIANS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you allow me a small space in your valuable paper to point out one error (among others) in the book "Biography of Musicians," by David Baptie? Sir Robert Stewart is described as Organist of St. Patrick's (National) Cathedral, Dublin, whereas Mr. Charles Marchant occupies that position, and previous to his appointment the post was held by the late Mr. William Murphy, Mus. Bac. I enclose my card, and am, Sir, yours, &c.,

PROFESSIONAL AND AMATEUR MUSICIANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I incline to the belief that the disease existing in the profession which "Justitia" fears is not so bad as he apprehends; or, if bad, its incipient growth is an inevitable appanage of the musical art.

Certificates are of no use. This is no serious question of the extreme importance and extent which "Justitia" considers attaches to it. I write from a suburb of London, where there is to be found the scarcely smaller evil flourishing of cheap pianos obtainable at one shilling and sixpence or two shillings per week. These instruments it would be mere flattery to designate as musical. However, no sooner is the honest mechanic or other workman whose little daughter sings convinced of her talent than the delighted parent hires a cheap piano and a cheap teacher. All this innocence is surely not to be taken up by "Justitia" as if anything depended upon it. Real music is not in the question. The eighteenpenny piano and the fourpenny lesson (see advertisement) are harmless delusions on both sides, and I do not concede that competent professors lose the price of a single quarter's tuition; for observe that the young gentleman pupil mentioned in "Justitia's" letter soon discovered his weak points and resorted to "Justitia" to remove them. Again, the father of the young lady also alluded to doubtless was uneasy, and so asked the professional musician for an opinion. I have no doubt "Justitia" has already added this pupil to his list.

I have said that certificates are of no use. I am a genuine amateur, and possess a certificate from one of the best known musicians in Europe. Not depending upon music for a livelihood, I shrink from employing the few leisure hours at my disposal in practising or teaching any music but such as I have been taught to believe is worthy of the name. But in the almost universal judgment of my unenlightened neighbours the young lady in the next street who throws up the parlour window when she plays, and advertises herself as "A 1," is a most brilliant performer, and they will be perfectly satisfied if she only teaches their children to play as well as herself.

Of what use, then, are certificates of competence, unless people are compelled to respect them? But how is this compulsion to be carried out?—Yours truly,

MEZZO-TERMINE.

AN APPEAL TO COMPOSERS FOR THE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—May I venture to draw the attention of Church musicians to a want that has been rather prominently brought before me lately? It is the custom at the "Three Choirs Festivals" to have at least one Symphony and an Overture of sacred character performed in the cathedral; at the recent Gloucester Festival no exception was made to this rule, Mr. Stanford's "Elegiac Symphony" and Spohr's Overture to "The Last Judgment" being given with grand effect by the orchestra. I wish now to point out to composers of orchestral music that there is an excellent opening for short Church Symphonies and Overtures of a sacred and solemn character, suitable for performance in a cathedral. Experience has taught me, in a practical manner, that at present a conductor has but a very limited choice when he considers what orchestral works to include in a cathedral performance. Two of Beethoven's Symphonies and perhaps half a dozen other works that will occur to the memory make but a small list to choose from.

Knowing that there are Englishmen who can, if they will, produce what I have called (for want of a better name) Church Symphonies and Overtures, I trust they may be persuaded to turn their thoughts to this subject; and therefore will only add that in my humble opinion two movements would be quite long enough—say, an Adagio and Allegro maestoso—but I must now leave it to wiser heads than mine to develop this idea. I can only speak to what I consider a musical want that has long been felt by others as well as myself.—Yours faithfully,

C. L. WILLIAMS.

THE EISTEDDFOD CANTATA COMPETITION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you permit me to say, in reference to the above subject, that I for one am by no means surprised at the withholding of the prize on the grounds of none of the works submitted having been considered worthy of it—that is, if it be true that a composer draws his inspiration from his libretto; for I can hardly conceive anything less calculated to assist in the successful "invocation of the muse" than the "English" translation (or adaptation, or version, whichever it is) of the "prize" libretto furnished by the Committee. In March last I sent for a copy of this "prize" libretto, and in the meantime made preparations for a few weeks of hard work at my Cantata. The libretto came in due course; and my first thought was, "How will it be possible to condense such a work into the compass (I think forty minutes as its time of performance) allowed by the Committee, unless it be at the loss of freedom and consequent effectiveness in the composition itself?" When I came, too, to read the words as they stood, I could not help feeling surprise at the notion that a composer could be expected to wed anything like good music to such an effusion. However, I set to work; but long ere the opening chorus and No. 1 Recit. were finished the whole thing had fallen so flat upon my imaginative powers as utterly to prevent any further progress. Is it reasonable, let me ask, to expect any composer who is capable of writing a Cantata at all to produce from such a libretto a work which shall be worth fifty shillings, to say nothing of fifty pounds? As a man who has written, amongst many other works, a three-act Opera upon his own libretto, I think I may venture to express this opinion. One could have little or no fault to find with the plot of the libretto or with the symmetry of its construction as a whole; but the language of nearly every line (or at least of every verse or sentence) was trashy in the extreme. Is this due to "translation" or "adaptation"? Let us hope that if the Eisteddfod Committee offer a similar prize for competition next year they will take care to either provide a sensible English libretto or keep to their native Welsh.

I am, Sir, obediently and gratefully yours, S. E.

MR. HORATIO CHIPP.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—A rumour having been extensively circulated, both in and out of the musical world, to the effect that I have retired, or am about to retire, from the profession, and as such statements are calculated to most seriously injure me with respect to my professional engagements and otherwise, I should be extremely grateful if, with your unvarying courtesy, you would permit me, through the aid of your valuable columns, to publicly deny that there is the slightest truth or foundation whatever for any such rumour. It will be my anxiety, I trust, for some time to come to do my humble share towards the enjoyment and amusement of the public, and likewise to instruct those who intend to follow instrumentalism either as a profession or as a pastime.—Yours very obediently,

HORATIO CHIPP.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Several letters having appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES advocating the formation in London of a large male-voice choir, I should feel greatly obliged if you would kindly allow me, through your valuable journal, to invite the co-operation of any gentlemen interested in such a project.—Yours very truly,

GEO. F. GEAUSSENT.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is expected. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

AREHFIELD, N.B.—On Friday, the 21st ult., Mr. Jesse Timson, Organist and Choirmaster to Sir Robert Menzies, Bart., gave an Organ Recital in St. David's Episcopal Church, Weem. The programme included Concerto in B flat (Handel, No. 6), Fugue in D minor (Bach), Postlude in C (Smart), and pieces by Costa, Calkin, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Smart, and Gritton.

BELFAST.—Mr. Alfred Hollins, student of the Royal Normal College for the Blind, London, gave a Recital on the fine organ in the Carlisle Memorial Church on the 18th ult. The programme included composition by Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, Guilmant, Lemmens, &c. His accurate manipulation and skilful pedalling won the earnest attention of a crowded audience.

BLACKPOOL.—Mons. Riviere's third annual Benefit Concert was given on the 15th ult., at the Winter Gardens. The programme included instrumental selections of favourite pieces, excellently played by the orchestra of the Gardens, augmented by the bands of the 3rd Dragoon Guards, the King's Own Lancaster Regiment, and the Kirkham Artillery Volunteers, conducted by Mons. Riviere. The principal vocalists were Miss Emma Holt and Miss Frances Hipwell, both of whom were highly successful.

BLAKENEY, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.—On Thursday, the 20th ult., Mr. Francis Morgan, Organist of All Saints' Church, gave a Concert in the National Schoolroom, which was well attended. Miss Hathaway (Lydney), Misses Mary Morgan, Annie Morgan, and Gwyneth Morgan, and Messrs. Wm. Morgan, W. H. Morgan, F. Morgan, and E. Morgan, R. Drege, and H. Morgan assisted. All the items were well rendered, and several were encored.

BRADFORD.—The annual Choir Services at St. Thomas's Church were celebrated on the 16th ult. In the evening the choir was strengthened by fifty members of the Bradford Festival Choral Society, and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise was sung after the sermon. The solo vocalists were Miss Clara Marshall, Mrs. Clarke, and Mr. W. Costes. Mr. J. H. Kooks presided at the organ, and Mr. W. H. Emsley, Choirmaster of St. Thomas's, conducted. At the morning service, which was fully choral, Goss's Anthem "The wilderness" was given by the church choir.

BRIGHTON.—Special Organ Recitals have been given every evening since Monday, August 27, by Mr. James Hallé, Organist of Clapham Congregational Church. The programmes have included Bach's Fugue in G minor, Mendelssohn's Sonatas, Handel's Second Concerto, Haydn's Military Symphony, Smart's Air and Variations in A, and selections from the works of Beethoven, Gounod, Wagner, Batiste, &c. The various pieces, especially the Fugue of Bach and Impromptu Sketches on Old English Airs, exhibited the exceptional taste and executive power of the organist, the audience showing their appreciation by frequent applause.

BRISTOL.—Haydn's Creation was performed at Redland Road Wesleyan Schoolroom, adjoining the chapel, on the 18th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. H. C. Kny. The choir of the chapel, reinforced by several members of the Bristol Musical Festival Society, gave the choruses with good effect. The solo vocalists were Miss Marie Gane, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. W. Thomas, who received great applause. Dr. Colman presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. A. N. Price at the American organ. There was a crowded and appreciative audience.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—A Promenade Concert was given in the Corn Exchange on the 13th ult. The band of the 3rd Suffolk Battalion performed a selection of music under the leadership of Herr Carl Krill. The solo vocalists were Miss Byron, Miss Mallows, R.A.M., Mr. Salmon, Mr. Roberts, Mr. Frederick Pattie, and Mr. Brockbank (Norwich Cathedral). Mr. G. Hooper, R.A.M., was Conductor and accompanist. Several part-songs were also well rendered.

CARDIFF.—There were eleven applications for the appointment of Music Lecturer of the new University College of South Wales, and at a recent meeting of the College Council—Lord Aberdeen presiding—Mr. Clement Templeton, B.A., was elected, at a salary of £100 per annum. The successful applicant was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and afterwards pursued his studies at Leipzig Conservatoire. Then he accepted an appointment at Harrow Music School, under Mr. Farmer, whence he comes to Cardiff. He intends to introduce the system in vogue at Harrow Music School, and proposes to give a course of Lectures on pianoforte-playing, and to conduct the students through a systematic method of classical composition.

CINDERFORD.—Miss Mary Morgan gave an Evening Concert at the Town Hall on the 13th ult., to a large and appreciative audience.

Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Jennie Matthias, Mr. C. Videon Harding, and Mr. H. Morse were the vocalists, and Miss A. T. Jones solo harpist. Miss Hilda Wilson gave Rossini's aria "Di tanti palpiti" and "The song of the heart" (Tennant) with much success, and the other vocalists were highly appreciated in their several selections, special mention being due to the excellent rendering of the trios "Rest thee on this mossy pillow" (Smart) and "O twilight air" (Berger). Mr. John Hunt, of Gloucester, who acted as Conductor, contributed his "Harvest Song" and a song in the second part, both of which were well received. Encores were frequent during the evening.

COPPERHOWN, CORNWALL.—Mr. A. C. Tonking, R.A.M. (pupil of Dr. Charles Steggall), gave an Organ Recital on the 14th ult., in aid of the Chapel funds. The programme included compositions by Handel, Mendelssohn, W. T. Best, Charles Steggall, E. H. Turpin, Wely, Thomas, Henry Smart, and Alexandre Guilmant.

COVENTRY.—The Festival of the Ripened Grain was held at Christ Church on Sunday, the 23rd ult. There was a celebration of Holy Communion at nine o'clock, Morning Prayer at eleven, and Evening Service at 6.30. The shortened form of Evening Prayer was used, and the anthem was Spohr's Cantata God, Thou art great, the solo parts being sung by Miss Giggins, Mrs. Sharpe, Mr. W. Johnson, and Mr. B. Pratt. The most successful numbers were the soprano solo with chorus "Thou, earth," and the duets "Children, pray," but the whole work was very creditably done. Mr. F. W. Humberstone presided at the organ, and played an Adagio and Allegro in D by Dr. Bunnett as a concluding voluntary. There was a large congregation.

DEVIZES.—Mr. H. Millington, of Trowbridge, gave a Ballad Concert at the Town Hall on the 3rd ult., which was highly successful. The vocalists were Misses Samuelli, Larkcom, and Damian, and Messrs. Percy and Maybrick; Conductor, Mr. S. Naylor.

DURBAN, NATAL.—A performance of Farmer's Christ and His Soldiers was given on August 16, in the West Street Wesleyan Church, by the choir, assisted by several friends—numbering in all thirty voices—and a small band. The performance on the whole was a successful one, and well received by the audience, the choruses particularly being taken with commendable precision. Mr. Edward Moon conducted, Mr. A. Swift presiding at the organ. At the conclusion of the Oratorio, Mr. Moon was presented by the members of the choir with a silver mounted baton, as a mark of esteem for his unwearied exertions to promote their efficiency. The Choir propose to commence rehearsing Gaul's Oratorio The Holy City shortly.

EASTBOURNE.—The Benefit Concert of Mr. Julian Adams, which took place in the Floral Hall, Devonshire Park, on the 8th ult., was, as might be expected, crowded to excess. The programme commenced with Gounod's "Wedding March," composed on the occasion of the Duke of Albany's marriage, conducted by Mr. Daly; the appearance of Mr. Adams at the Conductor's desk at the conclusion of the March being the signal for loud and prolonged applause. The orchestral pieces—especially Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and the Overtures to Leonora (Beethoven) and Tannhäuser (Wagner)—were finely played; a feature in the vocal selection being the singing of Madame Patey, which created the usual enthusiasm. The Welsh tenor Mr. Eos Dyffryn also contributed to the solo; and Mr. Delafontaine, a young Frenchman, on the violin, in place of Miss Clara Dinelli, absent from indisposition. The Concert was in every respect highly successful.

EPSOM.—Mr. G. E. Good, Organist and Choirmaster of Christ Church, has given a series of short Recitals after evensong on the first Sunday in each month during the summer. The attendance has been satisfactory, and much pleasure has been derived from his skilful rendering of selections from the works of many of the best known composers, from Handel to Batiste and Guilmant.

EXETER.—Mr. Harold Ryder gave an Organ Recital on the 19th ult. on the new organ erected by Eustace Ingram in the United Methodist Free Church, Queen Street, to a crowded and appreciative audience. Both tone of organ and Mr. Ryder's brilliant execution were much admired.

FOLKESTONE.—On Thursday evening, the 20th ult., a Sacred Concert was given at the Wesleyan Chapel, Mr. H. S. Roberts, the Organist, presiding at the organ. The solo vocalists were Miss E. Phillips, who was highly effective in "My heart ever faithful," and Miss Weaver. The instrumental portions of the programme were excellently rendered, Mr. J. R. C. Roberts conducted the orchestra and also contributed a violin solo. The Concert was very successful.

HUDDESFIELD.—Organ and Pianoforte Recitals have been given at the Fine Art and Industrial Exhibition with much success; and on the afternoon of August 31 a special interest was created by the performance of a number of Handel's choruses as duets on the organ by Mr. E. B. Ashford and his sister Mrs. Charles Winn, which were highly appreciated by a large audience.

HURSTPERPOINT.—The Harvest Festival was celebrated in the Parish Church on Wednesday, the 12th ult., by a choral service, at twelve o'clock. Psalms 147 and 148 were sung to Anglican Chants, and the Anthem was W. Johnson's "I will magnify Thee, O God my King." As a concluding voluntary the Organist (Mr. H. C. Young, B.A.) played Calkin's Harvest Thanksgiving March. The Choral Society held a general meeting on the 19th ult. to elect officers and committee for the year, and make arrangements for the forthcoming season.

LEEDS.—The organ of St. George's Church, which has for two months been undergoing extensive repairs by Messrs. Wordsworth and Maskell, of Leeds, was reopened on Sunday, the 2nd ult., when Dr. Spark presided at the instrument during the service. On the following evening an Organ Recital was given by Mr. Walter Parratt, Mus. Bac., Organist of St. George's Chapel Royal, Windsor, the programme being selected from the works of Bach, Guilmant, Saint-Saëns, Wely, Batiste, Wesley, Smart, Hopkins, &c. Mr. Parratt's excellent performance was listened to with much attention by a large congregation. The Town Hall organ was reopened on the evening of the roth ult., when a free Concert was given. The instrument has been in the hands of its builders (Messrs. Gray and Davison) for two months, during which time it has been thoroughly renovated and improved. The salient features of this now magnificent organ were admirably exhibited by Dr. Spark in a well-chosen selection of music; and vocal solos were contributed by Miss Fanny Bristow, Mr. W. Fisher Heath (a young tenor who created a highly favourable impression), and Mr. Dodds.

LIVERPOOL.—The Banner Choir, a well-trained body of vocalists, supported entirely by Mr. R. W. Banner, who have for some time been located at St. Cuthbert's, closed their connection with that church on the 30th ult., owing to the opposition of a few "congregational singing" advocates. The Services on the occasion were Barby in E and Attwood in D, and the Anthems Spohr's "How lovely" (in its entirety) and Beethoven's "Hallelujah." Mr. S. Claude Ridley, Director of the Choir, presided at the organ.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—A fine three-manual organ, lately erected by Mr. Henry Willis in St. Dominic's Church, was opened on Sunday, the 16th ult. Gounod's Messe du Sacré Cœur was sung, the accompaniments being played by Mr. J. C. Bowen in the absence (through illness) of Mr. N. H. Brown, the Organist of St. Dominic's. Mr. W. A. Leggatt contributed several voluntaries.

NOTTINGHAM.—On Sunday, August 26, the Anniversary of the dedication of St. Barnabas's Cathedral took place, when Mr. Henry Farmer's Mass in B flat was performed, conducted by the composer. The orchestra consisted of twenty-five executants, and Mr. W. Gregory, the Organist of the cathedral, presided at the organ. The Mass was well rendered, the solos being excellently sung by Miss Chambers, Miss Shearstone, Mr. L. Gregory, and Mr. J. Taylor. The Rev. Father Burns sang "Cujus animam" during the Offertory. At the evening service Vespers were sung with admirable accompaniment, also Novello's "Ave Maria," Zingarelli's "Andante," and Beethoven's "Hallelujah" from The Mount of Olives. There were crowded congregations both in the morning and evening. On the 24th ult. Mr. W. T. Best, of Liverpool, opened a new Grand Organ at the Albert Hall, and played the following selection of music: Organ Sonata, No. 2, C minor (Mendelssohn); Andante, A major (H. Smart); Turkish March, "Ruins of Athens" (Beethoven); Siciliana and Fugue, G minor (Bach); Andante, with Variations and Finale (W. T. Best); Fugue, G major (S. Wesley); Bell-Rondo (G. Morandi); Overture, founded on the Austrian Hymn (C. Haslinger). The organ is a very fine instrument, containing thirty-one speaking stops, with couplers and composition pedals. Messrs. Brindley and Foster, Sheffield, are the builders. The programme of the Sacred Harmonic Society for the coming season announced that the first Concert will take place on the 31st inst., when Gounod's Redemption will be given. Mr. Charles Hallé (as Conductor) and his band have been engaged; also the following vocalists: Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Messrs. Edward Lloyd, F. King, and Blower. The other works to be performed are The Creation, Hymn of Praise, and Elijah; the vocalists being Mesdames Mary Davies, Annie Marriott, and Marian McKenzie; Messrs. Maas, Harper Kearton, Bridson, and Ludwig.

OLDHAM.—A successful Concert was held at the "Tit-Bits" Coffee Tavern, on the 17th ult., the vocalists being Miss Rooks, Miss Jones, Messrs. Vesgre, Smith, Wood, and Tordoff. The accompanists were Mr. J. Greaves and Master A. H. Greaves. Violin solos by Mr. W. H. Hall and Master D. M. Greaves were well received. Weekly Organ Recitals have been given in the Exhibition by Messrs. Mullinaux, Burnstead, Turner, Slater, and others; the Choir of St. Peter's contributing vocal music at intervals.

RICHMOND, YORKSHIRE.—An Organ Recital was given by Mr. J. H. Rooks on the new instrument at St. Mary's Church, on the 4th ult. The programme was well selected and excellently rendered.

SALISBURY.—The first Popular Concert of the season was given in the Assembly Rooms, on the 17th ult., under the direction of Mr. Augustus Aylward. The orchestra, numbering thirty-five performers, played in excellent style the Prelude to Faust, Haydn's Symphony No. 7, Overture to Poet et Paysan (Suppé), "The British Patrol," &c. The vocalists were Miss Coates, Miss Lily Mullings, and Mr. J. Allan Acott, of the Cathedral Choir, all of whom were highly successful. The room was crowded.

SANDWICH.—An excellent Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms on Thursday evening, the 13th ult., under the direction of Mr. Frank May (R.A.M.), before a select and appreciative audience. Mr. May was assisted by Miss Marguerite Hodge (M.A.), Miss E. Jones (R.A.M.), and Mr. W. H. Cummings. The whole of the artists fully maintained their high reputation in the rendering of the well-selected programme. Mr. C. T. Corke (R.A.M.) was an efficient pianist and accompanist.

SWANSCOMBE.—The Harvest Thanksgiving was held at All Saints' Church, on Sunday, the 16th ult. At the morning service hymns from "Hymns Ancient and Modern" were sung, responses by Tallis, special Psalms from "Cathedral Psalter," Te Deum (Smart), and Anthem "O Lord, how good thy Name" (Barby). The evening Service was Hatton in E. Appropriate sermons were preached by Rev. R. Hill, B.A. There was a full congregation. The voluntaries, selected from the works of Gounod, Lefebvre-Wély, &c., were admirably played by Mr. F. H. Jarvis, Organist.

TROWBRIDGE.—Mr. Millington's first Concert of the season was given at Hill's Hall, on Tuesday, the 4th ult., the artists engaged being Miss Samuelli, Miss Larkcom, Miss Damian, Mr. Percy, and Mr. Maybrick, vocalists, and Mr. S. Naylor, Conductor. The Concert was a great success.

THE HOLY CITY

A SACRED CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen."A good sound musical work this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph."The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard."The Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times."We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette."A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier."This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

Opinions of the Press on DR. ARNOLD'S COMPOSITIONS

SECOND EDITION.

AHAB

THREE SHILLINGS.

FIRST PERFORMED BY THE NATIONAL CHORAL SOCIETY, EXETER HALL, LONDON, APRIL 6, 1864.

DAILY NEWS.

"The work, regarded as the first essay of a young musician, possesses very extraordinary merit, and gives proofs of a genius capable of one day doing much greater things."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"The old joke of the vocalist who sang so badly that he was called upon to sing again was realised last night. Now that the composer has heard his work in public he will probably wish to remodel it altogether. We must object to 'Ahab,' at least in his present unregenerate state, being introduced to the frequenters of Exeter Hall. Que diable venait-il faire dans cette galère?"

THE GUARDIAN.

"Of the three new Oratorios produced within the year, we have little hesitation in according our preference to 'Ahab.' To write a fugue is one thing, to write an effective fugue is another. In more than one instance Dr. Arnold has succeeded in this; and were we to form our opinion of his powers from a hearing of the choruses we should be inclined to credit him with some of the attributes of genius. As the work of a young man, it testifies most honourably to his industry and musical attainments."

SENNACHERIB

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

COMPOSED, BY REQUEST, FOR THE GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1883.

MORNING POST.

"'Sennacherib' is a less pretentious work than 'Ahab,' but it bears equal testimony to the skill and scholarship of the composer. An orchestral prelude is descriptive of the besieged city. A bold March of the Assyrians, with a well-written chorus follows; a fine chorus, 'O Lord, Thou art great'; Hezekiah beseeches the Lord for succour, 'O Lord God of hosts'; and the Israelites in a chorus—a most expressive piece of writing, full of dramatic purpose—join in the prayer. A chorus of joy, 'The proud are robbed,' leads to a brilliant song of triumph, 'God breaketh the battles,' and the Cantata ends with a splendid chorus, 'The sword of the enemy,' in which a clever and effective vocal fugue, 'His name alone is excellent,' brings the Cantata to an end. . . . The characteristics of Dr. Arnold's work may be summed up when it is said that he prefers the older schools of music, both in form and orchestration. He is sufficiently original to show that he is no unworthy representative of the good old English School of musicians."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Some of my critical colleagues have dealt with this work in the cavalier fashion of a country squire, who drives a yokel out of the path of his horse by a contemptuous touch of the whip. I cannot follow their example. The work is a gigantic note of interrogation. It asks, in capital letters, 'Why?' and there is no answer. 'The soul in anguish' is a remarkable piece of work; it suggests a musical Laocoon—very nerve-racking, straining against an irresistible fate. The work 'Why?' however, is for Dr. Arnold's music is in some respects while to write music pretentious without reason, and is worth his without knowing it? which has hardly a redeeming feature. Let the composer consider the point and spare us more of the laboured nothings that abound throughout 'Sennacherib.'"

MUSICAL STANDARD.

"Dr. Arnold has undoubted power as a writer, and the present work has specimens of critical colleagues have dealt with this work in the cavalier fashion of a country squire, who drives a yokel out of the path of his horse by a contemptuous touch of the whip. I cannot follow their example. The work is a gigantic note of interrogation. It asks, in capital letters, 'Why?' and there is no answer. 'The soul in anguish' is a remarkable piece of work; it suggests a musical Laocoon—very nerve-racking, straining against an irresistible fate. The work 'Why?' however, is for Dr. Arnold's music is in some respects while to write music pretentious without reason, and is worth his without knowing it? which has hardly a redeeming feature. Let the composer consider the point and spare us more of the laboured nothings that abound throughout 'Sennacherib.'"

DAILY NEWS.

"The work is one of that numerous class in which laboured effort and pretentious aspiration are evidenced. The March of the Assyrians is certainly not good enough to serve for a street procession of the Salvation Army. To criticise a dramatic music in this way would be to attach undue importance to a rapid and immature production that should not have found publicity under any conditions."

THE GUARDIAN.

"Whether the Cantata will add to Dr. Arnold's fame can only be determined by future performances. The choruses are by far the better portion of the work, and of these the most effective are 'O Lord, Thou art great,' 'Save us out of his hand,' and especially the final chorus, at the words 'His name is excellent,' the subject of a fine fugue admirably worked, in which the composer shows his contrapuntal skill."

THE TIMES.

"I have to confess ignorance of Dr. Arnold's 'Ahab.' 'Sennacherib' is full of martial pomp and circumstance. If Dr. Stainer's work is above the level of 'organistic' music, Dr. Arnold's is considerably below it, his harmonies baffle all attempts at definition. . . . By mentioning that there is an effective unison passage in the chorus 'Save us out of his hand,' and that the final chorus rises to a scholarly and well developed fugue, I have stated all that can conscientiously be said in favour of Dr. Arnold's work. Such music defies criticism."

THE ECHO.

"Equally earnest with his metropolitan colleague to exhibit the result of his musical thoughts, Dr. Arnold sets about his work upon an entirely different basis with a proportionate degree of success. 'Sennacherib' is a less pretentious work than 'Ahab,' but it bears equal testimony to the skill and scholarship of the composer. Both works were well received, and their production in the metropolis will be eagerly hailed by the musical public."

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

"The music of 'Sennacherib' is a compound of crude triviality and bombast that should never have found a public hearing under any conditions. Alike in its orchestral, choral, and solo details, the Cantata is a specimen of ambitious incapacity."

FROM SHERIDAN'S "CRITIC."

"DANGLE.—You will not easily persuade me that there is no credit or importance in being at the head of a band of critics, who take upon them to decide for the whole town, whose opinion and patronage all writers solicit, and whose recommendation no manager dares refuse."

"Mrs. DANGLE.—Ridiculous! both managers and authors of the least merit laugh at your pretensions. The public is their critic, without whose fair approbation they know no play can rest upon the stage, and with whose applause they welcome such attacks as yours, and laugh at the malice of them, where they can't at the wit."

LONDON: WEEKES AND CO., 14, HANOVER STREET, W.

MAGNA CHARTA

NEW HISTORICAL CANTATA

BY

HENRY COWARD

Performed four times, and received with increasing and unequivocal marks of approval.

The Solos composed for and sung by Miss Clara Samuelli,
Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. J. Bridson, with unbounded success.

Complete, 19 Numbers, 124 Pages, 3s., 3s. 6d., and 4s. 6d.

The Sheffield and Rotherham Independent says: "The Cantata will doubtless take a high place amongst compositions of its class; if indeed it will not take a position at the head of them all. . . . There is at least one of Sheffield's sons who has musical talent sufficient to produce a work of great excellence. . . . There is individuality about the music. . . . The choruses are all tuneful as well as scientific, as are also the solos. The applause was hearty and spontaneous, many of the songs and choruses being enthusiastically encored. . . . At this performance (fourth) many were unable to find accommodation." The Sheffield Daily Telegraph says: "It (the Cantata) is an exceedingly creditable work, and speaks loudly for Mr. Coward's musical knowledge and skill as a contrapuntist. . . . It should be acknowledged that the mass of the work is original and well done. . . . The conductor might, had he been disposed, have accepted the plaudits of the audience as an encore of each number. . . . The performance was such as could not fail to make the cantata popular. . . . The Albert Hall was crowded to the doors."

The Rotherham Advertiser says: "The work is a new one and possesses unusual merit. . . . Choruses seem to be the composer's strong point, for they are all, without exception, excellent. . . . The audience, which was both large and select, was throughout very enthusiastic. . . . Mr. Coward is to be thanked for affording the public of Rotherham such a musical treat."

LONDON: J. CURWEN AND SONS, 8, WARWICK LANE, E.C.
N.B.—Conductors will be supplied with a specimen copy, post-free, for 2s. 3d., by applying to H. COWARD, Brook Hill, Sheffield. Orchestral parts on hire.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

NEW PART-SONG. PRICE 3D.

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

This Part-Song, written for, and dedicated to, the Kyrle Society, is laid out in Mr. Gaul's very best manner, and while recalling, for its beautiful effects, his elegant Part-Song, "The Silent Land," the resemblance begins and ends there. Mr. Gaul knows to the very letter the capabilities of the voices he writes for, and one is perfectly safe, even after a single experience only, in predicting a widespread popularity to "The Children's Hour."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

THEORY OF MUSIC, BOOKS I., II., III.

BY

LOUISA GIBSON

BOOK I., NEW, REVISED, POPULAR EDITION (12TH). 1S.

CLASS SINGER'S A.B.C. 6D.

(In December). Musical Examiner. 2S.

London: WEEKES and Co.; and NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

Important to all Teachers of the Pianoforte who are anxious that their Pupils should become first-class Performers.

Just published. Price 2s. 6d.

(Liberal discount to the Profession and Trade.)

BOOK II. of Herr A. HOERING'S NEW METHOD FOR THE PIANOFORTE on an entirely new principle; complete in Six Books. It is quite impossible for us to learn to play the Piano well unless we learn to understand what we play. A mere parrot-like performance may be good enough for the uneducated, but is quite unworthy of intellectual beings who strive for something higher. By the above method musical students are trained from the very beginning, in a systematic course of 120 lessons, to become thorough musicians, by learning to understand what they play at the same time as they are trained to become clever performers on the Piano. All conscientious teachers of music who are anxious about the sure and rapid progress of their pupils ought to send for a specimen copy of Book I. and a Prospectus, containing full particulars, from the Author, 7, Cambridge Road, Teddington, or may be ordered from the publishers, NOVELLO, EWER and Co., London.

A few testimonials out of many—

P—House, Spilby, June 9, 1883.

"Dear Sir,—Book I. of your New Method to hand this morning. I like it immensely, and when Book II. is ready please send it to me. I shall introduce it to my pupils, &c."

"Yours faithfully,"

N—Road, Middlebrough, July 6, 1883.

"Dear Sir,—Many thanks for sending me your Method for perusal. I must say it is an excellent method and worthy of all teachers' notice, and I will introduce it to all my pupils. You may send me another copy of Book I., for which I enclose stamps."

P—House, Margate, July 10, 1883.

"Sir,—I find your method excellent."

London, September 19, 1883.

"Dear Sir,—A few weeks ago I first became acquainted with Book I. of your method, and set myself to work to study it, and now I cannot refrain from writing a few words, to express my high opinion of its excellence. I have taught music during more than twenty years, and have constantly endeavoured to find out a better plan than the old superficial method (?) of teaching to play pieces; I have called from one and another whatever recommended itself to my judgment, and have been fairly successful. But your plan is so infinitely superior to all I have tried that I am going to adopt it at once, and only wish I had fifty pupils to be benefited by it. I think it must be some encouragement to a conscientious teacher to find that his work meets with appreciation, and therefore I have written these lines. I shall be glad to procure Book III. and the following as soon as they appear. I heartily wish you every success in your good work."

"Yours faithfully,"

"K—P—"

"Principal of a Ladies' School."

"138, High Street, Poplar, September 21, 1883."

"Dear Sir,—I enclose Postal Orders for the two books you sent. I think your system is wonderfully good and just the thing that was wanted."

"Will you please send me the other books as they come out, and you will oblige,"

"Yours truly,"

"T. GROUT,"

"Professor of the Organ."

Many similar letters from Professionals have been received, all unsolicited, bearing testimony to the excellence of the Author's plan. Important to all who are anxious to become First-class Performers on the Piano.

WHY WASTE your TIME and your MONEY by paying high fees for MUSIC LESSONS by the Old Method, by which you will never become intellectual and first-class Players, when a double Lesson for 10s. 6d. from Herr A. Hoering, 7, Cambridge Road, Teddington, either by correspondence or personally (where possible), will be sufficient to point out to the intellectual and earnest Student of Music the only correct and reasonable way for making the most rapid progress in the shortest possible time? An incredible amount of time, labour, and talent (and money too) is wasted annually with the old Method, that can never effect what it pretends to do, and thousands are misled by its ostentatious pretensions. The more mechanical Training of the fingers for brilliant execution might do for the uneducated and the indolent, but is unworthy of intellectual beings, who strive for something higher. With Herr A. Hoering's new Method, the Technical Training goes hand in hand with the intellectual Training of the Students, whereby an immense amount of time and labour is saved. Write for Prospectus, containing Terms and numerous Testimonials from pupils, to the above address.

NOTICE.—£50 worth of books, containing most valuable information on the Study of Music will be given away during three months, beginning September 1.

Those who take the above Double Lesson will receive free of charge, as a gift from the Author, the following books (value 5s. net):—

1. "Music, and How to become a good Musician." Price 1s.

2. "Pianoforte Playing to highest perfection." Price 1s.

3. And either Book I. or Book II. of Herr A. Hoering's New Method for the Pianoforte, as advertised above.

TEXT BOOK of MUSIC

BY HENRY C. BANISTER,

PROFESSOR OF HARMONY AND COMPOSITION AT THE R.A.
OF MUSIC, AT THE GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC, AND AT THE ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE FOR THE BLIND.

This Manual contains chapters on Notation, Harmony, and Counterpoint; Modulation, Rhythm, Canon, Fugue, Voices, and Instruments; together with exercises on Harmony, an Appendix of Examination Papers, and a copious Index and Glossary of Musical Terms.

"... We are bound to accord the highest praise to the work, which is so logically arranged throughout that reference to any special portion of it can be readily made. ... The complete manner in which every department of the science is explained is highly creditable to the author; for not only does the book include a treatise on Counterpoint, Canon, Fugue, and Imitation, but some very able remarks upon Form in Composition, and upon the various musical instruments."— Musical Times, April, 1873.

"... Profound knowledge and deep thought. ... Those alone who have drunk deep at the theoretical fountains of Germany ... and have yearned for a master mind to classify the recondite masses of erudition that make the search for the threads of the discourse of the German sages a mental game at hide and seek, can thoroughly appreciate the learned simplicity with which Mr. BANISTER applies his test of absolute utility to musical science."—Musical World.

Bass is presented in a concise form, as well as the principles of Harmony."—Orchestra.

A CONCISE HISTORY of MUSIC

FROM THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE CHRISTIAN ERA TO THE PRESENT TIME. FOR THE USE OF STUDENTS.

BY

Rev. H. G. BONAVIA HUNT, B.Mus.

CHRIST CHURCH, OXFORD; WARDEN OF TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

"Mr. HUNT has produced a well-arranged and really concise history of the subject with which he deals. The book is divided into three sections, the first of which is a general review of musical epochs and events, while the second presents a series of chronological tables, and the third summarises a history of the art. The student 'is warned' in the preface 'that he is not to expect what is called a readable book,' but we feel bound to say that Mr. HUNT's work is, in the proper sense of the word, far more readable than books which attempt to combine valuable information with attractiveness by tricks to which Mr. HUNT has not condescended."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. HUNT has the enviable power of giving much information in few words; he has, therefore, in this small volume, afforded valuable assistance to musical students preparing for competitive examinations, which they could not so easily obtain elsewhere."—Musical Standard.

"It only remains for us to express unqualified approval at the appearance of a work which seems to contain all that is wanted in a study of music. We beg ladies especially to make a note of the work, and to consider whether an historical study of the art ought not to go side by side with its practice."—Educational Times.

A DRAMATIC IDYL

FOR

SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

"The chorus for women's voices only, 'Gloomy lies the shore,' is not merely an attempt, but a successful adaptation of music to the spirit of the words. Not the least important part of 'Eudora' is its orchestration."—Yorkshire Post.

OFFERTORY SENTENCES

SET TO

TUNES FROM "THE HYMNARY"

BY

J. POWELL METCALFE.

Price Fourpence.

PREFACE.

There is an ever-increasing conviction that decency and order are better promoted by the singing than the saying of the Offertory Sentences—and that not only in our larger, but in our smaller churches as well. In the latter the adoption of the desired use is to a great extent prevented by the anthem character of the music employed in the usual offertory setting.

The following arrangements are more especially intended for the use of those choirs who, not being regularly trained in anthem-singing, are accustomed to rely on the tunefulness, form and compactness of the hymn-tune for aid in fully rendering the words they sing.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS:

"This is a composition of great merit, very much superior to most of the productions that come under our notice. . . . The baritone solo is charmingly written, and the accompaniment well worth studying. . . . We commend the composition to the notice of choir masters with sufficient resources to do justice to a somewhat elaborate setting of well selected words."—London Church Times.

"It contains a fine baritone solo. . . . A charming trio. . . . The entire work is skilfully and effectively written for church choir purposes."—Melbourne Argus.

OLD IRELAND

A COLLECTION OF ANCIENT IRISH MELODIES

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY THE

AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN"

THE SYMPHONIES AND ACCOMPANIMENTS BY

BERTHOLD TOURS

Price 2s. 6d.

PREFACE.

Some years ago I found, among the Petrie Collection, many rare and beautiful Irish airs, to which from time to time I wrote words. The result is the present publication.

Mr. Berthold Tours has, in his symphonies and accompaniments, done exactly what should be done with national melodies—namely, as little as possible. For such music, simplicity is the truest art.

Being myself an Irishman, my work has been a work of love; hoping to sing—not sermoneise—into the English heart a tenderer feeling towards Old Ireland. I prefer to dwell, not on the faults, but the virtues of my people; their domestic purity, their strong affections, their innate loyalty, courage, and fidelity; also, last, not least, their indomitable gaieté de cœur, which implies neither hardness, shallowness, nor selfishness of heart, yet enables the Celtic nature to tide over trouble in a way which the more sombre Saxon can hardly understand. If I can do this, I shall go on singing. Thus taking up Thomas Moore's harp, I may lay it down, as he did, with his own farewell words—

"I was but as the wind passing heedlessly over,
And all the wild sweetness I waked was thine own."

THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

BY HER MAJESTY'S ROYAL LETTERS PATENT

GRANTED TO

JOHN AINSWORTH

No. 1,110. 1882.

Members of the Musical Profession and Trade are kindly requested to apply to the Inventor and Patentee for Drawings, full and explicit Explanations, also prices of this

CAUTION—THE ONLY LEGAL—CAUTION PATENT ACTION

FOR
ATTACHING ORGAN PEDALS TO A PIANOFORTE

WHICH ACTION HE HAS, AFTER CONTINUED STUDY, BROUGHT TO PERFECTION, AND GAINED THE APPROVAL OF HER MAJESTY'S COMMISSIONERS OF PATENTS.

TESTIMONIAL.

"Mr. Ainsworth,
Dear Sir,

"It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the perfection of your Invention. I am more than satisfied with your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, and consider them worth double the money. Organists and organ students who desire to improve in the Art of Pedalling which is so essential to a good organist will do well to procure a set. I have seen no Action half so effective, and one can sit at the Piano and play 'Fixed in His everlasting seat,' or any other organ music, or organ arrangement, with the greatest pleasure. The touch and tone of pedals could not be better, and the 'Action' is, as you say, 'Absolutely free from annoyances.' They cannot be too highly recommended, as by their use rapid progress is certain.

"Believe me, sincerely yours,

"I. B. THORNTON,
"Organist, Birstall, Leeds."

J. AINSWORTH

Inventor and Patentee of the above, also Sole Proprietor, begs to draw the attention of the musical profession and trade to the fact that (having access to the finest and most improved machinery of the present day) the workmanship of Pedals and Action supplied by him is that which is sure to command favour.

PRICES OF PATENT ACTION AND ORGAN PEDALS:

A.O. Set of Straight Pedals and Patent Action,

£6 15s. 0d.

B.O. Set of Radiating Pedals and Patent Action,

£7 15s. 0d.

C.O. Set of Straight Concave Pedals and Patent Action, as recommended at the Organ Conference,

£7 15s. 0d.

Special C.O.

D.O. Patent Action only,

£4 4s. 0d.

EXTRA for IMPROVEMENT, on above prices, whereby the Organ Pedals can be Disconnected, Removed, and Replaced Instantly, 15s. 0d.

THE UNPARALLELED SUCCESS WHICH HAS ATTENDED AINSWORTH'S "THE ONLY PATENT PEDAL ACTION" IS DUE TO ITS SUPERIORITY AND THE FACT THAT IT

FULLY SUPPLIES A LONG-FELT WANT—VIZ., A PLEASANT AUXILIARY FOR ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS ABSOLUTELY FREE FROM ANNOYANCES. JAMES HACKING, Organist, Parish Church, Padiham, says, respecting the above Action and Pedals—

"Mr. Ainsworth, I was exceedingly pleased with the inspection of Pedals and Action you kindly invited me to at your establishment previous to purchasing a set for one of my pupils at Burnley. I am now glad to say my pupil is highly pleased with them, and I must confess that the Pedals are much less noiseless in working than any I have seen. The Patent Action I consider a model of perfection, and I feel sure it will establish itself as the Perfect Pedal Action for Pianofortes. Several organists have made inspection and express themselves thoroughly satisfied. The disconnecting movement is most simple and useful, and the removal of pedals being instantaneous is a very desirable accomplishment."

AINS WORTH'S ACTION AND PEDALS ARE THE BEST. PEDALS ATTACHED TO HARMONIUMS AND AMERICAN

ORGANS. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED. TRADE AND PROFESSIONAL TERMS LIBERAL. Cheques, P.O.O., &c., crossed Manchester and Salford Bank—Chorley Branch.

Letters Patent from the French Government have also been received by the Inventor.

Members of the Musical Profession and Trade are requested to apply to the Inventor and Patentee for the Drawings, full Explanations, and Prices of this the latest and most improved

PATENT ACTION

FOR

Attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte

WHICH ACTION HE HAS, AFTER CONTINUED STUDY, BROUGHT TO PERFECTION, AND GAINED THE APPROVAL OF HER MAJESTY'S COMMISSIONERS OF PATENTS.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE says:—

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. WM. CHINNOCK DYER's Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ."

"It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils."

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, is easily attached to any Pianoforte.

Set of Straight Pedals (30 Notes, C to F), with Patent Action, price £ 8.

Set of Radiating and Concave Pedals (30 Notes, C to F), with Patent Action, price 6 15

Set of Straight and Concave Pedals (30 Notes, C to F), as recommended at the Organ Conference, with Patent Action, price 7 15

Those who already have a set of Pedals can be supplied with the PATENT ACTION only, price £4 4s.

ADDRESS—WM. CHINNOCK DYER,

INVENTOR AND PATENTEE,

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

To show the popularity gained by this invention, and the way it is making in the houses of organists and students, the last Patent Action sent out previous to March 1 was numbered 2,024; thus it will be seen that the turn-out for six months as above will give a total of over 4,000 per annum.

"Mr. Sawyer's Carols are as quaint and 'full of Christmas' as any we have seen for a long time. The store is large, but it cannot be too large so long as the quality is kept up; and these six are certainly first rate."—Musical Standard.

"Praise must be awarded these fine conceptions. They display originality and good taste, on ground somewhat well trodden, and where temptations towards familiarity are not wanting. The best of the series are perhaps the pious lullaby, 'Rocking so slowly,' and the quaint strain, 'The Three wise Kings of the Rhine.'"—St. Cecilia Magazine.

ST. MARY MAGDALEN

A SACRED CANTATA.

COMPOSED FOR THE GLOUCESTER TRIENNIAL MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1883

BY JOHN STAINER.

Octavo, Paper cover, 2s.; paper boards, 2s. 6d.; scarlet cloth, 4s.
Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s.

TIMES.

"From the very opening of the well-developed prelude, it becomes apparent that the composer desires to take into account the new spirit which has come over English music of late years. His harmonies are frequently bold and uncommon, chromatic progressions prevail, the excess of fugal writing—a sure criterion of 'organist's music'—is avoided, and, most marvellous of all, a 'leit-motive' which may be said to indicate the repentant Magdalen is intoned in the introduction and skillfully used in the first part of the Cantata, although later on it is lost sight of. . . . Dr. Stainer's 'St. Mary Magdalen' does credit to its composer's talent and earnestness of purpose."

MORNING POST.

"The composer of the music has risen to the poetical demands of his subject with a fervour and earnestness not hitherto reached by him in his previous works of like kind. . . . He displays a tender regard for and a knowledge of the best uses of the voice. . . . The scoring is admirable, as well in the ensembles as in the details."

STANDARD.

"So well considered and original a composition has not emanated from the pen of an English musician of late years; and if the organist of St. Paul's has preferred to restrict his endeavours to the limited field of cantata, instead of challenging comparison with the masters of oratorio, it speaks both for his modesty and his desire to approach the goal of all writers of sacred music by sure and steady steps. . . . A charming song for contralto voice, 'Happy art thou Magdalena, speaks of hope for the penitent sinner. This number will take rank as one of the gems of the Cantata.'"

DAILY NEWS.

"Altogether, Dr. Stainer's Cantata is a welcome addition to the stores of sacred music—it is the production of an earnest thinker and a highly-trained musical artist, practical and theoretical."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Dr. Stainer may be congratulated upon writing a Cantata that in its dimensions will be suitable to amateur choral societies, and by its distinguishing features of elegance and poetic religious sentiment merits all the popularity it is likely to receive."

ATHENÆUM.

"We express our opinion unhesitatingly that as a whole 'St. Mary Magdalen' is the best work Dr. Stainer has yet written. It is far in advance of his earlier Cantata, 'The Daughter of Jairus.'"

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

"It is, perhaps, in the choral music that Dr. Stainer has succeeded most, particularly in the choruses, 'Come, ye sin-defiled,' an expressive piece of vocal harmony; 'For none of us liveth to himself,' a bright and effective closing to the first part; a highly characteristic chorus of Roman soldiers, 'Let Christ the King descend'; 'Rest in peace,' a gracefully melodious chorus, with which the second part ends; 'Awake, awake,' a good piece of plain vocal writing; 'He is not here,' a well contrasted combination of chorus and contralto solo, full of expressive melody and pleasing harmony; and the closing movement of the Cantata, 'Magdalena, past is wailing,' one of the most important divisions of the work, including some excellent contrasts between the solo quartet and the chorus, and forming an effective and appropriate climax."

LONDON: NOVELLO EWER AND CO.

THE LORD IS KING

(DOMINUS REGNAVIT)

PSALM XCVII.

COMPOSED FOR THE LEEDS TRIENNIAL MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1883, BY JOSEPH BARNBY.

Paper cover, 1s. 6d.; paper boards, 2s.

TIMES.

"It is a short but very effective composition, likely to please at once wherever it is heard. . . . Mr. Barnby's music, being popular and without difficulty, was highly relished by the audience; and the composer, who conducted his own work, received an ovation in return for the pleasure he had given."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"The Psalm has very positive merit, in applause of which it is possible for even an unsentimental critic to join. . . . Altogether the opening chorus is a fine one, and so in a less but still important degree is the closing 'Gloria.' I bracket these together because they are both of a triumphal character—in that respect having no associates elsewhere in the Psalm. The 'Gloria' consists of an orchestral march joined to a series of semi-declamatory phrases for the voices in unison or harmony. The device is not new, as every musician knows; but Mr. Barnby treats it with very great effect, and brings his work to a really exciting end."

STANDARD.

"The second of the new works expressly written for this Festival is Mr. Joseph Barnby's 97th Psalm, 'The Lord is King.' It was greeted upon its production this evening with the most flattering demonstrations of favour by a crowded audience. . . . There is abundance of evidence in Mr. Barnby's work to show that he has complete acquaintance with the resources of his craft. He writes at all times effectively for the voice, and his long practical association with the choir, which under his direction has come to be the representative London choral society, has taught him what is most grateful to the singers and pleasing to the audience."

MORNING POST.

"Mr. Joseph Barnby's setting of the 97th Psalm, which was the first piece of the concert this evening, is a very fine treatment of the subject—a Psalm of Thanksgiving. The conception is masterly, the theme is happily inspired, the vocal writing is admirable, the scoring clever, and the whole treatment spirited to a degree. There is not a weak bar from beginning to end, and the picturesque character of the design is maintained without apparent labour. The opening chorus 'The Lord is King' is bold and elevating; the baritone solo 'The heavens have declared' is set out in the spirit which regards the voice as something more than a mere orchestral instrument; and the following solo and chorus 'Sion heard of it,' with its beautiful orchestral accompaniment, is marked not only by good scholarship, but by that power which is not far from genius."

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

"The work appeals forcibly to the popular ear, and therefore is certain to be favourably received whenever it is heard."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The evening programme began with Mr. Joseph Barnby's new setting of the 97th Psalm, 'The Lord is King,' conducted by the composer. The opening chorus has a vigour and boldness that well accord with the verses dealt with; whilst the soprano solo, sung by Miss Marriott, with chorus for female voices ('Sion heard of it and rejoiced'), is appropriately light and jubilant. This is a very taking number, and it was to-night received with the heartiest applause."

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

NOVEMBER 1, 1883.

MUSIC HALLS AND MUSIC SCHOOLS.

WE are much indebted to the daily papers for the marked attention they have recently given to musical matters. Beyond the range of more solemn proceedings at provincial festivals and West-end concerts, they have wisely followed the broad question of musical education into those retreats where the art strives in an uncongenial atmosphere. The Daily News has described at length a popular concert at Shoreditch; The Standard has speculated on the purport and moral tendency of "Tiddy-fol-lol"; and the leading journal has liberally approved the forbearance of the Middlesex magistrates towards the proprietors of music halls. The Times does not think that the metropolis is to be congratulated on the success of those halls, or that no effort should be made to discourage them by the free competition of more reputable amusements. "Their entertainments," it says, "are vulgar in tone and sentiment, when they are not worse. They commonly hover on the frontier between the tolerable and the intolerable. At best the recollection of the evening's diversion leaves a bad taste in the mouth. Apart from all other evils, they have the flagrant vice of separating class from class in its amusements. The popularity of the evenings at the Fisheries Exhibition shows that classes embrace readily occasions for associating in their recreations. Unless amusements can be devised to appeal to the common tastes of various social grades, it is to be feared that music halls and the like will intensify the tendency of the nation to become two. It is much to be wished that some music hall proprietors themselves could be persuaded so to improve gradually the character of their entertainments as to render them deserving of a less exclusive patronage. The existence of a music hall testifies that the people have ears and minds to be amused. Its frequenters take the pastime it offers because they can afford nothing more elevated. Probably they would go still more eagerly to the opera if they could pay its prices like their betters."

Agreeing with the general sense of the remarks made by the Times, we think it should be more universally understood than it appears to be that music halls are not musical institutions and are not patronised by amateurs of music. The usual patrons of music halls are as able as "their betters" to pay the price for a seat at the opera. Indeed it is "their betters" who, quite as much as they do, prefer the music hall to the opera, and for the same reasons. They have, as a rule, no differentiated æsthetic leanings, and they prefer the free and easy manners of the music hall to the restraints of the theatre; and if allowed to smoke, and released from the crowded pit and that relic of past savagery, the bottled stout—orange—gingerbeer-woman, they would perhaps as lief listen to an operetta as stare at comic singers and acrobats. Apart from names, the only similarity that exists in the case of music and music halls is that the latter institutions, in common with the Royal Academy of Music, have to be specially licensed; the fruit of an "ungodly jumble" in the notions of our betters in regard to art and legislation. All that can be done is done by legislation to lower the tone of the music hall. Words and gestures enjoy an absurd freedom, or at most are subject to an annual audit by a bench of magistrates, whilst a restraint not less absurd is placed on the class of performances in which any approach to the dramatic is prohibited. Between the kind of entertainment usually given at music halls and at concerts that to be really good must necessarily be very expensive, there is positively nothing left, if we are to exclude scenery and dialogue, but fish-tanks and penny readings, or those wholesome and mildly humorous songs of our fathers, to which nobody now would listen. Great buildings, within the precincts of London itself, and with electric lights, and with or without fish, might be made to pay, because in our climate they supply the place of outdoor entertainments found in perfection in other capitals. But good music of itself will only draw musical people—a limited class. To appreciate good music or good pictures, some general cultivation at least is necessary; although it is not essential that we should daub canvas or torture musical instruments. The majority will find some pleasure in a military band, and above all a brass band, and in the melody of Haydn's symphonies, or in the pathos of Handel's songs, and the mere sound of the fiddles pleases them; but what they most appreciate is the alliance of simple poetry, in their own language, with music. To tell them that they appreciate instrumental music is gross flattery; or the compliment can only be intended for the few amongst them who leaven the behaviour of the rest. Were it otherwise it would be of very little use to trouble ourselves about music schools, one of the objects of which is to create a finer taste in the public. By all means accustom the ears of the crowd to good military music, and divest our legislation of every shred of protection in favour of the theatres, to the injury of the music halls, which might nurse the "vaudeville," that was the mother—such as she was—of a brilliant progeny on the Continental musical stage; but the only effective instrument of education is the State or municipal school. We have seen of late nothing so important or so encouraging as the succinct report given in the Times of the 11th ult., of a "rate supported school of music" at Watford. It is the first offspring, we are told, of local action taken under the Public Libraries Act, which as far as England is concerned does not provide for the management, regulation, and control of schools of music. Nevertheless, by a liberal interpretation of the term "schools for science and art," the local authorities and ratepayers of Watford have concluded in recognising music as an art or a science, or both. A connecting link between the Watford School and the Royal College of Music is formed by the latter institution having in compliance with a request from the managing Committee at Watford appointed one of its professors to act as examiner.

The course of instruction at the Watford School is divided into three stages—elementary, intermediate, and advanced—and the examinations in each stage refer to both the theory and the practice of music. Besides instruction in pianoforte and organ playing, there are classes for the violin, cornet, &c., and an orchestral class is in course of formation. There are upwards of six scholarships and exhibitions, which are annually competed for by the students. In 1880 there were 245 students, and for the session 1882-83, lately concluded, there were 453 students. Besides the "term concerts," popular concerts for the working classes were organised during the winter months by the energetic hon. secretary, Miss Alice Brooks, and the attendance at these last-named concerts was large, the demand for tickets being always in excess of the supply.

The examiner (Dr. Hubert Parry) appointed by the Royal College of Music speaks in high terms of the successful results shown in every department of the school. The fees for instruction range from 2s. 6d. to three guineas per session of ten weeks, and the receipts from these and from the subscriptions of vice-presidents place the financial condition and prospects of the school on a most satisfactory footing.

The Times seems to think that were music to be placed on the list of arts and sciences in which examinations are held, and payment on results granted by the Science and Art Department, an impulse would be given to more general and systematic efforts than is now the rule on the part of municipal and other local bodies throughout the kingdom. That is so; and still there are many prejudices to overcome before the true status of music is recognised in the educational departments of the Government, and before the national jealousy of centralisation is subdued. The people of Watford, however, seem to understand the question well, and have set an example that should lead to important results. They have relied on self-help and local initiation, whilst calling in the aid of the State or municipality precisely at the point where private benevolence or individual effort is neither sufficient nor permanent. In appealing to the Royal College of Music, that is not a State Institution but at present stands in the place of one, they have rightly appreciated the province of a central authority, which is not to monopolise or tyrannise, but to set in united motion all the parts of a complex machinery, so that they may act in concert for the common benefit. It is not our business to discuss the legality of the local action at Watford, but it certainly appears to be within the terms "Science and Art" employed in the Public Libraries Act. We think that if the ratepayers and municipalities of other places in England quickly follow the bold move at Watford, legal ambiguities will either be interpreted in their favour and in support of an efficient means of musical education, or with a similar object the Act will be altered in form and spirit by the legislature. Nothing will be done, nothing will be altered on behalf of music unless the municipalities stir themselves and signify their pleasure by imitating the example of Watford.

"DAS WOHLTEMPEIRTE CLAVIER."*

By J. S. SHEDLOCK, B.A.

THE various readings in the manuscripts of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier" naturally led to various readings in the many publications of the work. Each editor made the best of the material which lay at his disposal, and whenever a passage in the copies did not agree, selected the one which appeared to him to conform most to the wishes and intentions of the composer. Forkel, as we have already seen, possessed documents which he considered of great, nay paramount, importance in fixing the form of some of the Preludes. In reading the various editions of Haydn's, Mozart's, or Beethoven's works, when we come across differences in the text we feel sure that all the versions cannot be right. Faults arise sometimes through the carelessness of the printer; and sometimes editors venture on their own authority to alter a passage. An examination of the autograph, when possible, would in most cases decide the matter; we say in most cases, for instances could be given when even this would fail to solve the difficulty. With the "Wohltemperirte Clavier," however, this plan is not available. Of the second part, the autograph, with the exception of one Fugue, is lost: of the first we have two, or perhaps three, autographs more or less complete; but they all differ. It might appear at first sight as though the perusal of the various readings and alterations would prove merely an agreeable pastime or an intellectual amusement; but when Bach changed a note, a figure, or even a phrase, it was the result of careful and often profound meditation. An examination, therefore, of the changes which he made would help us better to understand the meaning of the music; to sit, as it were, at the feet of Bach and hear him expound and illustrate the laws of harmony and counterpoint. And even when the alterations (as in the copies) are not Bach's own, they are often ingenious and interesting. Let us consider for a moment the question of consecutive fifths and octaves. Forkel tells us that Bach at times was most particular about consecutives, even in the middle parts; while at other times he did not hesitate to employ them between extreme parts if he considered they sounded well. Before proceeding to notice some passages on this and other points, we must remind our readers that in order to save space we are attempting to do without music type, so that our remarks can only be intelligible to those who are willing to take the trouble to turn to the passages referred to. In the Wolfenbüttel and Bach Society editions every fifth bar of Preludes and Fugues is numbered, so that the passages can easily be found. In quoting from the Preludes in which the number of bars differs in the two editions we shall give exact indications.

If we turn to bar 26 of Fugue 9 (Part I.), take away the tie in the bass from the d of the previous bar, and change the second d into e, we shall have the passage as Bach altered it. At least, so says Forkel. His tale is a curious one; here is what he tells us about the bar in his book: "I regret to this hour that in looking over the copy from which the Hoffmeister and Kühnelsehe edition was engraved I was weak-minded enough, merely on account of this octave, which for euphony's sake is necessary, to allow Bach's first reading to remain: it is certainly according to rule, but stiff. In the newer reading the melody in all three parts is purer, simpler, more spontaneous. Which is better." This quotation is interesting, for it touches on the question of octaves between extreme parts; and the passage thus altered is only to be found in the Forkel manuscript of the first part, which is now in the Royal Library of Berlin.

With regard to fifths in middle parts, let us look at bar 41 of the 12th Fugue (part I.). There are two readings for the alto part: in the one the minim f goes to c, in the other to e. By the first the consecutive fifths between alto and tenor are avoided, but the passage is more difficult to play: excepting by performers with large hands, the c must be taken with the left hand, which has already enough to attend to, with the tenor (which has subject) and bass parts. The first reading is that of Bach, the second a corrected reading in a manuscript in the Berlin Library. Bach seems to have sacrificed the comfort of the player in order to avoid writing down these two

* In our first article we expressed our belief that there was no Kollmann edition of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier," although Hilgenfeldt speaks of one in his Biography of Bach. Dr. Westbrook has kindly called our attention to the "Quarterly Musical Register, written and collected by A. F. C. Kollmann," January 1, 1812, in which occurs the following passage referring to the "Wohltemperirte Clavier": "But as numerous copies of the three first editions were imported into England, it made Mr. Kollmann relinquish his intended edition, and attempt those twelve Annalised Fugues of his own, which he has lately published."

We would also mention that, in speaking of Forkel, we stated that he knew Emanuel Bach personally. In place of last word should be read intimately. Forkel was personally acquainted with both the sons, Friedemann and Emanuel.

fifths, although the second one was imperfect.* Bach's care, nay fastidiousness, in this matter should be noticed in these days of liberty and licence. We would quote two more passages which show how careful the composer was to remove any weakness resulting from the empty octave sound. In the C sharp minor Fugue (part I.), bar 41, the first voice was originally written with b dotted minim, followed by b crotchet. The little figure of four quavers in the latter half of the bar, as it now stands, is a great improvement. The other passage is in bar 5 of Prelude 13 (part I.), and similar ones in bars 14, 17, and 29. In some editions there is a tie between the last semiquaver of the third group and the first of the fourth group, in each of these bars. Had Bach intended the semiquaver of the fourth group not to be sounded he would surely not have altered the form of writing which he used in bars 2, 3, and 4. He seems to have made a change here to avoid the empty octave sound. In bar 5, for example, the e in the bass would be followed (in the case of tied notes) by the demisemiquaver e in the treble. The second e being struck makes the harmony richer. It should be remarked that the notes are tied in the autograph No. 7, but many alterations have been made in this copy by a strange hand, so there is no certainty that Bach added the ties. Bach respected rules, but at the same time was no slave to them. In the matter of false relation he was generally very bold, as we may see in the oft-quoted passage bars 17, 18, and 19 of Fugue 2 (Part I.), and also in bars 29 and 30 of the C sharp minor Prelude in the same book (bars 27-28 in the Wolfenbüttel edition, but here the last b in the bass in bar 27 is incorrectly sharpened). Yet occasionally he hesitated. In bar 18 of the 16th Prelude (Part I.) he boldly writes the e natural against the minim e flat; yet in bar 34 of Prelude 7 (Part I.) he originally wrote e natural for the eighth semiquaver, but afterwards altered it to g, although in so doing he spoilt the figure.

There are many interesting points to notice with regard to the matter of false relation, but we must pass on to speak of the orthography of the autographs.

When Bach wrote an accidental before a note, it only served for that note, and not, as in modern music, for every repetition of it throughout the bar. The only exception occurred when the note was repeated without any intervening one. Afterwards, when the modern style came into fashion, Bach's very notes were copied, but wrongly interpreted. This of course gave rise to much confusion. Bars 8 and 9 of Prelude 9 (Part I.) will afford an apt illustration. In the first printed edition (Nägeli's) the a in the last triplet of bar 8 had no natural placed before it, although not having any sharp before it in the autograph it was meant to be natural (No. 1). Other editors fell into the same error but were bolder than Nägeli, and ventured to change the a in the second triplet of the next bar into a sharp. They saw that in the 9th bar the bass part of bar 8 was imitated, and thought to set matters right by making the two parts correspond. Having mistaken the first, they committed a fresh fault in the second. A similar misunderstanding has arisen in bars 14 and 15 of Fugue 4 in the second book. There is another bar in which this question of orthography plays an important part. In the 3rd bar of the 3rd Fugue the two f double sharps must have attracted the notice of all careful players. They are very harsh, but are clearly indicated in autograph No. 1. Yet there is strong evidence in favour of the f double sharp being used for the first time at the end of bar 4. There is a manuscript of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier" (B. G., Preface No. 8) in the Royal Library at Berlin, which in the first part agrees in a most remarkable manner with the autograph No. 7. No. 8 gives the third bar without the double sharp; there is no trace of any erasure, and therefore it is most probably a faithful copy of what No. 7 contained. We have already mentioned that some sheets of this autograph are missing: it commences only with the latter part of the C sharp Fugue. And the differences between No. 1 and No. 7 indicate similar minute and delicate alterations. We will mention two passages which show in a special manner how Bach tried the effect resulting from the alteration of a single note. The two examples are, of course, from the first part. In Fugue 10, bar 21, No. 1 has g sharp in the treble, but No. 7 g natural. In Fugue 18, bar 32, where the tenor part has the theme, the b is sharpened in No. 1 but natural in No. 7. As this latter passage is one by no means easy to analyse, we would notice another interesting variation in the Zurich autograph. Here the b is sharpened, and the f sharp, second quaver in the bass, turned into e natural and tied, of course, to an e semiquaver. We have only to note the changes, and not to settle which of the various readings is the best.

Bar 40 of the tenth Fugue (Part I.) presents some little difficulty. The g in the third group of semiquavers in the right hand is natural according to the orthography of the autographs; but some of the copies place a sharp before it. The autographs have, however, an unnecessary sharp before the last note f in the bar (right hand); and hence there is some little uncertainty as to the correct reading of the passage. Was the sharp perchance intended for the g? Two important copies and Nägeli's edition have the g sharpened.

There is strong reason for believing that there are occasional slips of the pen in the autograph No. 1. In the C sharp minor Fugue, bar 41, the sixth quaver in the bass ought certainly to be a sharp. Yet it is not so marked in No. 1. Franz Kroll, though he adopts the reading of this autograph as the text of the first part of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier" in the Bach Gesellschaft edition, has here written a sharp. (By way of digression, we may mention that the first a in the next bar can be either a or a sharp: if the latter be adopted the two f's of the middle part must be read with double sharps.) In bar 20 of Prelude 7 (Part I.) the second quaver in the tenor is evidently meant to be a natural, although not so marked either in No. 1 or any of the manuscripts.

Another point to which we would refer is Bach's use of the dot. It does not in all cases indicate that the length of a note is to be increased one half. Take, for example, Fugue 5 (Part I.). In bar 3 if the dot after the quaver b is of the value of a semiquaver, the three following demisemiquavers must be read as a triplet, and indeed they are thus marked in some editions. In the autographs and most manuscripts triplets are clearly indicated by the figure 3; but not a single manuscript has that figure over this group of notes; the dot here then is of the value of a demisemiquaver. In the same Fugue there is another bar (22) where the dot in the third quarter of the bar if taken as a semiquaver causes some ugly consecutives between alto and bass. But if the dot be taken as of the value of a double dot the chord b will be played with the last demisemiquaver and the awkward progression avoided. It is marked as a double dot in the Kroll-Peters edition. In the first example the dot was taken at less, in the present one at more than its exact value. The dot was used with a certain amount of freedom in Bach's time. Leopold Mozart refers to the matter in his "Violinschule": "It would be well if this prolongation of the dot were to be made very definite and exact; I for my part have often made it so, and have expressed my intention by means of two dots, with a proportional shortening of the next following note." With reference to this dot question we would notice bar 29 (B.G. edition) of Prelude 8. Here no triplet is intended; but it is difficult to understand why Bach should have adopted a different mode of expressing his thoughts from that to be found in bars 3, 30, and 31. In Prelude 13 of the second part we have another illustration of the dot being of less value than half the note preceding it: the group of three demisemiquavers is not a triplet.

* Another interesting example of Bach's strictness is to be found in the second bar of Prelude 18 (Part I.). In autographs Nos. 1 and 7 the b at the beginning of the bar has two stems, the lower one being that of a crotchet. In the Zurich autograph, however, this is changed into a quaver; and thus even the appearance of consecutives between alto and bass is avoided.

We do not for one moment wish to lead our readers to imagine that we have examined and compared the various autographs and manuscripts of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier." Most of our information has been derived from the valuable Appendix in the volume of the Bach Gesellschaft containing this work. Not only are the principal variations given, but often explanatory notes which are both instructive and interesting. The plan of writing out the Fugues in open score has been often recommended, but in some of them the course of each part is by no means clear; and the help given in this Appendix is extremely valuable, especially in Fugues 4, 9, and 22 of the first part. As a short example of the aid afforded, we would call attention to Fugue 2 in the second part. It is often spoken of as in three parts until bar 19, when the bass enters as fourth part with the theme in augmentation. But Franz Kroll points out that the tenor part stops at bar 6; that the bass part takes up the answer to the theme in bar 7, continuing till bar 14. The tenor part then takes its place until bar 19, when all four parts are heard together. If we wrote the first nineteen bars only in three parts we should have in the exposition a subject followed by the answer in the same part.

We have entered into matters of minute detail, but feel sure that we have touched upon questions which cannot fail to interest all lovers of Bach's music. The forty-eight Preludes and Fugues have been played, analysed, and admired by all great musicians since Bach's time. They are the study of a life-time. One never grows tired of them—fresh examination reveals new beauties; and Schumann was right when he said "Let 'Das Wohltemperirte Clavier' be thy daily bread."

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XIII.—CHERUBINI (continued from page 538).

In the course of his interesting and valuable biography of Cherubini, M. Arthur Pougin regards the master's appointment to the King's Chapel as the beginning of a new stage in his career, and pauses therefore to deal with certain matters important to a fair understanding of his character. We gladly pause, likewise, because the French writer furnishes us with some really important information on a point as to which considerable misapprehension may prevail. Cherubini is frequently spoken of as the "stern Florentine," and set down as a hard, uncouth man, with few loves and many hates. For this Berlioz is partly responsible, through holding up the Italian musician to ridicule and contempt in his famous autobiography. It is remembered against Cherubini, moreover, that he refused or neglected to answer Beethoven when written to regarding the Missa solennis in D, while not a few stories are current, all tending to the same unfavourable conclusion. We do not dispute the existence of some ground for the prevailing idea. Cherubini had a temper like most men, and was particularly impatient of incompetence and presumption. His manner, too, was wanting in French polish, and the occasions were many in which he spoke the truth without periphrasis. Yet there is ample evidence to prove that he had a kind and gentle heart—that he was capable of loving and, therefore, obtained the love of others. We now ask the reader to accept some portion of the testimony in question.

Cherubini's intimacy with Méhul has already appeared in the course of these papers. The terms in which he dedicated his "Medée" to the composer of "Joseph," and in which, when writing to his wife from London, he referred to his friend and colleague, cannot have escaped observation. It will now be seen how anxiously he could, with true paternal solicitude, safeguard the interests of a humble student. On one occasion an Overture by Berton was to be performed at the Institute, together with a Cantata written by one of Cherubini's pupils. Berton, resolved to make a noise if nothing else, applied to Cherubini for the loan of the big drum, cymbals, and triangles belonging to the Conservatoire, and, no doubt, the master's first impulse was to consent, as a matter of course. That impulse he resisted, however, by extreme thoughtfulness and circumspection, which led him to address Berton thus:

"Will you allow me to make an observation with regard to this matter? It is this: I think it out of place to employ these instruments within the walls of the Institute, especially when the composition they have to accompany is by an academical. I say nothing of the uproar such a combination will produce, but I may remark that your Overture will crush the Cantata of the poor student who comes afterwards, and his feeble powers will not be able to struggle against it. I defend my pupil, as I would yours under similar circumstances. Thus, my dear Berton, for all these reasons I beg you to give up the notion of having the Overture performed by military instruments. There is no scarcity of beautiful Overtures of your composition, amongst which you might find a preferable one. I think you will feel the force of my argument and kindly appreciate it."

This letter speaks volumes for Cherubini's generous nature. It shows us the master refusing his friend a favour, and running the risk of giving him umbrage entirely out of consideration for an obscure youth, whose name, even, has not come down to us.

Let us now see what was the conduct of the "grim Florentine" in relation to Lesueur when that composer was timorously making his first essay as a writer for the stage. Happening one day to be at the Théâtre Feydeau when Lesueur was rehearsing his initial opera, the master's attention became attracted by the inexperience and embarrassment of the composer, who, unacquainted with stage business, was permitting serious faults to pass uncorrected. For a while Cherubini looked on impatiently, and then, starting up, said, "You can write music, but you do not know how to make them perform it." With these words he took the bâton and conducted the rehearsal to its end, earning in a few minutes Lesueur's everlasting gratitude. After like manner did he behave to Boieldieu, who himself tells a remarkable story of an encounter with Cherubini during the run of "Le Calife de Bagdad":

"Meeting me in one of the corridors of the theatre, Cherubini seized hold of me by my coat-collar and said, with his somewhat rough frankness, 'Unhappy wretch, are you not ashamed to achieve so great a success and do so little to deserve it?' I remained stupefied at his words—I might well have been so at even less—and could find nothing to say in reply. But after Cherubini had left me, feeling how much reason there was in his reproach, I lost no time in going to him and asking his advice. It was settled that he should take me with him to the country-house of Saint-Just, the writer of my librettos, including the libretto of 'Le Calife,' and that he should there make me have an unpleasant time of it. I did so for two seasons. After that I knew what I was about. But for Cherubini I should probably still be ignorant that science in no way detracts from expression."

This event was the beginning of a long and intimate connection between the composers. Cherubini never abated his interest in Boieldieu's fortunes, and admitted him to all the privileges of close friendship, even to that of pointing out faults. It is said of the Italian master that he rarely met a request with other than refusal. This was his habit, and contributed no little to give him a reputation for unkindness. Strangers took the "No" as final, and went away calling him a churl. Those, however, who knew the man asked a second time, and then the "No" was, more often than otherwise, changed to "Yes." Boieldieu studied this curious part of his friend's character to considerable advantage, and could obtain from him almost anything he wished. But he could not break Cherubini's habit of saying "No" to a first application, and one day, patience giving way a little, he remarked, "Oh! my dear Cherubini, what a pity your second impulse never precedes your first! It would be so agreeable for those who have business with you if it did!"

The theorist, Catel, was another who benefited by the kind heart which throbbed under Cherubini's rough exterior. He published his famous "Treatise on Harmony" while still a very young man, but he was not too young for the great master's notice. Cherubini actually wrote an article on the book, in which he said: "It so reconciles them (the different systems of the schools) with each other that its usefulness and merit cannot be contested, save by the self-sufficiency of prejudice, by jealousy or bad faith. Citizen Catel has proved that youth is no obstacle to the production of what appears beyond its strength, experience, meditation and natural talent, improved by study, have brought with them the ripeness of age before the usual time, and every one who judges men and things impartially will see in Citizen Catel an artist who will do his country honour, and in his Treatise a work which will at last be generally adopted." What such testimony as this, coming from such a quarter, was worth to the young musician is easily imagined. Let us turn now to a remarkable proof of Cherubini's generosity. Grétry's death, in 1813, vacated a chair at the Institute, and among the candidates who aspired to fill it was Monsigny, then a man of eighty-five, who had produced nothing for forty years. It was, perhaps, not unnatural that the members of the Institute inclined to prefer Cherubini, a great and active master, to the aged composer whom the world had almost forgotten. At any rate, some of them openly talked of putting up the Florentine as a candidate. Hearing of this, Cherubini wrote a noble letter, saying: "Not wishing to oppose an artist of M. Monsigny's merit and age, I would beg those members of the fourth class who may intend giving me their suffrages to unite them for the Nestor of French composers, in order that he may be elected as he deserves to be—unanimously." The master saw his wish gratified, and old Monsigny lived several years to enjoy the distinction he had coveted for half-a-century.

M. Pouglin brings forward many other instances of Cherubini's goodness and genuine nobility, but those to which the reader's attention has been directed amply suffice for agreement with the French biographer when he says: "Cherubini was, therefore, always ready to be useful or agreeable to his colleagues, and constantly employed, either in a quiet manner or before the eyes of the public, in helping them, in assisting them in their career, their efforts, and even the completion of their education. If the abruptness, the quasi-brutality for which he was afterwards reproached, and which resulted from his state of health and his continual condition of over nervous excitement, was, indeed, one of the disagreeable elements in his character, we must allow that he amply redeemed the slight drawbacks attached to it by acts so full of generosity and loyalty. Eager to do good, ignorant of what envy or jealousy was, Cherubini was always ready when a service had to be done, and there was perhaps not a single one among his colleagues who had not cause to be grateful to him for something or other, and reason to consider himself lucky in having met him on his path. We know that Spontini, whose admirable genius was seconded only by an education which unfortunately was very incomplete, would, without Cherubini, probably never have mastered the inextricable confusion of the instrumentation in 'La Vestale,' and we remember the signal service Cherubini did Hummel by making known in Paris the latter's music, which he brought back with him from Vienna."

It is now time to look at Cherubini in his ordinary relations with eminent contemporaries—those who did not need his friendly services, but only desired his friendship. Rossini was one of these, and, when passing through Paris to London in 1823, he did not fail to call upon his illustrious countryman, whom he had never met. The story of their interview has thus been told:

"He (Rossini) went to the residence of Cherubini, and, having been ushered into the drawing-room, sat down at the piano, while waiting for the master of the place, and struck up at the top of his voice—he had a superb one—an air from 'Giulio Sabino,' one of Cherubini's earliest Italian operas, which Rossini had learnt in his youth from the very artist who created the part. Cherubini came in while he was singing, and said, not without some slight emotion, 'Che, che, che, so you know that air, do you?' 'Yes, I do, Maestro, as you perceive.' 'And where the deuce did you hear it, for it is a very long time since it used to be played?' 'Oh!' replied Rossini, carrying out his graceful compliment, 'I heard it in the streets, where it is still sung; and, having a good memory, I have retained it.' Cherubini was delighted and they were quickly friends."

When Rossini afterwards settled in Paris these masters formed a close intimacy, though, perhaps, no two men were ever more unlike. Rossini became a frequent visitor at the Florentine's house, and, with characteristic freedom, did not scruple sometimes to take his austere countryman to task. On one occasion he even made bold to interfere in Cherubini's family arrangements. The elder master had a daughter, Zenobia, to whose marriage with an Italian diplomat he was strongly averse. Rossini naturally took the girl's part, and, one day at dinner, urged her father to sanction the union.

"'Che, che, che,' said Cherubini, 'you will kill me if you talk like that.' 'Confound it,' replied Rossini, 'you have nothing. You find an idiot ready to take your daughter without a dowry, without an outfit, without anything, and yet you turn up your nose at him. It is absurd.' 'Che, che, che, I will not allow any one to speak to me in that manner,' answered Cherubini, getting angry. 'Oh! you will not frighten me,' said Rossini laughing. 'You possess more talent than I do, that is well known; but my pizzicati are worth more than all your fugues, look you.'

Cherubini tolerated and, in his heart, even enjoyed the brilliant sallies of his fascinating countryman. Hence the pleasure he always seemed to find in Rossini's company, and the genuine affection which found vent when "Guillaume Tell" was produced. Cherubini was one of those who attended Habeneck's orchestra from the theatre to Rossini's house for the purpose of serenading him, and he it was who headed a deputation to present the successful composer with a gold wreath. The two men fell into each other's arms and embraced with effusion. That Rossini ardently reciprocated his friend's feeling, a thousand circumstances go to prove, one especially of a date as recent as 1855. In that year the master discovered a portrait of Cherubini in a broker's shop. It represented him as a young man, and was a charming picture, though no one could tell anything about its history. Rossini bought it, of course, and sent a photograph copy to Madame Cherubini with a note saying: "Here is the portrait of the great man, who is still as young in your heart as he is in my mind. Kindly accept it as a tender memento from your affectionate G. Rossini." The portrait thus presented vanished after Madame Cherubini's death and cannot now be found, though M. Pougin believes that some Englishman secured it for a good round sum.

Ferdinand Hiller was another of Cherubini's visitors, and has given to the world a most interesting account of the master as he found him—an account which may fairly be set against the remarks made on the same subject by Mendelssohn in the days of his youth. Hiller thus describes the Italian master's personal appearance:

"I was somewhat disappointed on entering his study to find a small spare man. But the disappointment was only momentary. There was a penetrating light in his eyes; tufts of white hair fringed his head, which was comparatively majestic; and his features, though somewhat impaired by age, still showed traces of almost regular beauty. His general appearance was that of a distinguished statesman rather than a musical composer. This may be seen in the magnificent portrait by Ingres, which seems not so much painted as sculptured in colours, and which reproduces Cherubini's face with wonderful truth."

The German musician then goes on to give a curious confirmation of what has already been said regarding Cherubini's habit of refusing requests and then granting them.

"He was particularly attached to the letter of the law, and his usual reply, 'It cannot be done,' has become, so to speak, proverbial. At the beginning of our acquaintanceship I had occasion to find, however, that there was a kind heart under this disagreeable form. I had asked leave to take home two volumes from the Conservatoire library, and received as answer 'It cannot be done; it is not allowed.' It was useless to press my request, so I changed the conversation; but as I was bidding him good-bye he said, 'What did you want to borrow from our library?' When I replied that it was a collection of Palestrina's motetts, the old gentleman answered, in an almost confidential tone, 'I will send for them for myself. In this manner you can have them.' . . . One favour which he granted me a few days only before I left Paris, and still more the manner in which it was granted, are too characteristic not to be recorded here. I asked him to give me one of his manuscripts. The last Sunday I spent in Paris he invited me to dine with his family, and before we sat down to table handed me two scores, begging me to choose one of them. Without examining them very attentively I seized on the more bulky of the two, and was about putting it in my pocket when the well-known 'It cannot be done' sounded in my ears. It appears that the manuscripts had their proper place, duly marked according to the letter and number affixed to them, in his library, and that they could not be removed at any price. On the following Tuesday, however, I received a copy of the score I had chosen (a fine 'Agnus Dei') which the indefatigable old gentleman had made in two days, with a trembling hand but with the greatest clearness and neatness. Some letters I afterwards received from him are written in terms of such tender kindness that it is impossible to recognise in them the severe director with his 'It cannot be done.' I feel certain that he would never have accustomed himself, except in writing, to employ the expressions he used in his letters to me."

Hiller thus sums up the master's character:

"Excellent and honourable in all his actions, and, to the very bottom of his heart, of a kindly and well-nigh naïf nature, his most friendly words and acts were tinged with a kind of bitterness. It was evident that he felt no anxiety as to whether he himself or his music was agreeable. Endowed with clear intelligence and sound judgment, never did he soften the harshness of his remarks by any gentle expression. Like the mild chestnut tree, his very good nature had a rough bark."

How superficially must the young Mendelssohn have judged the master when he said: "You would never have imagined a man could be a great composer without possessing sensibility, heart, or any other kind of sentiment, whatever its name might be. Well, I declare to you that with Cherubini everything comes from the brain alone."

With Auber, Cherubini's relations were as intimate as with Rossini. He had made the brilliant Frenchman's acquaintance when as yet he was "about town," with fine prospects from his father, and only taking up music in an amateurish sort of way for personal amusement. It was under these circumstances that the two men became familiar, the elder showing towards the younger an almost paternal regard. Presently Auber's father died without leaving the expected fortune, and the son, gravely perplexed, went to Cherubini for advice. "The matter is very simple," said the Florentine; "you are a musician; you have ideas: work." "That is very easily said," replied Auber; "but I am not accustomed to it, and it is not to my taste." "Very well," was the retort, "then throw yourself out of the window." This was not to the Frenchman's taste either, and in the end he began taking lessons of his friend—at the age of thirty-five!—with what results all the world knows. Halévy was another pupil of the great master, and not only a pupil but a familiar friend, for whom there were always an open door and a place at table. In return, Halévy's love was as that of a son. At Cherubini's funeral he acted as a pall-bearer—"large tears were coursing down his cheeks, and at each roll of the funeral drums, at each place of the instruments singing the sublime 'Requiem' which accompanied the great artist's remains, he staggered as though struck to the heart." We are indebted to Halévy for a fine glimpse of Cherubini's character as it took shape in his last days, when the proud spirit kept old age and death at arm's length till the last moment. With the subjoined quotation we end our illustrations of the master's personal traits:

"It was on March 15, 1842, that he succumbed, bowed down by years, but struggling courageously against death, as up to that supreme day he had struggled courageously against old age, which had in consequence respected him. He had preserved all his energy of will, all his distinctness of judgment, all his clearness of intelligence. . . . He repelled old age out of pride, the cause of his force and resistance. His clear-sighted genius kept watch with too much zeal and inquietude for him not to perceive the enemy's persevering attacks, and not to feel its cold blows, knowing very well he would be vanquished the day on which he was not the stronger. Men of this stamp, who esteem naught in life but intelligence, live on fighting to the end and die fully armed. 'I am beginning to get old!' he said to me one day. He was then more than eighty. These words, which would have been commonplace coming from other lips, struck me grievously proceeding from his, and filled me with sadness. I saw in them the presentiment and symptom of approaching dissolution. For me his death began on that day. Three months later he was no more. His life was, therefore, exempt from the period of trouble and enfeeblement in which the faculties are obscured and the gleams of the soul extinguished—a slow and painful state of transition, during which death is installed. . . . One might almost fancy that the noble Muse, whom the brush of Ingres imagined and placed by the composer's side, sustained him down to the last day with her vigorous hand, and preserved him from the peril surrounding vulgar lives."

PROFESSOR MACFARREN ON RICHARD WAGNER.

By F. CORDER.

PROFESSOR SIR GEORGE MACFARREN'S address to the students of the Royal Academy of Music this term seems to call for comment. Sir George has devoted nearly the whole of his speech to an exposition of his well-known antagonism to Richard Wagner's music, yet each statement made is so qualified by that which follows that at least no one can accuse the esteemed speaker of "making an attack" on Wagner. Yet, if translated from platform language into plain English, this address would be a very decided attack indeed. It is a curious fact that Wagner's music has been the cause of more acrimonious dispute and ill-feeling than that of all the other great composers put together, the reason being, of course, the difficulty of criticising that which defies precedent and comparison with recognised standards. The objections stated by Sir George Macfarren to the theories and works of the Bayreuth master are not numerous, but they are tolerably definite. Let us examine them in detail.

The first is rather weak and exaggerated: "In the total unlikeliness to precedent in his frequent choice of subjects, in his employment of monsters and preternatural beings, which in many instances placed his serious works on a parallel with the openings of our comic pantomimes."

This is in allusion to the unfortunate dragon in "Siegfried," an incident which could hardly have been missed without spoiling the story. As to the preternatural beings, Wagner is neither the first nor the last composer to prefer subjects dealing with the supernatural. Most people, we venture to think, instinctively feel the ideal state of things in opera better suited to such subjects than to dramas of modern life.

"In other cases his prolongation of dramatic situation beyond the possibilities of life, and so withdrawing the vital principles of dramatic effect."

The meaning here is not very clear, but surely one has little to do with the possibilities on the operatic stage, and even in the spoken drama is not actual duration of time entirely disregarded? As to the following accusation, that Wagner keeps the stage waiting for several minutes sometimes, we ourselves have always admired this effect, and cannot find a single instance in which it occurs without good reason. A change from night to day, for instance, is sometimes shown on the stage, and Wagner utilises this as a relief from the sound of voices; he clears the stage, and allows the orchestra and the scenic artist to have it all their own way.

But now for the principal accusation, the one point in which the Professor has committed himself to a decided statement of the fault. After aptly defining orchestration as "the chemistry of sound," Sir George says that the greatest art of the orchestral writer is to produce new varieties of sound by the combination of the different qualities of tone, yet to make for ever the distinctness of its several parts apparent to the hearer. This last requirement can only be fulfilled when the music is of extreme simplicity and the polyphony limited. Which sounds the clearest, the "Siegfried Idyll" or the finale of the Jupiter Symphony? Of course Mozart's instrumentation is delicious, but to instrument like Mozart one must write like Mozart; modern orchestration is the necessary outcome of modern music. "In the composer whose name he had mentioned (Wagner) there was not a variety of sound. The same quality of tone prevailed throughout an opera of four hours' duration. One had but the variety which was made by striking more forcibly or less forcibly on the pianoforte—of loud and less loud; but the constancy of the same tone of brass and reed instruments prevailed from beginning to end, and with such indistinctness of part-writing that when the music had been committed to memory by a listener he could not in many instances trace the elements of the score." Surely, surely, there is some mistake here. No variety of tone! Indistinctness of part-writing! Why, is not the music of each character in "Lohengrin" characterised by a particular instrument? Are there not whole long scenes in the later works accompanied by only one particular class of instrument in order to make those decisive contrasts which are the most brilliant feature of this composer's music? As to part-writing, is not "Die Meistersinger" like one enormous Bach Fugue? It is true that to one who has merely heard these works once or twice the technical marvels are not at once clearly revealed, however profound a musician he may be; he needs to study them, a thing which Professor Macfarren has obviously not done. As to the succeeding remarks in praise of the dramatic worth of "Fidelio," "Don Juan," and "Figaro," it is, of course, a matter of individual taste, but we cannot ourselves rate at least the librettos of the two latter so highly as Sir George does. The question as to which composer best characterises and individualises the persons of his play must also be purely a matter of personal taste.

In respect of construction, there seems to us just the difference between a Mozart and a Wagner opera that there is between Schumann's Fantasia in C and his Symphony in D minor. On the one hand, we have a number of beautiful short stories bound up in a volume, but with no particular connection; and, on the other, a grandly constructed organic work of art. To say that Wagner discards the principles of musical construction is to misstate the fact. He discards such set forms as he finds interfere with his drama, and to prove that he is right in so doing one has only to trace the gradual, thoughtful development of his own principles from his earliest work to his last. The truth is that he in ten works and in thirty years has done what some one else would inevitably have done in three times the space of time. The notion that Wagner's music is devoid of all form and is like a mere improvised accompaniment to the words is rather a general one among the uninitiated. If it were so it would be more easy to imitate successfully. A close study of the separate scenes, say of the "Meistersinger," will soon show how erroneous this idea is. If Wagner has "discarded the principles of musical construction" he has done so in no spirit of ignorance or reckless innovation, and he has—at least in the opinion of many, even as learned musicians as Sir George Macfarren—given us something of equal value in their stead, and that something will appeal to the hearts of men and musicians far more strongly and enduringly than could the most powerful display of mere scholarship.

THOSE who take interest in the spread of music in America cannot but be struck with the overwhelming importance attached to the state of Italian Opera in that country, and the intense public interest evinced in all the doings of lessees and vocalists concerned in these institutions. Newspapers teem with intelligence of the probable intentions of rival managers; prime donne are "interviewed" and their opinions upon operatic art and artists chronicled, as if the healthy progress of music depended solely upon the acceptance or rejection of certain terms which have been proffered to certain petted vocalists. The climax of many months of preliminary "exclusive information" upon the subject has now arrived, for we find that the new Opera House in New York has actually opened under the direction of Mr. Abbey, simultaneously with the Academy of Music, under Mr. Mapleson. The correspondents of our London daily papers, however, who telegraph the news, inspire us with but little hope of this great event producing any better result than the establishment of a social rivalry between two parties amongst the wealthy classes in New York, the new House indeed being built especially for those rich citizens who were unable to obtain boxes in the old one. "It is literally," says the Daily News, "a millionaire's Opera House, built by millionaires, not from interest in art, but from a desire to have a field for social display." As a proof that the worship of fashion rather than of music is the prevailing feeling, we find but few allusions to the performance at either house on the opening night, although we are told that at the new building, after Madame Nilsson had sung the Jewel Song in "Faust," "bouquets were thrown from the boxes in profusion." On the acoustical properties of Mr. Abbey's Opera House the papers express no very decided opinion; but upon one important point they are agreed—"that the predominating colours, gold and yellow, form a bad back-ground for the silk and jewels worn by the ladies." Let this be remedied immediately. Think not of the rehearsals, or the mounting of the operas; pay no attention to the quality of the orchestra or the training of the choir. The beauties of New York will never show themselves with a "bad back-ground." Mr. Abbey should look to this immediately, or his rival, Mr. Mapleson, although presenting no higher attraction in opera than himself, may secure the patronage of the public by having in his auditorium a charming back-ground for the ladies.

OUR readers may remember that some time ago we called attention to a remarkably expeditious method of teaching music called the "Fork Lighting" system. We have not yet heard that any artists have been formed by this process, but if the inventor of it still imparts his valuable instruction to confiding pupils, he has now, we can assure him, a formidable rival. This new professor has it seems contrived to abolish all the difficulties hitherto considered inherent in the acquisition of the art, and advertises himself by leaving a Polka (of which we presume he is the composer) at private residences. Of course, as his method is stated to be copyright, he does not inform us in the two closely printed pages which accompany the Polka how the wonderful progress he guarantees is accomplished; but he does tell us that any child of ordinary intellect over six years of age, and quite ignorant of music, can be taught in one lesson the "names of the white keys on the pianoforte, the names of the treble lines and space notes, together with all the ledger line notes used in music, above treble and bass, and also one tune with both hands." This seems rather a difficult task, considering that the names of the bass notes in the staff are evidently not taught. But more remains to astonish the reader. An adult of fifty-five, or more, who has never touched the keys of a piano, can play the Polka already alluded to in the second week, "together with other tunes"; and "any person" (we presume that he must be under eighty) will be able in one quarter "to play beyond exercises a series of pretty Sonatinas, six sacred Airs, four Waltzes, three Polkas, two Marches, and two Galops (or strictly classical)." Although the number of "pretty Sonatinas" which will be included in the student's répertoire is not mentioned, here is at least a goodly list of pieces to be mastered in three months. The professor states that all these wonderful things can be done by a pupil "irrespective of age"; yet we cannot but think (as we have suggested) that the limit should at least be placed at eighty, as after that time the faculties often become somewhat dulled. The address of this extraordinary teacher is very distinctly given, and enquiring pupils are particularly enjoined to "ring the electric bell."

THE Committee of the Bristol Musical Festival Society announce their proposed arrangements for the Fourth Session of classes for instruction in singing and in violin playing. The vocal department is divided into an elementary, an intermediate, and an advanced class using the staff notation, and a special section intended for preparing pupil teachers to meet the requirements of the new code of sight-singing from the tonic-sol-fa notation. In both cases the terms for a course of twenty lessons are five shillings, payable in advance. In the class for ladies only, the course of study including instruction in sight-singing, the terms are half-a-guinea. In the violin class, in which "each pupil must be able to read simple intervals on the 'G,' or treble clef, and be provided with a violin properly strung and a bow; also a small MS. music book and a blacklead for copying exercises from the blackboard," the terms are seven shillings and sixpence for the course of twenty lessons. That is to say, a boy or girl of the period in Bristol can receive what we assume to be good instruction in singing for 3d. a lesson; and in violin playing for 4½d. a lesson. Many people in their time have paid five shillings or ten shillings or a guinea a lesson, and can perhaps neither sing nor play the violin as well as some of the young people at Bristol. We quite understand the value of competent instructors, not merely for what were called "finishing lessons," but from the first moment a pupil attempts to produce a vocal tone, or lays hold of his violin; but the larger question suggested by these music schools cropping up in all directions in the provinces is the general recognition of the power of association, the decline of individualism, even in music, and the wider dissemination of the higher aims and pleasures of existence. The Bristol Musical Festival Society has its "Intermediate Certificates" and its "Advanced Classes." It illustrates the only true and efficacious educational principle of "levelling upwards"—of preparing the soil for the exotics sown by academies, and which without such preparation will neither bloom nor be appreciated beyond the precincts of the cloister or quadrangle.

It is undoubtedly a sign of the times that in all the musical journals published in this country so much space should be devoted to criticisms upon our English Festivals. The meagre accounts of these musical gatherings which, as a rule, used to satisfy readers in years past might have been written by any ordinary reporter upon the staff of a newspaper; and, apart from the advance of musical knowledge, therefore, one great reason for this change is that those only who really understand what they are writing about are employed to discharge the duties of so responsible an office. But with all our sympathy for these meetings and our desire to urge them forward in the cause of true musical art, we have not yet arrived at the point attained in the United States—the publication of a paper solely to record the doings of an annual Musical Festival. At first we were somewhat surprised at the title of this journal, "The Worcester Music Festival," especially when in hastily glancing through its contents we found some miscellaneous musical articles, including a notice of the Handel Festival in England and advertisements from dealers in clocks and boots. On the front page, however, the paper is said to be "devoted to the interests of the September Festival of the Worcester County Musical Association," and it is also announced that the journal will be published semi-monthly, in August, September, and October, advertisements "not inconsistent with the character of the paper" being admitted. We can scarcely see how announcements respecting clocks and boots can be in consonance with the "character of the paper," save that visitors to the Festival must consult a clock to know what time to leave the house, and have boots to go in; but the information about the music meeting is exceedingly full, and the publication of such a paper shows how much interest is taken in the matter by the general public. It is Utopian perhaps to expect that, important as are our triennial Festivals, a paper exclusively devoted to them will ever be published in England; but who shall say that some day, in some August, we shall not be startled by the appearance of the "Three Choirs Festival Journal"?

AMONGST the numerous admirers of Wagner's music we could name many who have carefully analysed his works—many who have amply testified as to their effect upon an audience; but until the receipt of a communication from a correspondent who signs himself "Richard Slater," we never heard of any person who has not only counted the bars in one of his lyrical compositions, but has placed in a tabular form these bars under various headings, so that the opera he has selected, "Parsifal," may be contrasted with the other works of the composer, as we may contrast well-known buildings by pulling them to pieces and reckoning the number of bricks and other materials used in their construction. "With respect to the number of bars of which it consists," Mr. Slater tells us, "'Parsifal' is, with one exception, the shortest of Wagner's works. It stands between 'The Rheingold' and 'The Flying Dutchman,' which consist of 3,905 and 4,432 bars respectively, the total of 'Parsifal' being 4,347." Of completely silent bars there are 16; of purely vocal music, 150; of instrumental music, 2,500; of voice and orchestra combined, 6,028. Space prevents our continuing further extracts from this table, but we may say that this enthusiastic calculator places before us the number of bars in every time used throughout the work; of those in which differing times between voice and orchestra are used simultaneously (3-4 with 9-8), of those sung by the chorus, and of those sung by each character in the opera. We accept this document as an unique specimen of industry and perseverance; but sincerely trust that it may not lead the admirers of other composers—say, for instance, Handel—to count up and classify the bars contained in the numerous works bequeathed to us.

In the many letters which have appeared in our journal on the subject of "Professional and Amateur Musicians"—certainly not representing more than one-half of those which have been forwarded to us—the fact of persons who do not live by the exercise of the art ruining the prospects of those who do by accepting merely nominal terms, both as organists and teachers, is often especially dwelt upon. There can be no question that several of the cases mentioned in illustration of this, although no doubt drawn from the experience of our correspondents, are so extreme as to appear exaggerated to those casual readers who are not placed in a position to test their truth. As a proof that these examples of the effect of amateur teachers' fees upon those of the accredited professor are not in the least degree overdrawn, we print an extract from a letter which we have just received: "A lady with whom I am well acquainted, holding four certificates from the London Academy of Music, heard of an appointment as organist. Upon application to the vicar she was informed that the stipend was £5 per annum, and that out of that amount the organist would be expected to pay a railway fare of 1s. 6d., which would leave a surplus of less than 6d. a week. The same lady informed me that she knew of more than one instance in which pianoforte lessons were given at the rate of 2s. 6d. a quarter." The name of the writer of the letter, and of the vicar who makes this tempting offer, are in our possession, but we withhold them both, and place the fact before our readers without further comment.

A PERUSAL of the American musical periodicals will prove beyond doubt that the misspelling of the names of English artists is by no means confined to the Continental press. In a journal published in the States we read of the "recent official recognition of Tonic Sol-fa in England, and the appointment of Dr. John Stainer in place of Dr. Hubbell." The many reports of Training-School Examinations in England, signed by John Hullah—which have found their way across the Atlantic—would, we might imagine, have sufficiently impressed this name upon musical readers; but the following appears still more inexplicable. An American paper, in recording the conversation of an "Interviewer" with Minnie Hauk, tells us that the author of the libretto of Mackenzie's Opera, "Colomba," is "the great London critic McHaeffer." The absurd mistakes made in French and German newspaper paragraphs when writing of Goring Thomas, the composer—to some of which we have recently drawn attention—are trifles compared to this travesty of the name of Dr. Hueffer, the critic, in a journal issued in an English-speaking country.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

So much has to be said in connection with the important works produced at this Festival, that I cannot devote space to details of organisation and full-length description of arrangements. Suffice it that the performances began in the Town Hall on Wednesday morning, the 10th ult., and ended on the following Saturday evening; that the conductor was Sir Arthur Sullivan; that the organist's duty was divided between Dr. Spark and Mr. Walter Parratt; that Mr. J. T. Carodus was "leader" in an orchestra of 112 players; that Mr. Broughton had trained a chorus of 313 voices, and that the solo vocalists were Madame Valleria, Miss Marriott, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Damian, Miss Wilson, and Madame Patey; Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, Mr. King, Mr. Blower, and Mr. Santley. It should be added that the General Committee was presided over by the Mayor of Leeds (Councillor Woodhouse), and the Executive Committee by Mr. Thomas Marshall; with Councillor F. R. Spark as an untiring, and most skillful honorary secretary. Having put these facts on record I am at liberty to deal with more important matters.

Since the Festival of 1874, the Committee have so far departed from custom as to leave "The Messiah" out of their programme—a rather poor return, I am bound to say, for the good the "Sacred Oratorio" did them in the year just named. They have, on the other hand, shown continued favour to "Elijah," and Mendelssohn's great work formed the matter of the opening Concert. There was not a seat to spare in the large Hall, from the front row of the gallery—where sat President His Royal Highness the Duke of Albany, the Duchess, and a distinguished company—to the remotest bench of the unreserved space. This means that 2,100 persons were present, but it does not measure the public desire to attend. Very many more tickets might have been sold, even for more standing room. It is worth while to note in this connection that no vocal "star" served as a point of special interest. The Committee had, very properly, declined to pay an exorbitant sum for the services of Madame Albani, and the result proved that they accurately estimated the measure and kind of public support upon which they could rely. Madame Albani would have been very welcome, but she could not have drawn a single person more than actually came. We may conclude, therefore, that Yorkshire amateurs are better than stargazers—that they consider first what is to be done, and only in the second place who is to do it. I congratulate those amateurs, and hope that their example may everywhere be followed, to the destruction of a vicious system according to the working of which the interests of a few persons over-ride and sorely damage the interests of art. There is no need to dwell upon the performance of "Elijah" further than to say that it came quite up to the highest Festival form, thanks in nearly equal measure to all the great divisions of the executive force. The orchestra and chorus were superb throughout, Mr. Broughton's people taking the earliest opportunity of showing that they stand first among English choirs for oratorio purposes. The principal solos were in the hands of Madame Valleria, Miss Marriott, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley, and by them given a very good account of, while Dr. Spark, at the organ, and Sir A. Sullivan at the conductor's desk, met easily and well all the demands upon their skill. The Festival could not have opened better than with this performance of a familiar masterpiece. It gave earnest of future success; put everybody into a hopeful frame of mind, and was so noised abroad as to draw all eyes towards the place and occasion.

On the evening of Wednesday was presented the first of the promised novelties—Mr. Cellier's Cantata having Gray's famous Elegy as its text. It would be wrong to say that this work excited a great amount of curiosity, although nearly 2,000 persons attended. Mr. Alfred Cellier is not yet well enough known for the interest that waits on a famous name, and the attitude of the public towards him was one of passivity, affected, perhaps, by a little hope, since everybody knew that the Committee had taken his work on the recommendation of Sir Arthur Sullivan. The Cantata had, in one respect, a claim to be judged leniently—it appeared as the product of a hurried effort to stop a gap. I have no intention of entering into the business transactions between the Leeds Committee and Mr. F. Clay, who had been engaged to write a work for the Festival. Enough that untoward circumstances led both parties to abandon the position they had taken up, whereupon application was made to Mr. Cellier. The next move amounted to a race against time, in which time was beaten. The composer may fairly claim to have all these circumstances considered. We are at liberty to censure his rashness, if we please, but not to be rigidly severe upon his music. Mr. Cellier's choice of a subject is very much open to question, and assuredly placed obstacles in his way from the first. Gray's Elegy lends itself to music ungraciously for more than one reason. To begin with, parts of it are argumentative rather than lyrical, and present a train of thought which, so far from inviting, does not even suggest music. Then there is the difficulty in point of treatment that always has to be faced when a composer's division of his text into airs, choruses, &c., must needs be arbitrary. Here the want of incident and character—lack of the dramatic element, in point of fact—is sorely felt, and the composer, having nothing to guide him, becomes conscious of and depressed by a false and unreal position. Doubtless certain portions of the Elegy submit with grace to an alliance with music, but if we would have the whole thus wedded compulsion must be used, and the almost certainty of unhappy consequences faced. I see clearly that Mr. Cellier was affected by the circumstances just pointed out. A good deal of his music to the poem is wanting in definite character, for the plain reason; that the verses suggested nothing, but left him to the exercise of a judgment which, puzzled and uncertain, was necessarily feeble in action. It sometimes happens that when a composer is not well served by the first or literal meaning of his text, he turns to whatever deeper significance it may have, for nearly all subjects, however in themselves trivial, are related to the higher things of humanity. Beethoven may be said to have done this in his great "Leonora" Overture, which, with the fortunes of insignificant persons as its theme, kindles thought and feeling universal in their range. As we hear it, the trumpet sounds, not for the rescue of Florestan, but rather for the salvation of a world. Some such course was open to Mr. Cellier, but he seems to have left the path unrecognised, or to have mistrusted his strength. Anyhow, there is no pretence in the Cantata of more than superficial expression; the music keeping closely to the literalness of the poem, without seeking to penetrate beneath. A striking example of this appears in the opening numbers. Gray begins, as every reader knows, with a lovely picture of a village at eventide. The curfew bells, the cattle come slowly home, the drowsy beetle drones past, and the sheep bell is heard lulling the distant folds. Mr. Cellier sees the picture and little else. He concerns himself with the outward and visible, rather than with that which is inward and spiritual. Hence the music fails to impress us. It is busy with imitations of curfew bells and droning beetles. I do not deny the raison d'être of music which simply lends colour to a verbal outline; at the same time, it is a duty to point out the inferiority of its value, and how completely it neglects the unique power of the art and its highest application. The Cantata may be popular, not in despite, but on account of the very facts just touched upon. Its music is undoubtedly melodious and often graceful. These qualities all can appreciate, and when they are present the great majority of audiences do not feel the lack of those which are "spiritually discerned."

Instead of going through the Cantata number by number, I shall select for special mention those parts that have a representative character. There are three orchestral movements in the work—namely, a Prelude, consisting of a lengthy Allegro pastorale, preceded and followed by a brief Adagio; a movement styled Pageant Music, and a Funeral March. Of these the first suffers from lack of contrast, streaming on, as it does, with a uniformity of movement and character that, however agreeable, soon becomes monotonous. Neither in the Pageant Music nor the Funeral March is there anything new. Both, however, are in their way effective; because, if Mr. Cellier does not here present fresh ideas he clothes those which are familiar with no mean skill. I may say, indeed, that the scoring of the Cantata generally does much credit to the composer. He almost atones for the comparative shallowness of his music by the charm of its form and colour. Among the solo numbers two stand out conspicuously. These are a tenor air "Some village Hampden" and a bass scena "For thee, who mindful of the unhonoured dead." In both cases Mr. Cellier shows that he is not wholly unacquainted with the source of musical power. The concerted numbers contain a good deal of pleasant writing, modest in aim and conventional in character. A superior example is found in the chorus, with soprano solo, "Full many a gem of purest ray serene." This number made a lively impression in performance, and took first honours, for which its most powerful rival was the Pageant Music, with the concerted sequel "The boast of Heraldry; the pomp of Power." There now only remains to put on record that the Cantata was variously received. The performance might have been better, and the remark applies especially to the chorus, which body never pretended to any sort of enthusiasm about Mr. Cellier's music. The solos were entrusted to Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. King, all of whom sang carefully.

In the second or miscellaneous part of this Concert were Beethoven's Symphony in D (No. 2); Mozart's overture to "Die Zauberflöte," and the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin." How these selections were performed by Sir A. Sullivan's fine orchestra I need not take the trouble to tell. The vocal solos were Mackenzie's "Vocero" ("Colomba"), capably rendered by Madame Valleria, and the Prize Song from Wagner's "Meistersinger," in which Mr. Lloyd made a decided "hit." The choir, on its part, contributed two madrigals: Linley's "Let me careless" and Converso's "When all alone, my pretty love." These were sung under the direction of Mr. Broughton, whose appearance in the conductor's seat was hailed with loud applause.

Thursday morning saw the Town Hall once more nearly full, the attraction being a mixture of old and new—that is to say, Joachim Raff's Oratorio, "The End of the World—Judgment—The New World," and a selection of fifteen airs and choruses from the works of Handel. It would be hard to tell whether the master just deceased or his mighty predecessor exercised the greater influence in bringing together nearly 2,000 people. Raff is not very well known to the provincial public, but his work had been much discussed in the Yorkshire press, and the special nature of its subject was adapted to help in stimulating curiosity. As for Handel, he remains the Yorkshire favourite. No music is sung by the men of the North with greater gusto than his; because, perhaps, none more closely harmonises in its strength and earnestness with the character of the people. On one point in regard of the Thursday morning programme there is no room for doubt—the conjunction of Raff and Handel proved fortunate; for, when the audience began to experience the weariness of listening to a work only half understood and approved, Handel came to their relief with music which was one long delight. "The End of the World" has already been analysed in these pages at considerable length, and if the reader desires to make himself acquainted with details concerning it he must turn back to THE MUSICAL TIMES for April last. I shall not, of course, go over the ground there trodden, but be content with stating the impressions made in performance. First of all, the "Symphony-oratorio," as a musical form, gathered no adherents. Raff may never have intended the work to exemplify a fresh development of the orchestra in connection with oratorio, and, perhaps, he introduced so many instrumental movements merely because they seemed to be called for by the subject. On this point a decision is impossible, the tongue of the master being for ever silent; but we all know that what an eminent man does is apt to become a precedent and harden into rule. Here is the fact which gave significance to the special form adopted by Raff. It seems, however, that we need not fear ill effects. Experience of symphonic oratorio has so far gone to prove that the old way is the best, and that the vagueness of orchestral suggestion and description cannot be tolerated as a substitute for the more definite expression of chorus and aria. In expressing these opinions I must not be supposed to underrate Raff's ability as shown in the Intermezzi. The movements are all abundantly clever, and marvels of orchestration. If they fail, as most of them do, it is simply because no strength of genius can compel music to accomplish impossibilities. Another weakness of Raff's oratorio is found in the excessive predominance of recitative by a single (baritone) voice, and the slight use made of the aria. It was needful for the Narrator (St. John the Divine) to say much, but his story might have been more pleasantly told than in the manner which tried the patience and sorely taxed the artistic conscientiousness of Mr. Santley. Apart from the Narrator, only one solo voice, and that impersonal, is heard, the music given to it being two short arias and an arioso. These are successful numbers, made so as much by the relief they bring as by their unquestionable beauty. All the choruses are, in varying measure, successful likewise, and show Raff's complete mastery of true choral effect, as well as of the contrapuntal style which best ministers to the severe dignity of oratorio. Listening to them and to the airs, one must regret that the composer did not labour more in the field where Handel and Mendelssohn reaped so rich a harvest. He had every qualification for this exalted task, and might, by avoiding the eccentricities noticeable in "The End of the World," have continued the succession of masterpieces. The work performed in Leeds will, of course, soon be heard in London, and then further discussion of its character and claims is inevitable. What influence renewed debate will have upon opinion remains to be seen; but I venture to say that it will not in the smallest degree lessen the admiration of connoisseurs for the power and beauty of Raff's vocal numbers. Neither will it reconcile them to the function assumed by the orchestra, or to the attempt which the orchestra makes at discharging a task entirely beyond its powers.

The performance was not absolutely faultless, owing to the intricacies of the orchestral score, with which some among the players had evidently not found time to familiarise themselves. Occasional faultiness of intonation was observable in the chorus; and Mr. Santley, to whom fell all the recitatives, seemed less happy than usual in his task. Miss Damian, the only remaining soloist, made a great success by her refined and expressive singing: while of the rendering generally it may be said that shortcomings were as nothing compared with merits. Great praise is due here to Sir Arthur Sullivan, who knew what he had to do and how to do it. The oratorio was well, but not enthusiastically, received.

Of the fifteen selections from Handel given at this Concert, ten were choruses, among them being "Gird on thy sword," "Wretched lovers," "May no rash intruder," "The many rend the skies," "When His loud voice," "But as for His people," "Worthy is the Lamb," and "Amen." I need not point out the excellence of the choice. Here was indeed the giant master dwarfing all other, and manifesting a strength in which the Yorkshire singers—every one "to the manner born"—fairly revelled. The performance of these pieces was magnificent and called forth actual enthusiasm—so excited being the audience that, against all reason and convenience, a strong desire to encore many numbers showed itself. The airs were "What tho' I trace" (Miss Hilda Wilson), "Oh! had I Jubal's lyre" (Miss Marriott), "Waft her, angels" (Mr. Maas), and "He layeth the beams" (Mr. Blower).

In the evening of Thursday another gathering of 2,000 people or thereabouts filled the Hall, attracted by a mixed programme, including four distinct and exceedingly diverse works. The selection may be said to have ranged the whole field of accepted form and style as applied to sacred choral music. First in order came Mr. Barnby's new Psalm "The Lord is King"—an exemplification of modern art as affected in different ways by Mendelssohn and Gounod, seen through the medium of the composer's own individuality. Going backward in point of time, the programme next offered the so-called "Third Motett" of Mozart, and, again retrograding, Bach's Cantata "Thou Shepherd of Israel." From the old German master the audience were invited to come rushing down the stream of time and stop finally at Rossini's "Stabat." Here was variety enough for all tastes; but it may be questioned whether such diversified selections are quite as useful as those of a more homogeneous character. The items often neutralise each other, or suffer from contrasts which were never intended and are scarcely fair. Mr. Barnby's Psalm, being the novelty of the evening, excited most interest, and the feeling evidently extended to the composer, who on taking the conductor's seat was loudly applauded, with, no doubt, due recognition of his Yorkshire origin. The work is decidedly characteristic. It bears the mark of Mr. Barnby on every page, alike in regard of features that are his own and of those he has adopted. This is, of course, an advantage, great in proportion to the mass of music which now comes from the press with the signs upon it of a confused and indefinite paternity. The work contains six numbers, the first being an elaborate chorus in four sections dealing with the Psalmist's glowing description of the Almighty King. Mr. Barnby has treated this exacting text with great breadth and vigour, showing a firm hand and an easy mastery of resource. His use of a kind of fanfare to suggest the regal grandeur of Jehovah is especially happy and comes in with telling effect, while not without studied purpose are the abrupt transitions and bold harmonies that convey an impression of labouring to reach, through every channel, the height of so great an argument. The last two sections, "There shall go a fire before Him" and "His lightnings gave shine," contain episodes of much power, and, altogether, the composer passes this crucial test with honour. He may now aspire to even greater things. A bass recitative and aria, "The heavens have declared," come next. Here Mr. Barnby is less striking, and the air might be shortened with advantage as well as with ease. It is too long for the material employed and becomes attenuated. If cut down, its undeniable merit would have a much better chance. The following number is a soprano solo and chorus, "Sion heard of it," light in texture and by no means according with conventional notions of sacred music. On this ground, however, objection against it will hardly lie. Mr. Barnby evidently had in view the "daughters of Jerusalem" with their timbrels and festive songs, and his music harmonises with the idea. It is music of an exceedingly graceful and pleasing character, full of refinement and delicacy, and admirably expressive. The piece has only to be heard to be admired, as its reception on Thursday night, and again on Saturday night—when it represented the Psalm to a "popular" audience—was more than sufficient to prove. A contralto air, "O ye that love the Lord," comes next, and is an example of unpretending devotional art, wherein effect is mainly left to the singer. Then follows a double quartet, "There is sprung up a light," which more nearly approaches the part-song in style and character than seems to me altogether desirable. As, however, the Psalm opened in regal state, so also it closes; the "Gloria Patri" being set as a triumphal march for the orchestra, attended by plain vocal phrases, largely in unison and partaking somewhat of the character of an ecclesiastical "intonation." The effect of this is positively good, the contrast between choir and orchestra, though sufficiently marked, stopping short of the violence that results in incongruity. Taken as a whole, the Psalm enhances Mr. Barnby's reputation as a composer in the higher walks of his art, and encourages hopes of something much more important from his pen. The performance, which benefited by Mr. Barnby's skill and experience as a conductor, was very fine from first to last; the chorus especially distinguishing itself, save at one awkward point in "Sion heard of it." Miss Marriott, Miss Damian, and Mr. King were irreproachable in the solo numbers, and the orchestra seconded all the rest with ardour. Under circumstances thus favourable, success came as a matter of course, the applause being unanimous which felicitated Mr. Barnby upon his work and called him back to the platform for renewed demonstrations.

The comparatively easy music of Mozart's chorus and quartet from "König Thamos" ("Third Motett") gave no trouble to anybody concerned, and went smoothly as well as with brilliant effect. I cannot apply the same words to Bach's Cantata "Thou Guide of Israel," for which, if the truth must be told, no one seemed greatly to care. This result I put down to the mixture of styles in the programme, it being almost impossible for an average audience to judge of each of a group of pieces on its own merits, and without reference to the impressions made by others. In its particular way, "Thou Guide of Israel" is a masterpiece, and a very favourable specimen of Bach's occasional suavity of manner. This fact the opening pastoral chorus and the bass air, "When Jesus deigns his flock to number," fully establishes. The other sections are a tenor air, "His face my Shepherd long is hiding"—interesting only as a specimen of polyphonic writing; and a choral, "The Lord my Guide," which has the same melody used by Mendelssohn in the first choral of "St. Paul." If it be true that Sir A. Sullivan is responsible for the choice of this work he deserves none the fewer thanks because the public were indifferent. His claims are measured rather by the greatness of Bach than by popular comprehension of the old master's genius. Rossini's "Stabat Mater" held the audience to the end by the power of its sensuous beauty. It was splendidly performed; the solo vocalists being Madame Valleria, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, and Mr. King, of whom the honours were taken by Madame Valleria ("Inflamatus") and Mr. Maas ("Cujus animam").

Concerning the prime novelty of the Festival, Sir G. A. Macfarren's "King David"—which was performed on the Friday morning to a crowded hall—I have one or two preliminary observations. In the first place, the reader must be assumed already to have made some acquaintance with a work of which so much has been written. He cannot but know, for example, that the libretto deals with a few episodes in the life of King David, not for their own sake so much as because they point a moral—teaching that retribution follows sin, but yet that "the vilest sinner may return." He cannot but know, likewise, that the incidents treated are David's elevation to the throne, the bringing up of the Ark, the murder of Uriah, the marriage of the King with Bathsheba, and, in the second part, the rebellion and death of Absalom, with David's repentance and pardon. I am spared, therefore, from unduly lengthening a necessarily long notice by setting forth these things in detail. Similarly, I may take the reader to be already aware that in its music the oratorio runs on the same lines as others from Professor Macfarren's pen. It contains numbers that, while they carry on the story, are strict in point of musical form; and also dramatic scenes wherein form is a subordinate consideration or no consideration at all; then there are reflective numbers in the old Greek chorus fashion; while, though the composer employs representative themes to a certain extent and in his own distinctive way, he mainly adheres to the model which has been handed down by his classical predecessors. My next preliminary remark is that it cannot be necessary to point out the ruling features of Professor Macfarren's style. The learned composer produced his first oratorio ten years ago, since which time he has been before the public with the "Resurrection" and "Joseph." All these works are consistent and intelligible as exemplifications of the writer's method, than which nothing can be, or, at any rate, should be, better known. There is, however, one point that calls for notice. Sir G. Macfarren is often wanting in the qualities of grace and feeling. He cannot help being learned, and mayhap the influence of his northern blood tends to restraint and coldness as against effusiveness and warmth. Hence a certain sense of hardness and dryness, the degree of which, however, varies. It is little felt, for example, in "St. John the Baptist," and I am glad to say that it is not specially obvious in "King David," throughout which, a few places excepted, the composer seems to give a freer rein than usual to his sympathies, and to condescend more easily to the graces of musical utterance. The facts just stated will have a good deal to do with the success of the work. Of this Professor Macfarren need not be ashamed. Even the composer of an oratorio should not always stand on stilts, with his head in the clouds, for, as Mendelssohn found, it not only pays him but bessems him to come down and speak in simple, engaging language whenever he makes an appeal to human feelings.

It is not difficult to marshal in order the defects and merits of "King David," while with the first named there is very little trouble because they are few. I will deal with these at once. To begin with, the oratorio is too long, and the removal of a couple of numbers would greatly benefit it; say, the contralto air "What is a man profited?"—a pure interpolation—and the chorus "Arise, come forth," in which, after David's humiliation, the people invite him to resume his duties. Both song and chorus could well be spared. Next, some of the texts are too argumentative or too matter-of-fact for musical purposes. An example is found in the air just named, and another in the chorus "Absalom prepareth chariots and horsemen and fifty men run before him." A composer invites his own failure when he accepts passages like these, and not even Sir G. Macfarren's skill has prevented the song being dry, and the chorus, as a musical setting of certain words, unmeaning. Again, the oratorio too conspicuously exemplifies the device of employing the orchestra to echo vocal phrases while the voice rests. The method is classical, I know, but in "King David" it becomes a mannerism and is employed to the verge of weariness. Lastly, there are in the work instances of words often repeated without the motive for repetition being at all obvious. In the chorus "Absalom prepareth," for example, the words "And fifty men," together with the name "Absalom," are passed from mouth to mouth as though there were some special significance in them. A like stress, it will be remembered, is laid on "A coat of many colours" in the composer's "Joseph." Sir George Macfarren is so thoughtful a man that he must have a reason for thus dwelling upon certain passages, but unfortunately it is not obvious even to careful examiners. I should ill discharge my duty if I did not point out shortcomings like the foregoing, although, as I gladly concede, they are of slight importance when compared with the general merit of a truly remarkable work. Turning to the points of excellence, let me draw attention to Sir G. Macfarren's masterly and legitimate use of the orchestra, which, while playing the part assigned to it by modern practice, is never obtrusive or distracting. Its recurring themes are simple and easily recognised, and there is not one case of mere "sound and fury, signifying nothing." Moreover, the scoring is always clear; often refined and delicate in a high degree, as witness the music attendant upon the narrative concerning Bathsheba. Passing to another matter, most of the airs are examples of lyrical truth and power. I would cite here "The path of the just," "Lord, where are Thine old loving-kindnesses," and "Despise not thou," as favourable specimens; but it is in the dramatic music that the composer reaches his highest point by directness and force of utterance due to a happy perception and expression of the spirit animating the text. Herein the dialogues between David and Nathan, and David and the Woman of Tekoah, as well as the scene in which the King hears of his son's death, are models of terseness and truth. Before all, however, I would put David's outburst of grief "O Absalom, my son." This is dramatic to the point of intensity. It is agony in ordered sound, and worthy to rank with the finest effort of any composer for the lyric stage. In the choruses, Sir G. Macfarren ranges over a wide area of expression, having at one extreme the purely devotional "Remember not, Lord, our offences," and at the other the lowering and stormy "Vengeance belongeth unto the Lord." He uses the fugue form sparingly, but always with effect, and in powerful climax he never fails, while constant variety sustains interest. The choral numbers are, indeed, worthy of the highest praise for the nervous energy and unflinching directness that animate them. Here my observations upon an oratorio that invites many more must cease. "King David" will soon be twice heard in London, and, after that fuller experience, opportunity will serve for supplement to, or modification of, the opinions already expressed.

The reception of the work at Leeds was most cordial; that result being, no doubt, aided by a very fine performance, in which hardly a flaw could be detected. Sir Arthur Sullivan, animated by sympathy with his friend the composer, had rehearsed the music with great care; band and chorus were alike zealous for success, and the principal vocalists, recognising the importance of the occasion, spared no pains with their respective parts. Thus "King David" had a happy issue. The solos were entrusted to Madame Valleria, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley—a quartet hard to match. All did well; Madame Valleria in the first soprano air and in the scene between David and the Woman of Tekoah specially distinguishing herself. Madame Patey's delivery of the narratives was, as usual with her in such cases, a masterpiece of clear and emphatic declamation; Mr. Lloyd sang the music of Absalom with all desirable grace and charm, while Mr. Santley raised the part of the King to an importance next after that of Elijah. Better singing could not have been wished, but Mr. Santley did not stop at that. He was the character, and all his utterances, more especially the bitter cry "O Absalom, my son," came with an accent of truth that was most moving. At the close of so fine a general performance enthusiasm was inevitable, and the audience, calling for the composer—who was led on by Sir Arthur Sullivan—cheered him to his heart's content.

Gade's fine Cantata "The Crusaders" was the pièce de résistance at the Concert of Friday evening, and had an attentive hearing from an audience to most of whom, doubtless, it came as a novelty. I am not called upon here to discuss a work that received much notice on the occasion of its production at Birmingham and from time to time since. "The Crusaders" has, very properly, because with advantage to true art, become a stock piece among choral societies, who find in it not only good musical workmanship, but fine fancy and strong dramatic interest. With Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Blower as principal vocalists, the solos were in competent hands, while of the band and chorus it is needless to speak. A miscellaneous selection followed the Cantata, and included Schumann's Overture "Genoveva," the Ballet Music from Gounod's "La Reine de Saba," and the March and Chorus from "Tannhäuser." These pieces well displayed the grand powers of the orchestra. In addition the chorus, directed by Mr. Broughton, sang Wilbye's madrigal "The Lady Oriana," and Miss Marriott and Mr. Lloyd were heard in the charming duet "How sweet the moonlight sleeps," from Sullivan's "Kenilworth." This last gave the audience an opportunity for paying a personal compliment to the conductor, whom, after encoring his music, they loudly applauded.

The last performance of the Festival proper took place on the Saturday morning, when again every available place was occupied, over 2,000 persons attending. Much interest marked the occasion owing to the presence in the programme of Beethoven's great Mass in D, which had been selected as the "battle-horse" of the Festival. Upon this all concerned, from the conductor downwards, resolved to risk their reputation as executors of the highest order, and the question was whether they would, in the result, stand or fall. The Mass was given exactly as it appears in the score, à propos to which fact a misapprehension may be corrected. At least one Yorkshire paper has stated that Beethoven's music was on this occasion sung without change, for the first time in England. It is true that the version produced both at the Birmingham Festival and Exeter Hall some years ago was a modification by Sir Michael Costa of the original text. But, if memory serve me well, the performance given in St. James's Hall, under Mr. Barnby, followed the score exactly, and that being so the claim advanced on behalf of Leeds necessarily falls to the ground. It need not be insisted on in any case, for the performance proved sufficiently memorable in respect of undisputed excellence. The chorus, fully on its mettle, surpassed all former efforts, singing with unflinching energy a work that might tire the freshest voices and exhaust the soundest lungs. Nor was energy alone conspicuous. The chorus made no mistakes. It had studied the ground so well that the often devious and bewildering track was plain to them as the Queen's highway. Hence they went along with an assured step and confident air, never faltering from first to last. The orchestra, though somewhat less exact, ably did its important part, while the soloists, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, answered well for their share. Thus the performance deserved to rank among memorable achievements, and put a stamp upon the Festival that no other work could have given. Sir Arthur Sullivan had reason to be proud of the achievement, and to accept as no mere compliment, on behalf of himself and his fellows, the enthusiastic applause it called forth. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" followed the Mass, and this too had a magnificent rendering. The performers, their minds at ease, revelled in a task comparatively so easy, and thus ended the Festival with all possible distinction, not a little of the result being due to the fine singing of Miss Marriott, Miss Damian, and Mr. Lloyd. After the National Anthem had been sung, Sir Arthur Sullivan was called for, and applauded to the echo both by chorus and audience. He deserved it, for he had worked hard to win success.

In the evening a "popular" Concert was given, the Hall being crowded. Upon this I need not dwell. Enough that many selections from the novelties of the Festival were reproduced, and several works, among them Sullivan's "In Memoriam" and Rossini's Overture to "Guillaume Tell," were heard for the first time during the week. The public seemed to enjoy what was done extremely, and were, no doubt, thankful that the Committee had retained the orchestra instead of, as on former occasions, using only the organ and pianoforte in accompaniment.

There remains to put formally on record the great popular and financial success achieved. Had but 700 more persons attended, the Hall would have been crowded on each occasion, but the actual profits considerably exceed £2,000. I must refer also to the great service rendered by Mr. F. R. Spark, honorary secretary, in facilitating the work of the press. No official was ever more courteous and obliging.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE Saturday Concerts are in the musical life of London what the proverbial single swallow is in nature. They do not make the season, but they show at least that a better time is coming—that St. James's Hall will soon resound with tuneful instruments and melodious voices—that the luckless amateur will no longer be at the mercy of entrepreneurs in whose minds the divine art is inseparably connected with "smoking lounges" and "light refreshments." To judge by preliminary signs, the winter season thus auspiciously heralded will be as vigorous as most of its predecessors. Mr. Manns is evidently determined not to rest on his laurels yet for a while. At the very first Concert, given on the 13th ult., he produced a novelty of considerable scope and importance in the shape of a Pianoforte Concerto in G minor (Op. 33) by Anton Dvůřák, the Bohemian composer. Although heard in England after many of Dvůřák's maturer works, the Concerto belongs to its author's earlier years; and this fact ought to be borne in mind in judging of its absolute merits. Dvůřák at the time of its composition had not yet had time to form a style of his own, and relied for a distinguishing mark of his individuality upon those Slavonic airs and dances which were the musical atmosphere he had breathed from his childhood, and to which he subsequently owed his first triumph in the domain of art. We find accordingly that the one movement in the present Concerto is devoid of this national flavour; the andante sostenuto is also without much character of its own. It is a sustained quiet melody in D, well scored, and not without a certain dreamy charm; but which almost any modern composer well versed in Schumann and Mendelssohn and Brahms might have written. More interesting are the allegros which, according to rule, precede and follow upon the slow movement of the concerto. Here the Slavonic element reigns supreme, and whether it be true or not that Dvůřák strictly refrains from adopting the actual notes of any popular tune, the general source of his inspiration cannot at least be mistaken. It would be unfair to compare a work of this kind with such a mature and highly finished conception as, for example, the "Stabat Mater." As an early effort of great promise since fulfilled it was well worth a hearing, and as such the audience received it with every sign of favour. An excellent rendering, for which equal praise is due to Mr. Oscar Beringer, the solo pianist, and the orchestra, contributed to the success of the work. The Symphony was Beethoven's in B flat, and Mrs. Hutchinson sang with much grace and expression Berlioz's Bolero "Zaïde," the same master's Overture "King Lear," played for the first time at the Crystal Palace, concluding the performance.

Raff's Symphony "In the Autumn," played for the first time in England at the second Saturday Concert, can be passed over in few words. It reveals no new beauties; the music is not very interesting on its abstract merits, and the composer seems to have lost all hold of the poetical subject matter which, according to the "programme," attached to each movement he desired to illustrate. Why, for example, the scherzo, a very graceful dance, should be associated with ghouls or spectres the composer himself might have found it difficult to explain. In the final allegro, "The Hunt," the connection between music and "poetic basis" is more obvious; but here also it leads to very commonplace results. The fact is not without interest to the historic observer. It illustrates the old saying of the French song:—

Parce qu'on revient toujours
À ses premiers amours.

Raff started in artistic life under the auspices of Mendelssohn. Later on he left the safe paths of "classicism" for the untrodden ways of "the future." Poetic and pictorial elements abound in the "Leonora" Symphony at the expense of "form"; but as he grew older the "first love" of his youth once more grew strong in him, and in the "Autumn" Symphony there is nothing to which the most inveterate musical "Tory" need seriously object. Brief reference must finally be made to a very competent rendering of Beethoven's E flat Concerto by Madame Helen Hopekirk at the same Concert.

MR. BACHE'S PIANOFORTE RECITAL.

UNDETERRED by the lack of critical and material support, Mr. Walter Bache continues his crusade in behalf of Liszt with undiminished fervour. The 22nd ult. being the birthday of his idolised master, he once more selected that day for his annual Pianoforte Recital, and formed his programme entirely from the celebrated virtuoso's music. The subject of Liszt's merit as a composer has been pretty well threshed out, and we do not propose to discuss it in detail at present, especially as Mr. Bache did not bring forward any novelties. In the works of no other composer do we find passages of exquisite beauty and even grandeur so marred by association with ugliness and extravagance that the general effect becomes unsatisfactory. These remarks apply with peculiar force to the so-called Sonata in B minor—a piece which has no right to its title, unless the works of the classical masters should be called by some other name. A Sarabande and Chaconne from Handel's Singspiel (?) "Almira," varied in the ultra-modern style, and the réverie-like piece "Benediction de Dieu dans la Solitude," were prominent features of the programme. Mr. Bache was in his best form, and played throughout with immense vigour and earnestness, if not with perfect technical accuracy. The pianoforte music was relieved to the extent of one song, the rhapsodical but effective setting of Heine's "Loreley," which was sung with a good deal of expression by Miss Ambler.

"THE MAY QUEEN" AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

IN a recent series of operatic performances under Mr. Faulkner Leigh's management, at the Crystal Palace, the most remarkable was a presentation of Sterndale Bennett's delightful Pastoral "The May Queen," on Thursday, the 18th ult. The idea of transforming the Cantata into an operetta is not new. Some years ago, for example, Mr. Carl Rosa, in default of English novelties, announced "The May Queen," but the proposal aroused the wrath of the conservative critics and it was abandoned. In general it may be agreed that a composer's intentions should be respected in a performance of his music, and to this it may be added, in the present instance, that Bennett's genius was more lyrical than dramatic. At the same time, a stage rendering of his popular Cantata might give occasion for some picturesque scenes of early English rural life, and towards the close there is sufficient animation to make the performance something more than a series of tableaux vivants. Whether the end would justify the means, however, is a point we are not called upon to discuss at the present juncture, for the word "failure" must be written in large letters against the attempt at the Crystal Palace. Of the principal artists it may be admitted that they might have done better under more inspiring circumstances. If Madame Cave Ashton, Mr. Dudley Thomas, and Mr. Walter Clifford were so depressed as to be unable to do justice to themselves, there is small room for wonder. In a musical sense, the worst point in the proceedings was the discordant singing of the chorus, whose voices sounded so worn that the rendering of the choral numbers was nothing less than a painful caricature. The stage business would have disgraced a transpontine theatre, the reductio ad absurdum being reached when the Queen made her entry, attended by a few ballet ladies, and her exit in a state barge which moved backwards. Mr. Alfred Cellier, who conducted, is an excellent musician, and may be commiserated with for his duties on this occasion.

MEMORIAL TO SIR JOHN GOSS.

ON Monday afternoon, the 22nd ult., an important meeting was held at the College of Organists, Bloomsbury, in order to consider a proposal to place in St. Paul's Cathedral a memorial commemorating the distinguished composer, Sir John Goss. The works written for the Service of the Church by the late organist of St. Paul's Cathedral will certainly remain a lasting memorial of his musical gifts. For the period of thirty-four years during which he occupied that important post, together with the office of "Composer to Her Majesty's Chapels Royal," he wrote some thirty Anthems, a complete Service for the Burial of the Dead, several Services, detached settings of the Canticles, Hymn tunes, Chants, &c. Most of these sacred compositions are distinguished for their earnest religious tone, sound construction, and effective simplicity. Nor was sacred music the only branch of the art that Sir John Goss adorned. His glees are models of grace and refinement; he wrote some orchestral music for the Philharmonic Society; and, about fifty years ago, a little opera from his pen enjoyed a lengthened run. His "Introduction to Harmony and Thorough Bass," published so long ago as 1833, is still largely used, and has been the received text-book on the science for a couple of generations. At every church in English-speaking lands, where any pretension is made to a musical service, hardly a week goes by without some music of the deceased master being performed. It is quite fitting, then, that the estimation in which he is widely held should find expression in the erection of some memorial placed in the building where for so long a time he officiated. Sir John Goss entered the Chapel Royal as a chorister in 1811, succeeded Attwood at St. Paul's in 1838, and retired from active service in 1872. He then received the honour of knighthood for writing the Te Deum and anthem, "The Lord is my strength," for the Thanksgiving Service held after the recovery from illness of the Prince of Wales. His public career, therefore, extended over sixty-one years. It may be remembered that after his retirement from office he was entertained at a public banquet, and a considerable sum of money was raised with which the "Goss Scholarship" was founded and endowed at the Royal Academy of Music. At this institution he was for many years Professor of Harmony, and many of our best English composers have owed the venerable musician as their master.

The meeting of the 22nd was presided over by one of Sir John Goss's most distinguished pupils, Sir Arthur Sullivan. The resolution which he moved was in these terms:—"That in the opinion of this meeting it is desirable that the long and beneficial services rendered to music in this country by the late Sir John Goss, and the high esteem and regard in which he was uniformly held, should be publicly expressed by the erection of some suitable memorial in St. Paul's Cathedral, where he was Organist for a period of thirty-four years." This was seconded by Dr. J. F. Bridge.

A second resolution, nominating a Committee for carrying out the design, was moved by Sir George A. Macfarren, and seconded by Mr. J. Barnby. Subsequent resolutions, for the opening of a Subscription List, nomination of executive officers, thanks to the College of Organists for their assistance in the matter, and thanks to the Chairman, were respectively moved and seconded by Messrs. C. E. Stephens, H. Littleton, E. H. Turpin, Dr. E. J. Hopkins, Rev. T. Helmore, W. H. Cummings, Dr. J. Stainer, and Dr. W. H. Monk. The list of the Committee includes the Professors at the Universities, Sir George Elvey, Mr. W. H. Gladstone, M.P., Messrs. C. Steggall, C. G. Verrinder, C. J. Frost, H. Hiles, F. E. Gladstone, J. Higgs, W. A. Barrett, H. T. Pringuer, C. Warwick Jordan, G. A. Osborne, C. E. Stephens, A. Randegger, H. Gadsby, C. King Hall, J. B. Calkin, F. H. Cowen, E. Prout, H. C. Banister, C. Villiers Stanford, W. Parratt, C. S. Jekyll, W. G. McNaught, C. H. Lloyd, Albert Lowe, A. H. Mann, Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, and M. E. Wesley, in addition to the names already given. These gentlemen, together with most of the Cathedral organists, as the professional leaders of the Art in London and the Provinces, form a singularly strong Committee. Rarely has a more influential musical gathering been seen; and, although it was hardly necessary that the various speakers should eulogise the music, or dwell on the sterling and affectionate character of the deceased composer, the speeches which were made but publicly expressed the widely-spread estimation in which his memory is held.

The money required for the purposes of the Memorial is not large, as the tone of the meeting was rather to encourage representative subscriptions from Choirs, and the giving of moderate sums by individuals, than the collection of a few large amounts.

Mr. W. H. Cummings, of Brackley Villas, Dulwich, was appointed Hon. Treasurer, and Mr. T. L. Southgate, of Epsleade, Gipsy Hill, Hon. Sec. of the Fund.

It may also be added that Subscription Lists will be opened at Messrs. Novello's establishments.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE musical season here has come in, as usual, with a rush, and after a rigid fast of some five or six months, concert-goers are suddenly expected to undergo a succession of feasts which might disturb the digestion of a musical ostrich, if such a bird existed. Miscellaneous, classic, and oratorio Comperts follow one another in quick succession, and on the heels of operetta comes a solid fortnight of English Opera by the Carl Rosa Company.

Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," after some years of unaccountable neglect, has suddenly sprung into favour again. Unfortunately, the general public has not shown great eagerness to renew acquaintance with the work, and, though the attendance at the Festival Choral Society's performance on the 4th ult. was fairly good, the Philharmonic Union Concert on the previous Thursday, when the same oratorio was performed at popular prices, was, financially considered, a failure. The work had evidently been carefully and thoroughly rehearsed, under the direction of the able conductor, Dr. Swinerton Heap; there was a small but capital band, with Mr. Stimpson as organist; and the principal vocalists, Miss Clara Samuelli, Miss Dones, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Blower, acquitted themselves from first to last with great judgment, skill, and spirit. At the Festival Choral Society's performance, the principals were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Ludwig, and the band and chorus were on the usual complete scale.

The Concert of the month, however, judged from the popular standpoint, was that given by Messrs. Harrison on the 2nd ult., when the Town Hall was literally packed from wall to wall, with an audience of élite, eager to hear once again the siren strains of the incomparable Adelina Patti, who had been too long a stranger to the Midlands. With the world-renowned diva was associated a brilliant array of vocal and instrumental artists, including among the former Miss Robertson, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Signor Nicolini, Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. Herbert Reeves; and among the latter Mr. Emil Mahr (solo violin) and Mr. Oliver King (solo pianoforte), with Mr. F. H. Cowen as Conductor.

On the 8th ult. the Carl Rosa Company entered upon a fortnight's season at the Theatre Royal, opening with Bizet's "Carmen," in which Madame Marie Roze played the title rôle for the first time in Birmingham. "Mignon" was given on the following evening, with Miss Perry as the heroine—a very praiseworthy performance. Wednesday witnessed the first production in Birmingham of Mr. Goring Thomas's new Opera "Esmeralda," which was twice repeated to crowded houses in the course of the series. Miss Burns, for whom the part was written, makes a fascinating Esmeralda; but Miss Perry is wasted in the small part of Lady Fleur de Lys. As Captain Phobus, Mr. McGuckin appears to unusual advantage both dramatically and musically, and Mr. Ludwig in the melodramatic part of Frollo and Mr. Leslie Crotty as Quasimodo both acquit themselves very creditably. The only other absolute novelty this time was Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba," the merits of which have been sufficiently appraised in your columns. Although the music for the most part demands a cultivated ear for its appreciation, it excited great interest and won considerable applause from an overflowing audience, and it was generally recognised by the critical minority present, that if Mr. Carl Rosa's dream of creating a really representative school of English Opera is ever to be realised, it will be upon the lines rather of "Colomba" than of the more popular operas of the day, which embody the trite conventionalities of the French and Italian schools. Madame Marie Roze, as the noble but revengeful Corsican heroine, acted and sang throughout with conspicuous ability. The Orso of Mr. McGuckin was a very creditable performance, and Miss Albu as Lydia, Miss Clara Perry as Chilina, Mr. Ludwig as Barracini, and Mr. Snazelle as the brigand, were all very effective.

Mr. Stratton's first Chamber Concert, on the 15th ult., was signalled by the first production here of Hermann Goetz's Quintet for piano and strings (Op. 16), which was received with great enthusiasm by an audience fit though few. Other features of interest in the programme were an early Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Mr. F. H. Cowen, remarkably chiefly as evidencing the precocity of the composer's talent (he was only sixteen when he wrote it); an Impromptu-Caprice by Mr. Oliver King, and Haydn's String Quartet in D (Op. 64, No. 1).

At the first Orchestral Concert of the musical section of the Midland Institute on the 6th ult., the band, under the direction of Mr. Stockley, played Mendelssohn's Overture to "Athalia," the Overture and Turkish March from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," Sterndale Bennett's G minor Symphony, and the Andante from Schubert's unfinished Symphony. On the same evening Handel's "Israel in Egypt" was given by the Birmingham Musical Association, at the first Saturday Popular Concert.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Not many Concerts of importance have taken place in Bristol during the past month. The musical interest has centred upon the two Concerts given by the Festival Society at Colston Hall, on the 26th and 27th ult., too late for any notice of them to appear in this letter. The chief item in the programme of the 26th is Félicien David's Ode Symphony, "The Desert"; and Gounod's "Redemption" occupies the whole of Saturday afternoon (the 27th). The saying that "Bristolians do not care for novelties" appears to have been refuted on the present occasion, for at the time we write the tickets for both Concerts are rapidly being taken up.

Colston Hall was crowded on every part on Saturday evening, the 20th ult., when the Bristol Musical Association gave its eighteenth Concert, the programme consisting of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" (soloists, Miss Louie Phillips, Mrs. Gridley, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. Montague Worlock) and a miscellaneous selection. Mr. George Riseley presided at the organ as usual, and Mr. Gordon conducted.

Mr. Riseley has resumed his Organ Recitals, which generally take place on Saturday evening, and are fairly well attended. The want of the Monday Popular Concerts is greatly felt, especially by those who have done their best to support them. It seems incredible that there should be a difficulty in a city of the wealth of Bristol, in guaranteeing the expenses of these concerts; but, on these occasions, the rich citizens who profess a taste for the art, and whose place it is to support Mr. Riseley in his energetic undertaking, are decidedly "wanting." We are pleased to hear, however, that a movement is at last being made in the right direction, and that a committee and a body of guarantors are talked of, and though the latter seem as yet to be inhabitants of shadowland, we hope that they will assume a substantial shape in time for Mr. Riseley to organise the usual number of concerts during the present season. Mrs. Viner-Pomero's Classical Chamber Concerts are advertised to recommence on the 15th inst., with Mr. Henry Holmes again as first violin.

The musical season has now fairly begun at Exeter. The second of the series of People's Concerts was given on the 6th ult., at the Victoria Hall, before a crowded and enthusiastic audience, the programme consisting almost entirely of instrumental selections performed by the band of the Royal Marines, under the direction of Mr. H. Froehner. On the 19th ult., Mr. Farley Sinkins gave his two (morning and evening) annual Concerts. Mr. D. J. Wood, Mus. Bac., has resumed his Saturday evening Organ Recitals at the Victoria Hall, and increasingly appreciative audiences testify to the success of his efforts to awaken in Exeter a love for the highest class of music.

OBITUARY.

FRANCESCO SCHIRA, the well-known Italian composer and professor, died at his residence in London on the 15th ult. He had recently returned from his native country, where—like too many others who have been accustomed to better sanitary conditions than rule in the "sunny land"—he contracted a fever which rapidly developed itself on his arrival home. Signor Schira's death was unexpected at the moment, and his friends had not even time to gather around him. He expired almost alone. The deceased musician was born in the Island of Malta, September 19, 1815, but received his musical education at Milan, as a pupil of Basil, the head of the Conservatoire. He produced an opera, "Elena e Malvina," at the Scala, as early as 1832, and then accepted an engagement at Lisbon, where, as chef d'orchestre, he remained eight years, conducting performances at the Santa Carlos and composing, amongst other things, two operas. In 1842 Schira removed to Paris, there met with Mr. Madox of the Princess's Theatre, London, and accepted an engagement at his hands, making his first bow to an English audience on Boxing-night, the Opera being "La Sonnambula" in English. He remained at the Princess's two years, then removing to Drury Lane, tempted by an offer from Mr. Bunn. Schira's reign at the "national theatre" lasted till the early part of 1847, when it was transferred to Covent Garden, whither Mr. Bunn had removed. Here, the season being short and disastrous, he was unable to produce an opera entitled "Kenilworth," on which he based great hopes. Schira returned to Drury Lane with Bunn in January, 1852, but his labours were thenceforth more those of a teacher than a conductor. He produced a grand opera, "Niccolò de' Lappi," at Her Majesty's Theatre, in May, 1863, and in 1865 wrote another, "Selvaggia," for the Neapolitan Carnival. "Lia," a third work of the same kind, was soon after composed for Venice, and in 1873 Schira appeared at the Birmingham Festival as the author of a Cantata, "The Lord of Burleigh," words by Mr. Desmond L. Ryan. Save for the production of an Operetta, "The Ear-Ring," at St. George's Hall, this was Schira's last appearance as a composer. He was a pure Italian in taste and method. With modern developments he had no manner of sympathy, and made the fact known with such quaint emphasis that his remarks used to furnish matter for mirthful story. As a teacher he was in better repute than as a composer, for his music suffered mainly from the disadvantage of being out of fashion. Schira held the insignia of several orders, including that of the Crown of Italy, which he received from King Humbert's own hands.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Yorkshire Post, who signs himself "Concert," after deploring the depressing effect of the great triennial Festivals upon ballad, chamber, and orchestral concerts in the intervals of these gatherings, makes a suggestion which we give in his own words. Speaking of the amateurs in the Festival chorus, he says: "Let them be charged to the Festival account in the same way as the professional chorus singers; this would produce a good sum (£200 or £300), which might be handed over to a committee, willing to undertake the trust, for the purpose of causing concerts to be given, and for which the money handed to their keeping would form the guarantee fund. They might lose money or they might make it; but anyhow, they could give a series of good concerts at such prices that would meet all comers. A sum thus earned by amateurs and devoted to such a purpose would be, to my thinking, a great reward to them for their labour of love in helping to make the success of the late Festival. Such a sum drawn from the surplus fund would make but a small difference to so large a sum. It would most certainly be the means of affording opportunities for the production and hearing of good music. The only people who could complain would be concert speculators, and the scheme would really do for them what they most require—viz., save them from themselves, for do they not say 'we lose money by every concert we give.' The charitable institutions surely could not grumble, especially as there would be a chance of the scheme making a profit and adding still more to the charitable fund."

THE eve of the Festival of the Virgin Martyr, St. Faith, was, according to custom, kept in a highly festive manner at the Church of St. Augustine and St. Faith, Watling Street. For some years past, during Mr. South's organistship, this Service has created considerable musical interest, and it must be a matter of satisfaction to the lately appointed Organist, Mr. C. E. Miller, to find the interest unabated. The choir was augmented by eight boys from St. Paul's Cathedral, and their voices were heard to great advantage in the comparatively small church. As has been already announced in these columns, the service began with Schubert's beautiful Psalm (for treble voices), "The Lord is my Shepherd," the Canticles were sung to Stanford in A, a very fine setting, and the Anthem was a short selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul"—"Be thou faithful unto death" being exceedingly well sung by Mr. Newth of St. Augustine's Choir. After the service, an excellent rendering of Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" was given. Mr. C. E. Miller presided ably at the organ throughout the service.

WE quote the following from the St. James's Gazette: "Charles Gounod, in addition to being the gifted musician who has given us perhaps the most popular opera of the century, is also a poet in his leisure hours, and is an admirable reader of verse. In his revised work, 'Sapho,' he has the advantage of the association of that distinguished dramatist Emile Augier. Gounod's talent as an elocutionist was shown to special advantage one day this week in his formal reading of the libretto of the new opera to the artists of the Academy of Music, as the Parisians style the palace of music on the Boulevard. It was a marked departure on the author's part from the established routine to entrust the reading of his poem to his musical collaborator, but it must have been done thorough justice to; for, strange to say, all the artists are satisfied with their rôles."

THE handsome building lately erected by Mr. Culloden Rowan, at Enfield, and known as The Byculla Athenæum, was formally opened by Morton Latham, Esq., J.P., Mus. Bac., at an evening Concert given by the West Enfield Choral and Orchestral Society, on Wednesday, the 24th ult. Miss Clara Leighton, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Thurley Beale, Mr. Howard Reynolds, and Mr. Arthur Fox were the principals. Mr. Frye Parker was the leader of the Band, which numbered nearly fifty performers; and Mr. Collingwood Banks conducted in a most efficient and intelligent manner. The Society announces four Concerts for the present season, which will be supplemented by one in aid of the Royal College of Music, and also some smoking Concerts.

THE prospectus of Mr. Willing's Choir for the coming season promises four subscription Concerts, with an extra Concert on February 26, 1884. At the first, on December 11, Sir George Macfarren's new Oratorio, "King David," will be performed; at the second, on January 15, 1884, Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," the 57th Psalm, by E. H. Thorne (first time), and a selection; on March 25, Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; and on April 22, Wilfred Bendall's Cantata, "Perizabeh," and an operatic selection. The artists engaged are Miss Anna Williams, Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Ambler, Miss Mary Beare, Miss Hilda Coward, Miss Mary Davies, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Marian McKenzie, Miss A. Ehrenberg, Madame Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. T. Cassidy, Mr. E. Levetus, Mr. Frederic King, Mr. J. Bridson, Mr. Chaplin Henry, and Mr. Ludwig. At the extra Concert, on February 26, 1884, Handel's "Resurrection" will be performed, for which the following artists have been engaged: Miss Robertson, Miss Jessie Griffin, Miss Fanny Robertson, Madame Enriquez, and Mr. Santley. The Concerts will take place, as before, at St. James's Hall.

MR. REA'S Subscription Concerts at Newcastle-upon-Tyne for the season 1883-4 are announced to commence on the 21st inst., when Mendelssohn's Oratorio "St. Paul" will be performed, Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Palmer, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. W. H. Brereton being engaged for the principal parts. At the second Concert on February 11, 1884, a miscellaneous programme will be given, the vocalists being Miss Clara Samuelli, Miss Grace Damian, Mr. Henry Guy, and Signor Foli; Mr. Hollmann, solo violoncello, and M. J. Bisaccia, solo pianoforte. For the third Concert, about the third week in March, in consequence of the work being selected by the majority of the votes of the subscribers, Gounod's Sacred Trilogy "The Redemption" will be performed; on Wednesday, December 26, 1883, it is also intimated that the "Messiah" will be given; and on Easter Monday, April 14, 1884, "Israel in Egypt." At all these Concerts Mr. Rea's Choir will take part, and the orchestra will be complete in every department.

THE test music for the Wrexham Musical Festival, to be held in February next, says the Daily News, has now been determined upon, the Committee having had the valuable assistance in this matter of Mr. Henry Leslie, the founder of this class of musical gathering. There will be three choral competitions, the principal being open to choirs of not less than sixty voices. The test piece for this competition will be the chorus "Hushed in Death," by Dr. Hiles. The village choirs (from villages containing not more than 1,500 inhabitants) will sing "He, watching over Israel" ("Elijah"), and the juvenile choirs (consisting of children under sixteen years of age) "O, Happy Fair" (Shield). In addition to the prizes given for choral music, inducements will be offered for the encouragement of quartet and solo singing, violin playing, and sight singing. The Festival is already an assured success, most of the leading landowners and residents in the neighbourhood having signified their willingness to lend it their influence and support.

THE first of the Monthly Organ Recitals at St. John the Evangelist's, Waterloo Road, for this season, was given on Tuesday evening, 23rd ult., by Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. Bac., his programme including Sir R. P. Stewart's Concert Fantasia, a Prelude and Fugue by Hesse, Liszt's "March of Crusaders," and the player's own Communion, and Minuet and Trio. The programme was excellently rendered. Miss Linda Rivers, a promising young vocalist, contributed two solos—"Angels ever bright and fair" and Costa's "I will extol Thee"—in both of which she was accompanied by Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, Organist to the Church.

MR. JOHN NAYLOR, Mus. Doc., Oxon., Organist of All Saints', Scarborough, has been appointed Organist of York Minster, vice Dr. Monk, resigned. Dr. Naylor received his musical training at the Leeds Parish Church, of which he was deputy organist. He was then appointed organist of Scarborough Parish Church, and in 1873 he became organist of All Saints', Scarborough.

MR. SIMS REEVES made a short tour of South Wales during the early part of October, visiting Cardiff, Merthyr, and Swansea. He was announced to appear at Newport on the 8th ult., but a relaxed throat prevented him from fulfilling his engagement. A very excellent Concert was however given in that town by the other members of his "Ballad Concert" party—viz., Miss Clements, Miss Spenser Jones, and Mr. Barrington Foote. This is the second time that the people of Newport have experienced a similar disappointment. We may add that the greatest satisfaction was given by Mr. Nicholson (flautist) and Signor Bisaccia (pianist).—At Cardiff Mr. Sims Reeves duly appeared, but the noise made outside the Drill Hall by engines letting off steam interfered with a successful rendering of one at least of his songs; and there were signs of disapprobation amongst a portion of the audience, who at first misunderstood the cause of the interference.

AT the first concert for the present season of the Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society, on the 19th inst., Gounod's "Redemption" will (at the request of several subscribers) be repeated. On December 28 the "Messiah" will be performed; on February 15, 1884, a Classical and Miscellaneous Concert will be given; and Gade's "Psyche," with a selection, concludes the series on April 4. The artists engaged are: Miss Anna Williams, Miss Agnes Larkum, Miss Eleanor Farnol, Miss Clements, Madame Patey, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Emilie Lloyd, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Redfern Hollins, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Santley, Mr. Bridson, and Mr. Oswald; solo violin, Madame Norman-Néruda; solo harp, Miss Priscilla Frost; solo pianoforte, Mr. Charles Hallé; solo violoncello, M. Vieuxtemps. There will be a band and chorus of 300 performers; Conductor, Dr. Swinnerton Heap.

AT the first Concert of the present season of the Highbury Philharmonic Society, which takes place on Monday, the 26th inst., at the Highbury Athenæum, the programme will consist of Mendelssohn's "Athalie" for the first part, and in the second part will be included a new chorus (with orchestral accompaniment) by Eaton Faning, entitled "Daybreak;" a new part-song, for voices only, by Dr. Gladstone; and several orchestral pieces. Dr. Bridge, who retains his post of Conductor, has this year, we learn, acquired the services of a Sub-Conductor, who will superintend some of the vocal rehearsals, in order that more care and time may be devoted to the orchestral practices; the band, too, which has been slightly augmented, will also be strengthened by the addition of several professional members. We are glad to notice these encouraging signs of progress in this comparatively young Society, to which we heartily wish the success it deserves.

The Citizen says that Dr. Duncan, of 7, Wimpole Street, an amateur collector of violins, during his tour in Italy, visited Ameglia, where he was induced to inspect the instruments used by Paganini. These included a violoncello and four violins, which were in the possession of the widow of L. G. Germi, the intimate friend of Paganini. Dr. Duncan became enamoured of the instruments, and purchased them, together with some original MS. music. He also possessed himself of what is known as "the secret," which explains the magic power of Paganini. The Government of Genoa are said to be in communication with Dr. Duncan for the acquisition of the valuable and interesting relics which he has been fortunate enough to purchase. The instruments are by the great Cremona makers, Nicholas Amati and Stradivarius, and the violoncello is said to be the finest in existence.

THE prospectus of the Blackheath Chamber Concerts, under the direction of Mr. Alfred Burnett and Mr. Ridley Prentice, announces for the season 1883-84 four Concerts at the Alexandra Hall, commencing on the 20th inst. The artists are, first violin, Mr. Alfred Burnett; second violin, Mr. W. Frye Parker; first viola, Mr. W. Hill; second viola, Mr. W. Richardson; violoncello, Mr. W. E. Whitehouse; contrabasso, Mr. A. C. White; clarinet, Mr. Lazarus; bassoon, Mr. J. Hutchins; horn, Mr. T. E. Mann; and pianoforte, Mr. Ridley Prentice. The programmes, which are of the highest interest, include a new Pianoforte Quartet in F by Mr. E. Prout.

TWELVE Concerts are announced to be given by the Glasgow Choral Union for the forthcoming tenth season. The most important items in the Choral Concerts are Gounod's "Redemption" (January 17, 1884), Félicien David's Symphonic Ode, "The Desert" (January 15), and Berlioz's "Messe des Morts" (January 31). The programmes of the Orchestral Concerts contain many items of the utmost interest, which our limited space will not permit us to specify, but amongst the novelties we may mention Mr. Villiers Stanford's Serenade for Orchestra (composed for Birmingham, 1882), and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Orchestral Ballad, "La Belle dame sans merci" (composed for the London Philharmonic Society). The soloists, both vocal and instrumental, comprise the names of artists of the highest rank, and Mr. Manns will resume his post as Conductor of all the Concerts.

AT the Harvest Festival at St. Luke's, Berwick Street, Soho, on Sunday, the 1st ult., Tours's Morning and Communion Service in F, Barnby's Offertory Sentences "Whatsoever ye would" and "Not every one"; Evensong—Canticles, Dykes in F, and the anthems "Fear not, O land" (Goss), "In splendour bright," and "The heavens are telling," from Haydn's "Creation," were sung. On the 18th (St. Luke's day) Evensong was fully choral. Bunnett's Canticles in F, and for the anthem Spohr's "How lovely are Thy dwellings fair" were given. The service on the following Sunday (being in the octave) comprised Tours's Morning and Communion Service in F, Redhead's "God is not unrighteous," and Dykes's Evening Service in F, Spohr's anthem being repeated. Special Psalms and hymns were sung on each occasion; and at all the evening services the church was well filled.

THE Edinburgh Choral Union has issued its prospectus for the season 1883-4. Eleven Concerts are announced to be given, one on January 2, 1884, being an extra Concert. Two of the Concerts will be devoted to choral works—viz., December 11, Haydn's "Seasons," and January 16, 1884, Handel's "Ode to St. Cecilia" and Mackenzie's "Jason." The remaining Concerts will be orchestral, and the programmes comprise many features of interest, not the least being Mr. Villiers Stanford's Serenade for Orchestra, composed for the last Birmingham Festival, and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Ballad for Orchestra, "La Belle dame sans merci," which will be given for the first time in Scotland on January 9. The list of artists engaged include the leading names both in the vocal and instrumental departments. Mr. Manns (Orchestral Concerts) and Mr. T. H. Collinson (Vocal Concerts) are the Conductors.

THE Annual Harvest Festival at Holy Trinity Church, Tulse Hill, on the 13th ult., was more than usually effective. The first and second parts of Haydn's "Creation" were performed by a choir of about eighty voices, and an orchestra of thirty performers, under the direction of Mr. Humphrey J. Stark. The soprano solos by three of Mr. Stedman's choir boys, were given in excellent style; the tenor and bass solos were sung by Mr. Stedman and Mr. Poole; and the general effect attained by the large body of executants reflected much credit upon the Conductor, Mr. Stark. The Magnificat was sung to Mr. Stark's well-known setting in D. Messrs. W. E. Stark and Quance presided at the Organ. The crowded state of the church and approaches evinced the growing taste for orchestral services.

MISS ALICE ALOOF gave the first of her third annual series of Classical Concerts, at Brixton Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., when an excellent programme was well rendered. The bénéficiaire gained well-earned applause for each of her solos, which were Schubert's Fantasia Sonata in G major (Op. 78), and Schumann's well-known Noveltie in F. Miss Aloof was also very successfully associated with Mr. Lazarus and Mr. John Harrison respectively in Mozart's Grand Duo (Op. 108, from the Clarinet Quintet), and Moszkowski's pianoforte duet "From Foreign Parts" (Op. 23). A clarinet solo was very efficiently played by Mr. Lazarus; and vocal pieces were well sung by Miss Edith Aloof, Miss Marian McKenzie, and Mr. Arthur Thompson. Mr. John Harrison was an able accompanist.

AN Evening Concert was given at the Wandsworth Town Hall, on the 18th ult. The vocal portion of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was well rendered, the solos being efficiently sung by Miss Perfit, Mr. J. Heald, Mrs. Farley, Mrs. O'Donoghue, Messrs. Minot, Furnage, and Garratt. A sacred Cantata, "Babylon's Wave," by E. M. Flavell, was performed for the first time, and well received, the soprano solo, sung by Miss Perfit, being encored. The second part of the programme consisted of a Pianoforte Solo by Miss Rozel Ayers; another Cantata, by E. M. Flavell, "The Fairy Ring"—soloists: Misses Perfit, Coyte Turner, Fincham, and Messrs. Garrett and Hodges—and a miscellaneous selection. Mr. E. M. Flavell, R.A.M., conducted; Miss Ayers presided at the pianoforte; and Mr. C. W. Hanson at the harmonium.

MR. STEDMAN'S Concert at the Birkbeck Institution, on the 24th ult., introduced Miss Carlotta Elliott, Miss Polak, Mr. Stedman, Mr. Arthur Oswald, Mr. Thomas Pettit, M. Victor Buziau, and Mr. Stedman's choir boys, the latter being extremely effective in Smart's beautiful trio, "The corall'd caves of ocean." Miss Elliott sang Arne's "Where the bee sucks" in a most effective manner, and Miss Polak gave the "Letter Song" (Planquette) so well as to deserve a special word of commendation. Mr. Stedman (who sang Lady Arthur Hill's "Yester-year") and Mr. Arthur Oswald were thoroughly satisfactory, and M. Buziau was extremely successful in his violin solo. Mr. Pettit accompanied with his usual care.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were held at St. Thomas's Church, Elm Road, N.W., on the 5th and 7th ult. Calkin's Service in G was sung in the morning, and at the evening service Hubert Parry's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D; Anthems, "Fear not, O land" (Sir J. Goss), "Praise ye the Lord for His goodness" (Garrett), and "Thou visitest the earth" (Calkin). The above Services were supplemented on Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., by a Choir Festival and Organ Recital by Mr. J. Baptiste Calkin, when works by Hayes, Mendelssohn, Spohr, Gounod, Hesse, Kent, J. B. Calkin, Geo. Calkin, and Berthold Tours were rendered before a large and appreciative congregation.

PREPARATIONS are now being actively made at Westminster Abbey for the reception of the new organ, and amongst other works we may mention an extensive excavation in the Cloister quadrangle for the reception of a gas engine, by which the new instrument will be blown. The end of this month was, we believe, named as the time when the organ would be erected, but it is now hardly likely that it will be heard during this year. For the present it will stand upon the screen, but as it may be hoped and expected that this unsightly excrescence will one day be removed, it is probable that a plan of division, similar to that at St. Paul's Cathedral, will ultimately be resorted to.

WITH the desire of encouraging the Study and Practice of Music at Stratford, it is announced that a series of Public Competitions will be held in the various branches of music at the Town Hall, on a day or days in the month of April, 1884, to be hereafter named. The judges are Messrs. W. H. Cummings, W. G. McNaught, and Ridley Prentice. Prizes will be awarded to choral societies, church choirs, elementary singing classes, school choirs, quartet and solo vocalists, pianists, violinists, and composers. The regulations as to the carrying out of this undertaking are well considered; and every credit is due to the promoters of a scheme which promises such excellent artistic results.

THOSE interested in the protection of copyright works will thank us for drawing attention to the facilities which now exist for registration. Instructions describing the form of registering dramatic pieces, musical compositions, books, paintings, drawings, and photographs are printed, and will be sent gratis from Stationers' Hall on application to the Registrar, enclosing a stamp. These papers give such minute information respecting the copyright law that no person can possibly misinterpret them; and as a proprietor cannot legally enforce his right without registration, prompt action in the matter, we need scarcely say, is of the utmost importance.

THE competition for the "Tubbs" Prizes (two gold mounted Bows) took place at the Guildhall School of Music, on Tuesday, the 23rd ult. There were seven competitors, and the prizes were awarded to Miss Marie Schumann and Master George Leipold. Messrs. W. Frye Parker, Arthur Payne, and George Collins acted as judges. The competition for the "Lady Jenkinson" Prize (a purse of £5) took place on the same day, the work selected for competition being Beethoven's Concerto for pianoforte in E flat. There were nine competitors, and the prize was awarded to Miss Clarissa Mills. Messrs. J. Baptiste Calkin, Thomas Wingham, J. Henry Leipold, and the principal (Mr. Weist Hill) acted as judges.

THE 177th monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 5th ult. The programme was miscellaneous, and included songs by Miss M. Mackway, Madame A. H. Watkins, Madame Lansdell Sims, and Mr. F. C. Bevan; pianoforte solos by Miss Edith Mahon and Mr. George Sumpter; and several part-songs, among which were "Ye spotted snakes" (Stevens), "Oh! I were I but a drop of dew" (Cummings), "In the lonely vale of streams" (Callcott), and a chorus for male voices, "Comrades in arms" (A. Adam), the latter receiving a well-merited encore. The pianoforte accompaniments were played by Miss E. Mahon and Mr. F. R. Kinke. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

DEDICATION and Harvest Festivals were held in the church of St. Luke's, South Kensington, on Thursday, the 18th (St. Luke's day), and Sunday, the 21st ult. A special feature in the Sunday evening service was a performance of a portion of Haydn's "Creation"; the selection consisting of the first part of the work in its entirety, with the trio "On Thee each living soul awaits" and chorus "Achieved is the glorious work," from the second part. The chancel was tastefully decorated with fruits and flowers, which after adorning the sanctuary were destined for distribution among the patients of the Cancer Hospital, Brompton.

THE Harvest Festivals and Re-opening of Christ Church, Somers Town, took place on Sunday, the 14th ult. The services were fully choral, Tallis's responses being used. The anthems were "O Lord, how manifold" (Barnby) and "The heavens are telling" (Haydn), the Voluntaries being Handel's "Hallelujah" chorus and "The March of the Cavaliers," by Meadows. The music was under the direction of the Organist, Mr. W. W. Meadows. The choir sang with a precision and power creditable alike to themselves and their instructor. The Vicar, the Rev. Dr. O'Brien, preached the sermons to crowded congregations.

THE following candidates for Musical Degrees have satisfied the Oxford University examiners: For Music Bachelors—F. R. Greenish, New College and St. Martin's, Haverfordwest; W. G. Merrikin, New College, and St. Jude's, Hull; J. H. Righton, New College, and Westward Ho!; L. J. Rogers, Balliol College; A. H. Stevens, B.A., Worcester College, and Dover; W. A. Wrigley, New College, and Greenheys, Manchester. For Mus. Doc.—H. T. Pringuer, New College, and Stoke Newington, N.; F. J. Sawyer, New College, and Brighton; E. W. Taylor, New College, and Stafford; R. M. Winn, New College, and Harborne, Birmingham.

THE Grosvenor Choral Society gave its 140th Monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday, the 19th ult. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous, consisting of glees, songs, &c. Mr. J. G. Callcott's Cantata "Golden Harvest" formed the second part, the solo parts being sustained by Miss Annie Daymond (R.A.M.), Mrs. Isabel Browning, Mr. Henry Parkin, and Mr. Henry Baker. Miss Florence Hartley presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. G. R. Egerton conducted.

MR. WALTER WESCHÉ was the Organist at the Bow and Bromley Saturday Popular Recitals on the 6th ult., and played with success works by Bach, Himmel, Haydn, &c. He also brought forward a set of seventeen Variations from his own pen. Mr. George Cox was the vocalist, Mr. Woolhouse contributed solos on the violoncello, and Mr. W. G. Wood accompanied.

THE prospectus of the Belfast Philharmonic Society, under the able conductorship of Herr Adolf Beyschlag, announces for the coming season four Concerts, at the first of which, on the 23rd inst., Miss Ella Lemmens, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Henry Guy are engaged as vocalists, and Mr. Carodus as solo violinist. At the second Concert Mr. Alfred Cellier's Cantata "Gray's Elegy" (produced at the recent Leeds Festival) will be performed; and Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter," Mozart's "King Thamos," and Mendelssohn's Oratorio "St. Paul" are to be included in the programme of the third and fourth Concerts.

THE Festival of the London Church Choir Association will take place in St. Paul's Cathedral, on Thursday evening, the 8th instant, commencing at half-past seven. The order of service is as replete with novelty as any of its predecessors, all the hymn tunes and chants having been written for the occasion. Mr. C. E. Miller's new Evening Service (Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, in D) and Dr. Stainer's new anthem "And all the people saw the thunders," both written for the Festival, will be sung in their respective places, and after the sermon the "Hallelujah" Chorus is to be given.

A HARVEST Thanksgiving Festival was held at St. Saviour's Church, South Hampstead, on Saturday evening and Sunday, the 20th and 21st ult. The services were fully choral, and a setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, by Mr. A. J. Greenish (F.C.O.), the Organist, was sung for the first time. The anthems were "O Lord how manifold" (Barnby) and "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Stainer); the solos being effectively sung by Mr. A. Roberts and Master A. Murray. The floral decorations, including a cross forty inches in height, composed of camellias, were much admired.

THE Annual Harvest Festival at Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, was held on the evening of the 18th ult. The choir of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, was united with the regular choir of the Church; and the choral service (which included the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F, by Berthold Tours, and Smart's Anthem "The Lord hath done great things") was admirably rendered. The sermon was preached by the Ven. Archdeacon Farrar, and Dr. Gladstone presided at the organ. The offertory will be devoted to the fund for the fine new organ which is being built for the Church by Messrs. Walker and Sons.

THE Medical Guild of St. Luke held its anniversary Festival Service at St. Paul's Cathedral on the evening of St. Luke's Day, Thursday, the 18th ult. The musical part of the Service was rendered by a portion of the choir of the London Gregorian Choral Association, Mr. C. Warwick Jordan presiding at the organ. The anthem was from the Association's Service Book for the present year, namely, the Rev. S. S. Greathed's "Hail, gladdening light"; the prayers were intended by the Rev. William Russell, Minor Canon; and the Bishop of Bedford was the preacher.

THE new volume of the "Girl's Own Annual" is in every respect fully equal to its predecessors. It has claims on the attention of the musician from the fact of its containing articles of much interest upon the art, written by eminent professors and amateurs. Some refined and attractive musical compositions are also scattered through its pages; and in the forthcoming volume we are promised a series of practical papers on scale practising, pronunciation, and the production of the voice in singing, by Lady Macfarren.

THE new work, "Voice, Song, and Speech," by Messrs. Lennox Browne and Emil Behnke, advertised to appear on the 1st inst., will be delayed for a few days, in consequence of Messrs. Putnam and Sons, of New York, having taken half the first edition, on condition that publication in this country be postponed for fourteen days after the date of shipping to America, so that the work may make its appearance simultaneously in both countries.

THE Organ Recitals at the Church of the Holy Trinity, Gray's Inn Road, will be recommended by Mr. Stretton Swann on Sunday evening, the 4th inst., and will be continued on the first Sunday in every month after the evening service.

THE fine organ in St. Luke's Parish Church, Old Street, which is now being rebuilt by Messrs. Henry Willis and Son, will be re-opened on Sunday, the 11th inst., by Mr. C. W. Pearce, Mus. Bac., Cantab., Organist of the church. This instrument, which was originally built by Jordan and Bridge in 1733, possesses a certain amount of interest to amateurs, from the fact that the late Mr. Henry Smart played upon it for twenty-one years (1844-65) and performed at St. Luke's for the first time in public many of his now justly celebrated organ compositions.

THE Dedication Festival at All Saints' Church, Margaret Street, will be observed to-day (November 1) with High Mass at 11 a.m., at which Mr. Crowther Alwyn's elaborate Mass in F (produced some years since at the Crystal Palace Concerts), will be sung. At the Festival evensong, which commences at five o'clock, Mr. C. E. Miller's new setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (in D), composed for the forthcoming Festival of the London Church Choir Association, to which we allude in another paragraph, will be sung.

THE Dedication Festival of St. Mary's, Boltons, West Brompton, was held on Monday, the 22nd ult. The Services commenced with Choral Celebration, the music being Monk in C, followed by Choral Matins and Children's Service. At half-past seven Festival Evensong was sung, the ordinary choir being augmented by members of the choirs of St. Paul's, Bow Common, St. Peter's, Cranley Gardens, St. Mary's, Haggerston, &c., numbering altogether between 140 and 150 voices, under the direction of Mr. H. Buttery.

THE report of the Cheltenham Musical Society announces the highly satisfactory position which the Association now occupies. Two subscription Concerts have been given during the past season, when Bach's Magnificat in D, Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Nacht," and Dr. Dyer's "Salvator Mundi" were performed with much success. The small sum due to the Treasurer at the commencement of the year has been discharged through the liberality of some members of the Society, and a balance is now left in hand.

A CONCERT by the Members of the Bow and Bromley Institute Choir was given in the large hall of the City of London College, Moorfields, on Thursday evening, the 18th ult. The first part consisted of selections from Dr. Stainer's Cantata "St. Mary Magdalen," the solos in which were well rendered by Miss Braine, Miss Ada South, Mr. L. W. Rihill, and Mr. Brereton. The second part was miscellaneous, and included a pianoforte solo by Mr. McNaught and a flute solo by Mr. H. J. Dereham. Mr. McNaught conducted.

THE prospectus of the twenty-sixth season of the Brooklyn, U.S., Philharmonic Society, announces eight Concerts, eight public rehearsals, and four matinées. At the first Concert on the 3rd inst. Mr. Mackenzie's Second Scotch Symphony, "Burns," will be the novelty. Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" will be given at the second concert on the 24th inst., and "The Messiah" will form the Christmas Concert on December 22. The remaining programmes are not yet decided on.

ON Wednesday, the 17th ult., a Harvest Festival was held at Allhallows Church, Southwark, an Evensong with instrumental accompaniment being the concluding service. The anthem was Barnby's "O Lord how manifold," and the Te Deum Dykes in F. The service was well rendered by the choir, conducted by Mr. C. J. Viner, Organist of St. John's, Red Lion Square, and the accompaniments and voluntaries were admirably played by Mr. F. J. Perry, Organist and Choirmaster of the Church.

THE Liverpool Philharmonic Choral Society announces for its first season at St. George's Hall, four Concerts, at the first of which, on the 8th inst. Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be given, with Miss Mary Davies, Miss Janet Russell, Mr. H. Guy, and Mr. Ludwig as soloists. The remaining Concerts will be "The Messiah" (December 27), Cantata and Selections (February), and "Israel in Egypt" (March). Mr. A. Randegger is the Conductor, and Mr. W. T. Best will preside at the organ.

MADAME WORRELL gave her annual Evening Concert, on Thursday the 11th ult., at Brixton Hall. The bénéficiaire sang with her usual ability, gaining warm applause for each of her contributions. Praise may also be bestowed upon the following artists: Miss Matilda Roby, Miss Maud Cameron, Madame Osborne Williams, Miss Annie Butterworth; Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. F. H. Cozens, Mr. Fredk. Bevan, Mr. James Budd, and M. Albert (violinocello), Messrs. A. H. Behrend, and Turlé Lee accompanied.

THE first of another series of Free Concerts, to be continued weekly during the ensuing season, was given on the 18th ult., at the City Temple, Mr. W. P. Nichols occupying the chair. The attendance was very large, and the rendering of each item of the programme was loudly applauded. Mr. E. Minshall presided at the organ. Miss A. Dinelli was the solo violinist, and the vocal parts were well sustained by Miss Woodhatch, Miss E. Lloyd, and Mr. C. Chilley.

IT is a matter for much regret that the failing health, and consequent enforced retirement from professional life, of Mr. William Lemare, the well known conductor of the Brixton Choral Society, renders that body non-existent. With a view, however, to fill this gap, a choir, limited to one hundred voices, is in course of formation, under the title of the "Brixton Philharmonic Society." The post of Conductor will be occupied by Mr. Frederick Walker, and Mr. Alfred Izard will be the accompanist.

THE Birmingham Post hears from a trustworthy source that M. Gounod has made great progress with his Oratorio Mors et Vita, which he is writing for the next Birmingham Festival. A visitor, who has had the privilege of hearing some fragments of the work, is of opinion that it will be placed at the head of M. Gounod's compositions, and the composer himself is convinced that it will take rank in advance even of The Redemption.

DR. BRIDGE's Oratorio "Mount Moriah" is to be performed in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster (Arche-deacon Farrar's), on Wednesday, the 14th inst., at eight o'clock. The new organ, by Hill and Son, will be supplemented by a stringed orchestra, and after the service Dr. Bridge will play one of Handel's Organ Concertos, with orchestra.

THE Saturday Popular Organ Recitals at Bow have lost none of their popularity. The organists during October have included Messrs. Wesché and Bishop, of London, Mr. W. T. Best, of Liverpool, and Dr. A. L. Peace, of Glasgow; the hall being crowded at every performance. On Saturday next, the 3rd inst., the proceedings will be varied by a Pianoforte Recital by Herr Bonawitz.

A GRAND performance of Gounod's "Redemption" is to take place at Vienna, on the 4th inst., for the benefit of the "Pensions Institut" of the Royal Opera House. All the principal singers, as well as the chorus and orchestra, of that celebrated theatre will take part in the performance, the whole being under the conductorship of Herr I. N. Fuchs.

WE understand that Mr. Barnby's setting of the 97th Psalm ("The Lord is King"), written for and produced with so much success at the recent Leeds Festival, has already been selected for performance again at Leeds, by the Choral Society, and at Wolverhampton, Stafford, and Eton College.

THE Fifth Season of Smoking Concerts given at the Cannon Street Hotel, under the direction of Mr. C. T. Johnson, will commence on the 6th inst. It is intended to include some of the part music produced by the Cologne Choir during the season, and the occasional addition of boys' voices will again give variety to the programmes.

M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN will shortly return to England, and will undertake an extended tour in the provinces. He will also appear at some of the Popular Concerts before Christmas, and will give Pianoforte Recitals at St. James's Hall, on December 10 and 19.

IT is proposed to produce "The Birds" of Aristophanes at St. Andrew's Hall, Cambridge, in the last week of November. The music, by Mr. Hubert Parry, is nearly finished; the scenery is being painted by Mr. John O'Connor, and the dresses are being prepared by M. Barthé.

MESSRS. NOVELLO, EWER and Co. have purchased all the rights in Sir M. Costa's arrangement of "God save the Queen." It will shortly be published both in full score and orchestral parts.

THE first Concert of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society takes place on the 7th inst., when Berlioz's "Faust" will be given, with Madame Albani and Messrs. Lloyd, Pyatt, and Santley as soloists.

WE understand that Sir Julius Benedict will compose the incidental music for the new piece by Messrs. Herman and Wills, now in rehearsal at the Princess's Theatre.

A NEW organ, to cost £3,500, is to be built for Canterbury Cathedral. Only about £1,200 has been subscribed or promised.

ABOUT £1,100 has been raised towards founding a Bristol scholarship in connection with the Royal College of Music.

MR. F. G. EDWARDS has been appointed Conductor of the Lavender Hill Choral Society. There were eighty applicants for the appointment.

DR. GLADSTONE's Cantata "Philippi" will be performed, with orchestra, at a service in Blackburn on the 7th inst., conducted by the composer.

In consequence of the great pressure on our space we are compelled to omit many interesting notices, as well as several important letters from correspondents.

REVIEW.

Johann Sebastian Bach. By Philipp Spitta. Translated from the German by Clara Bell and J. A. Fuller-Maitland. In Three Volumes. Vol. I.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE literature of music, a feeble and sickly plant for generations, has within the last quarter of a century assumed a healthy appearance and grown apace, thanks to the enlightened, far-reaching, and enthusiastic labours of a number of enquirers into the history of our art, and of those to whom we principally owe its prodigious modern development. English musicians have no reason to lament overmuch because the majority of the monumental works to which we refer are due to foreign interest and enterprise. It is but natural that those countries which have given birth to the greatest masters should also produce the men capable of dealing most exhaustively with their lives and the influence they exercised in the world. But so long as these invaluable treatises remained in the language in which they were written they were sealed books here, except to the few possessed of the requisite linguistic knowledge for reading and comprehending them. Now, however, the time has arrived for presenting some of the best of them in an English dress, and so opening a treasure-house of knowledge, which our youngest musical students can explore at their ease. A twelvemonth since we were called upon to notice a translation of "Otto Jahn's Life of Mozart"; the first instalment of Spitta's equally remarkable monograph on Bach is now to hand; and in due course, let us hope, the researches of Pohl, Thayer, Nottebohm, and other writers will be made available for English readers. Only three years have elapsed since the concluding volume of Herr Spitta's work appeared in Germany, when by common consent it took its place as by far the most comprehensive and valuable literary effort on the subject of Bach which has appeared since the composer's death. In speaking of Miss Townsend's translation of Jahn's Mozart, we said, "By indefatigable, patient labour, overlooking nothing that had even a remote connection with his theme, he brought together perhaps all there is to know concerning his hero." These words may be applied with even greater appropriateness to the work now under consideration. In the first place, Spitta has to deal with a period more than half-a-century earlier, and the difficulty of investigation is thereby considerably increased. Again, Mozart only just reached half the Scriptural term of man's existence, and his art career begins and ends with himself; whereas the subject of Johann Sebastian Bach could not be treated fully without distinct reference to that wonderful family of whom he was the most distinguished among many gifted members. The student of German history cannot fail to be impressed by the peculiar position occupied by the Bachs at a time when the nation's fortunes were at their lowest ebb. The thirty years' war plunged the Fatherland into a state of material and mental poverty, from which time alone could rescue it, and meanwhile art influences were in complete abeyance. Yet, under these depressing circumstances, the Bach family maintained not only their simple piety and sturdy morality, but pursued the study and practice of music with irrepressible zeal, thereby keeping alive the spark which afterwards burst into a flame, the splendour of which has illumined the world. United by ties of principle as well as of kindred, a spirit of clanship was always present with them, however widely apart individual members of the household might be. Erfurt, Eisenach, and Arnstadt were the principal family centres, and it was the custom for many years to hold an annual gathering in one of these places, when ideas were exchanged and experiences related. Music formed an important feature in these reunions. "First they would sing a choral, then followed secular and popular songs, which, from the contrast with the previous pious mood, would, often by their quips and jests, rouse the mirth of both singers and hearers to a keen and cynical wit." Spitta gives biographical sketches of about twenty Bachs anterior, in the direct line or in point of time, to Johann Sebastian, together with copious particulars and analyses of their works. This latter branch of the subject must have entailed especial labour and difficulty, owing to contemporary indifference and the consequent destruction of valuable manuscripts. Readers will do well to appreciate the zeal and research which resulted in the collection of so much interesting material concerning Veit Bach of Weckmar, who was regarded by Sebastian as the forefather of the family; Johann of Erfurt; Heinrich of Arnstadt, who was universally loved and respected for his talent and amiable disposition, and who was followed to the grave by twenty-eight grandchildren and great-grandchildren; Johann Christoph and Johann Michael his sons, the former the most gifted of the older line and a composer of several fine motetts still extant, among them being "Ich lasse dich nicht" ("I wrestle and pray"), for a long time placed to the credit of Sebastian; Johann Christoph and Johann Ambrosius the twin brothers—as much alike in form and feature as Shakespeare's two Dromios; Johann Ernst of Eisenach, Johann Nicolaus of Jena, and many others. In his preface Spitta mentions all the pre-existing authorities who have contributed to the Bach literature, and the conclusion at which he arrives is that the only works of value are the biography of Sebastian by his son Emanuel and his pupil Johann Friedrich Agricola, published in Mizler's "Musikalische Bibliothek" in 1754; the article in Gerber's Biographical Dictionary, 1790; and Forkel's elaborate work "Bach's Leben, Kunst, und Kunstwerke," 1802. For many years musicians were accustomed to regard Forkel as the supreme authority in all matters connected with the subject, but the present writer, while crediting him with the possession of much valuable information derived from the two eldest sons of his hero, and with the enthusiasm of an earnest admirer, declares that his work must be used with caution. "For instance, he does not sufficiently distinguish the actual statements and judgments of Bach's sons from his own opinions, but, on the contrary has worked them up together into a continuous narrative, so that it is often hard to discover the beginning and the end of those passages which give the book its special value. Forkel's own judgment, even as regards Bach, is often strangely narrow. Frequently, no doubt, independent inquiry leads us to a result which coincides so exactly with Forkel's statement as to leave no doubt as to the value of the source whence he obtained his fact; but presently, again, we are startled by some evident inaccuracy or the discovery that, under the most favourable interpretation, he has misunderstood his authority. Finally, it must be borne in mind that Bach's sons may themselves have made mistakes. For these reasons, though we must necessarily refer to this work at every step, for due security we must accept none of its assertions without testing them." At the first blush Herr Spitta might appear to be guilty of a weakness apparent in many an author—that of making the value of his own labours more apparent by decrying those of his predecessors. A careful perusal of this volume, however, must tend to disabuse the mind of any such idea. The writer's temperament prevents him from accepting any statement on trust, and from first to last he is careful to authenticate every assertion by documentary evidence, frequently amusing in its thoroughness. In the anxiety to cram in as much information as possible, and to prove everything advanced, literary dryness may be occasionally perceptible, though never for many pages at a time. Facts are not invariably interesting because they are facts, and the reader desirous of mingling entertainment with instruction might wish that the author had been less conscientious in the pursuance of his task. The earnest enquirer after knowledge will, on the other hand, feel grateful for the light shed on the manners of the time, apart from mere musical technicalities, by Herr Spitta's minute investigations. An amusing instance of this occurs in the list of rules drawn up by a society styling itself the "College of Instrumental Musicians of the district of Upper and Lower Saxony, and other interested places." The general lawlessness and anarchy prevailing during the thirty years' war had affected the musical calling, and its members were exposed to insults and regarded in some quarters as little better than strolling vagabonds. To uphold the dignity of the art, and to raise the status of those who followed it, were the objects of the above-named Society, which was formed in 1653 by the town musicians of North and Central Germany. The statutes, which were twenty-five in number, were submitted to the Emperor Ferdinand III. Among them are the following, which give a fair idea of the spirit which animated the promoters:

"V. No man, whether he be master, assistant, or apprentice, shall divert himself by singing or performing coarse obscenities or disgraceful and immodest songs or ballads, inasmuch as they greatly provoke the wrath of Almighty God and vex decent souls, particularly the innocence of youth. Moreover, in considerable meetings and gatherings, those who serve the noble art of music are thereby brought into the greatest contempt."

"VIII. No man shall dare to perform on dishonourable instruments, such as bagpipes, sheephorns, hurdy-gurdies, and triangles, which beggars often use for collecting alms at house doors, so that the noble art would be brought into contempt and disgrace by them."

"IX. In specie shall every man abstain from all blasphemous talk, profane cursing, and swearing; but if any man sin in this matter he shall be punished for it by his master and fellows, according to their measure and the atrocity and frequency of his sinning; nay, he may even be expelled from the society."

"XVIII. . . . Inasmuch as venerable age, if accompanied by weakness, easily falls into contempt (all the former long years of great labour, pains, and service being forgotten) and youth generally preferred above it, if such weakness and impotency in a musician of great age, holding an appointment, should be so great that he cannot fulfil his duties, or only with much difficulty, and that the service of God and other attendances must necessarily be provided for; in that case someone shall be empowered to serve as a substitute for the old man; nevertheless, the old man shall enjoy half of the salary and his share of the profits, and all the remaining days of his life he shall be duly respected by the substitute or coadjutor, who shall in all things, if he is not unfit, give the precedence to him and await the blessing of the Lord; and all he does well and kindly for the old man shall be highly esteemed and regarded by every one, and God the Most High shall surely one day reward him and repay him."

We live in other days, and pride ourselves on better manners than those which prevailed in the middle of the 17th century, but the perusal of these quaintly worded regulations tends to the conviction that human nature was very much the same then as now, and we cannot altogether afford to laugh at the necessity of laws against the performance of "coarse obscenities or disgraceful and immodest songs," or the use of "blasphemous talk, profane cursing, and swearing."

But it is time to turn from the consideration of external matters to the principal character in the book. In a volume of 650 pages the first 180 are occupied by notices of the elder Bachs, their works and their musical and social surroundings. The English edition of the treatise will be in three instead of two volumes as in the original, and the present instalment deals with Bach's youth and the first ten years of his "Mastership." Of all the great composers no one has left such a meagre record of personal experience, and so little material for working up into an interesting narrative as the subject of the present work. In other instances we have the invaluable aid of correspondence to assist us in forming estimates of character and temperament. This element is here conspicuous only by its meagreness, and the want is not atoned for by the evidence of contemporary friends and associates. Again, the composer passed a singularly untroubled and placid career, offering no scope for treatment from the picturesque and romantic standpoint. We are therefore almost exclusively concerned with Bach as a musician rather than as a man, though ever and anon we come across an episode revealing the guileless simplicity of his nature and the primitive manners of his time. One such is the account of the memorable visit to Duxtehude at Lübeck, which for a time at least influenced his labours as a composer. His leave of absence from his duties as organist at Arnstadt was for four weeks, but he extended it to sixteen, and his answers to the outraged authorities on his return prove that he was unconscious of having committed any grave offence. The report from which the following quotations are taken is preserved among the archives of Sondershausen.

"Actum, de Feb. 21, 1706.—The organist of the New Church, Bach, is required to say where he has been for so long of late, and from whom he received leave of absence?"

"Ille.—That he had been to Lübeck with intent to learn thoroughly one or two things connected with his art, and that he previously asked permission from the Herr Superintendent.

"Dominus Superintendens.—That he had only asked such permission for four weeks, but had remained abroad quite four times as long as that.

"Ille.—Hoped that the organ meantime would have been played by the substitute he had put in, in such a manner that no complaint could be made on that score."

At the same time Bach was reproved for the florid ornamentation and elaborate harmonies he introduced when accompanying the chorals during service, whereby the congregation became bewildered, and failed to recognise their familiar tunes. It is quite possible that the young organist's genius got the better of him, and led him to play in a style that would have called for praise in concert performances, but which was quite out of keeping with the simplicity of congregational worship. He seems to have given himself very little trouble to please the good people of Arnstadt, for he was anxious to obtain a better position. But fortunately it is impossible to draw an inference from this that he was lacking in a spirit of integrity to his employers, for the contrary is proved in a letter written from Weimar to the elders of the Liebfrauenkirche at Halle, declining the appointment of organist, which he had at first coveted.

"I am quite of opinion," he says, "that a man cannot ascertain what his wages are in any place—as the perquisites must be reckoned as part of the pay—even in a few years, much less in fourteen days, and this is in some degree the reason why I accepted the nomination, and on the ground of my (unsatisfied) desires gave it up. Still, from all this, it is a long way to concluding that I have played a trick on the worshipful Collegium in order to move my gracious master here to increase my salary, since his highness has already shown so much favour to me and my art that I had no need to travel to Halle for an increase of salary. Thus I regret that the certain conviction of the most worshipful Collegium should have led to such a very uncertain issue; and to this I would add: Even if I were to get as good payment in Halle as here in Weimar, should I not still be bound to prefer the former service to the new? You, who understand law and equity, may best judge of this. I would venture to request you to lay this my justification before the most worshipful Collegium."

In turning to the subject of Bach's compositions, there is room for amazement at the immensity of Herr Spitta's labours in the examination of MSS., and the shrewdness with which he weighs divers and frequently conflicting authorities in order to arrive at the truth. As it was not the master's custom to date his autographs, and as a very small proportion of his early works were written for special occasions, we have in numberless instances nothing save internal evidence to guide us in fixing dates and periods, and in this inquiry Spitta's critical acumen is of inestimable value. In the present volume, which takes us to the end of the Weimar period, the reader will find exhaustive analyses of the organ works, which may be strongly recommended for perusal by organists possessed of the excellent but most unchronological Peters's edition. The aid of illustrations in music type is freely resorted to, and did space permit we should like to quote some of the masterly descriptions and arguments, whereby in some instances the author determines the date of a piece by the treatment of the pedals, the turn of a phrase, or even an accent. Controversy has long existed in this country as to the proper manner of performing Bach's Toccatas and Fugues. As no directions are given for registering, many excellent players have not hesitated to assert, and even practised what they preached, that one uniform tone-colour should be employed throughout, heedless of the fact that Bach did not write these works for publication, and that a musician who preferred the clavicord to the harpsichord, because of its powers of expression, would scarcely adopt a dull and monotonous style of organ-playing. Spitta declares positively, and adduces incontrovertible evidence in support of his assertion, that Bach's organ performances were characterised by a wonderfully ingenious use of the stops. "This art, which was allied to the orchestration of later composers, he displayed especially when a powerful instrument fully supplied with stops came under his hand."

It was at a later period than that of which the present volume treats that the composer penned the most important of his choral works. But several of the cantatas are described, and notably those exquisite examples "Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit" and "Ich hatte viel Bekümmerniss." In the course of his disquisitions on the growth of the cantata form and the manner in which Bach's church works were performed, we come across a statement calculated to upset a very general belief in this country. It has been asserted times out of number that Lutheran chorals were introduced into the church cantatas in order to give the congregation opportunities for taking part in the performances; and when Mr. Barnby produced the St. Matthew Passion Music the purists were loud in their expressions of blame at the course he adopted in giving these beautifully harmonised tunes to the voices unaccompanied, though their exquisite effect as rendered in this manner was generally acknowledged. This is what Dr. Spitta says on the point: "Strangely enough, in these later days, many critics have opined that the congregation joined in the final choral. Then, indeed, Bach might have saved himself his artistic labours. To anyone who can appreciate the church cantata as a real form of art it will be inconceivable how anyone can even imagine the possibility of such a naturalistic travesty. It cannot even be admitted that the choir of singers represents an ideal congregation. In church music it does not signify in the least who it is that sings: what is sung, and how, is the only question." Here the whole vexed question of choir versus congregational singing is comprised in a few words. But what is of greater moment, from a purely artistic point of view, is the authority Dr. Spitta's statements give to conductors to render Bach's arrangements of the old chorals in such a manner as will best secure the effect of his beautiful harmonies.

To direct attention to all the points of interest in this volume would need several lengthy articles, and we must be content with naming but one more matter, which musicians will regard as one of the most valuable features of its contents, namely, the exhaustive essays on Bach's art contemporaries and immediate predecessors. It is only by the knowledge of the state of music in North Germany at his advent that a full estimate of the splendour of his genius can be secured. We find many pages devoted to Buxtehude, the justly celebrated Lübeck organist, who might almost be termed the father of pure organ music (that is, compositions not founded on chorals); also full particulars of the art labours of Pachelbel, Kuhnau, and many others whose works may be forgotten, but who were pioneers of music, preparing the way for others more gifted, perhaps, and certainly more favoured in time and circumstance than themselves.

In one sense the translation of the work is preferable to the original edition. Dr. Spitta tells us in a preface, dated Berlin, Summer of 1880, that the supplement to the second volume (consisting of fresh material gained since the publication of the first) is here worked up into the text, certain errors which had crept in being of course eliminated. With regard to the translation itself it is necessary to bear in mind the difficulties inherent in a task of this description. Without being obscure, Spitta's style is thoroughly German in the employment of lengthy and involved sentences, and it would be hopeless to expect unanimous acceptance of the way in which some of his periods have been done into English. We shall leave the quidnuncs to the discussion of these matters, merely referring to a few points to where musical technicalities have not been rendered in the terms most familiar to our countrymen. Thus at page eighty-one mention is made of double counterpoint on the eighth and tenth, and at page fifty-three "bewegten" is translated agitated, whereas flowing would be a far preferable word. At page seventy, C mol is taken to mean C major. At page eighty-five, the omission of a colon after the first "F major" makes nonsense of the following sentence:—"After a close in the common chord of E major, Joh. Christoph, with three steps, brings himself into F major, C major, A minor, F major." These are trifling inaccuracies, and do not affect the general literary merit of the book, which scholars will freely recognise. It is unnecessary to say more to recommend it to the notice of musicians. To those who are unable for obvious reasons to possess themselves of the "Bach Gesellschaft" edition of the works, it will be especially valuable as affording a critical and descriptive synopsis of the vast inheritance left to us by the master.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE first performance of "Tristan und Isolde" at the Imperial Opera House, at Vienna, took place on the 4th ult., under the conductorship of Herr Hans Richter. To the great disappointment and horror of the Wagnerites, a great many cuts had been made in the music, but the performance, as a whole, must nevertheless be considered to have been a success. The principal parts were in the experienced hands of Frau Materna, Herr Winkelmann, and Herr Scaria. The scenery was magnificent, and the orchestra discharged its onerous duties in a manner which fully sustained the reputation of this renowned body of instrumentalists.

The first of the many novelties announced for this season at the Hamburg Town Theatre was produced on the 8th ult., when the new opera "Schloss de l'Orme," by Richard Kleinmichel, was performed. The work does not present any novel features, and the composer adheres rather to the orthodox style of music. A moderate success was attained, much of which was due to the excellent performance under the conductorship of Herr Zumppe. We are glad to hear that the first conductor of this theatre, Herr Sucher, has recovered from his recent illness, and has been able to resume his duties.

A war has recently been carried on in the press of the capitals of Germany and Austria—viz., Berlin and Vienna. The celebrated composer of dance-music, Johann Strauss, who is an especial favourite with the Vienna public, resolved recently to leave the Austrian capital and take up his abode in Berlin. He introduced himself to the latter city with a new operetta, "A Night at Venice," but the work, on account of its stupid libretto, met with but small success, although the music was declared to be very charming and full of beautiful melodies. The operetta was afterwards given at Vienna, and the Viennese public emphatically reversed the verdict of Berlin by receiving the work with unprecedented enthusiasm.

Only one novelty is being prepared at the Court Theatre of Weimar for the coming winter—viz., "Quentin Durward," by the Belgian composer Gevaert. Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini," which was performed on this stage for the first time in 1853, under Liszt's conductorship, will, however, be remounted, with the well-known tenor Herr Schott in the title rôle.

Our contemporary, the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung, reports having seen advertisements in newspapers from the south of France of a new invention, termed "pomme phonophile." The prospectus says that this wonderful pomade will procure for every one who will apply it to his throat (outside) for six weeks a beautiful tenor voice, and that it will also preserve the voices of existing tenors to the end of their days. "We hope," says the editor of the above-mentioned paper, "that the clever inventor will not stop short, but will provide us with a soprano hair-oil, a bass-voice soap, or a baritone tooth-powder."

Hans von Bülow will take his celebrated Meiningen Orchestra on a concert-tour through South Germany during January next.

Rubinstein is at present in Hamburg conducting the rehearsals for his new Opera "Sulamite," which is to be produced during the present month. As this work will not fill a whole evening, he has written a new one-act opera called "Unter Räubern." His opera "Maccabäer" will also be given at the end of this month.

The Tenth Middle Rhensish Festival will be held at Mayence in July next. Brahms's "Triumphlied," a Symphony by Schumann, Wagner's "Faust" Overture, and Handel's "Messiah" are some of the chief works to be given. Herr Friedrich Lux will be the conductor.

For the centenary of the birth of Methfessel, the composer of many popular German songs and glees, which takes place on the 6th of October, 1885, a monument is being erected at his birthplace, Stadtilm, a small town in Thuringia.

Adalbert von Goldschmidt, the composer of the Oratorio "Die sieben Todsünden," has written words and music of a new work, "Helianthos," which will be performed at the Vienna Opera House next season.

The fair Rhine-Maiden, Loreley, has inspired another composer, Herr Mohr, Kapellmeister in Hamburg, who has written an opera on the well-worn subject. The work will be first performed at Breslau.

A committee has been formed in Berlin for the purpose of providing a handsome statue of Beethoven for the German capital.

It is reported that Franz Liszt is occupied in writing a third Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra.

It is proposed to hold a grand Festival at Hamburg, in 1885, to celebrate the bi-centenary of the birth of Handel.

Herr Kotck, a violinist in Berlin, played at a Concert which he gave recently there three entire violin concertos.

M. Padeloup resumed his "Concerts Populaires" in Paris, on the 21st ult. A large audience assembled, and the programme comprised Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in F (admirably played by M. Theodore Ritter), Schumann's Symphony in C, Beethoven's Serenade for strings, Andante Symphonique, by Leon Husson (first time), and Berlioz's Carnival Overture. M. Padeloup proposes during the season to give concerts devoted to the works of modern Russian and Italian composers, and will also produce Mozart's twenty-seven Pianoforte Concertos. These concerts have now reached their twenty-third year.

The proposition recently made by M. Hippeau, the editor of La Renaissance Musicale, has been acted upon by the formation of an international society at Paris. The society consists of ten French and ten foreign composers, and it is intended to give choral and orchestral concerts on a large scale at the Trocadero next spring. The president of the society is M. Ernest Reyer.

M. Salvayre is said to be about to write an opera to a libretto by MM. Wolf and Millaud, founded on Goethe's "Egmont." New operas are also reported to be in progress by M. Massenet for the Grand Opera, Paris, on the subject of "Le Cid"; by Carl Grammann, "Thusnelda," now in rehearsal at Wiesbaden, and by an Italian composer named Achille Graffigna, on the subject of Cimarosa's "Il Matrimonio Segreto."

The Subscription Symphony Concerts of the Musical Society, in St. Petersburg, are announced to commence on the 3rd inst. Following the example of the Philharmonic Society of London, each concert will have a different conductor. Rubinstein, Brahms, and Saint-Saëns are those already mentioned, while some well-known Russian composers will also find opportunity afforded them to introduce themselves and their works to the public of the Russian capital.

Rubinstein's Opera "Kalaschnikoff, the Merchant of Moscow," which, after its performance some years ago at St. Petersburg, was pronounced dangerous to Russian society, and its further performance prohibited, has been liberated and will be produced shortly at both Imperial Opera Houses at St. Petersburg and Moscow. The Emperor of Russia is said to have himself communicated the news to the composer.

The statue erected at Smolensk in honour of the celebrated Russian composer Glinka was unveiled on September 28.

The Indipendents of Trieste, under date of the 18th ult., says: "Mr. George Carter, of London, the author of many esteemed and clever compositions both sacred and secular, has finished his new Opera 'Nerone.' Renowned Italian musicians, who have seen this new work of Mr. Carter, speak of the music as being beautiful, full of melodious inspiration, and learned and pleasing orchestration."

Wagner's "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg" has been translated into Swedish by Franz Hedberg and will be performed at Stockholm during next season.

Herr Jules de Swert recently played his new Opera "Graf Hammerstein" before a circle of musical notabilities at Weimar, including Dr. Franz Liszt, Hof-Kapellmeister Lassen, and Herr von Loën, the Intendant of the Weimar Court Opera Theatre. The work was accepted at once for performance, and will be given for the first time on the occasion of the celebration of the birthday of the Grand Duke of Weimar. It has also been secured for production at Mayence, Darmstadt, and Magdeburg.

The Music Pavilion at Long Branch, near New York, was burnt on the 7th ult. One of the musicians, named Friedrich, a German, fell a victim to the fire in trying to save his instrument. The value of the instruments lost is said to amount to 5,000 dollars.

The St. Cecilia Society of Boston, U.S., announces that the programmes of the four Concerts of the coming season will include the following works: Liszt's "Saint Elizabeth," Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," Mendelssohn's "Athalie," Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," Schumann's "Faust," and Saint-Saëns' "Noël."

Ferdinand Bräuntung, the well-known conductor of the Musical Festivals of the Lower Rhine and organ virtuoso, died at Aix-la-Chapelle, on the 22nd of September, aged fifty-three.

We regret to announce the death of Enrico Piatti, brother of the esteemed violoncellist, and himself an excellent virtuoso on the same instrument.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

F. O. BULL.—We have known many persons successfully prepared for Examinations by the system of correspondence; but you must be careful to select an accredited Professor.

J. G.—Our correspondent will find his question fully answered by a paragraph in our present number relating to the registration of copyright works.

A. J. BRYANT.—We cannot insert the letters of correspondents who merely write to say that they differ from us in opinion upon the merit of works performed in public.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERGAVENNY.—The Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services at Llandaff Skyrdd Church, were held on Wednesday, the 10th ult. The Church was tastefully decorated, and the attendance unusually large. The initial opening of the organ took place on the same occasion, Mr. C. Caird, Organist of the Church presiding. The March "Isle of Roses," by Mr. J. Conway Brown, effectively displayed the salient qualities of the instrument, and the additions recently made by Mr. Vowles, of Bristol, place this organ amongst the best in the Principality. The whole of the expenses of the alterations and extension were borne by Mr. Crawshaw Bailey, of Maundiff Court. The Choir sang, with much effect throughout the day, and the collections considerably enhanced the funds of the Farmers' Provident Society (Widow and Orphan Fund).

ALNWICK.—The Annual Festival was held in the Parish Church (St. Michael's) on September 28, when the choir, together with that of St. Paul's church, and some amateurs, numbering eighty voices, gave a very fine rendering of Dr. Gladstone's Oratorio Philippus. The Rev. J. Powell Metcalfe conducted, and Mr. C. Stanley Wise accompanied. The solo parts were well sung by the Misses Cockburn, Thompson, Wright, Messrs. Common, Cunningham, Dobson, Hackett, Moir, Pickard, Straford, Thompson, and Wilson.

ALRESFORD.—On Tuesday, the 2nd ult., a very successful performance of Van Bree's Cantata, St. Cecilia's Day, was given at the Town Hall by the Alresford Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Mr. C. H. Morgan. The band and chorus numbered about thirty. The solos were artistically rendered by Miss Kate Spary, of Bristol. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, including songs by Miss Spary and Miss Martin.

AVSARTH.—The Harvest Thanksgiving was celebrated in the Parish Church on Wednesday, the 17th ult. The service was fully choral. Special Psalms were sung to Mornington, Rimbault, and Humphreys in C, with Dr. Bunnett's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F. The anthem was Sidenham's "O give thanks," Master J. Davies singing the part assigned to the tenors as a solo. Mr. Maurice Davies presided at the organ, and at the conclusion of the service played the last movement of Mendelssohn's First Organ Sonata.

BELFAST.—The Choral Association may be congratulated on the decided success of the first of the series of Popular Concerts given on Tuesday evening, September 25, in the Ulster Hall. The Concert took place under the patronage of Colonel Stokes and officers of the Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers, whose Band gave several selections and accompaniments with much effect. "Three Doughty Men," composed for the Association by Mr. W. W. Pearson, and several other well chosen part-songs and glees, were sung by the Choir with a refinement and precision which thoroughly sustained the Society's reputation. The vocal solos and duets were well rendered by Miss Emma Neill, Miss May Neill, Miss M. Mitchell, Messrs. Young, Gilligan, Mahood, and Matthews. The members of the Choral Association gave the first Subscription Concert of the season, in the Ulster Hall, on the 8th ult. A miscellaneous programme was well rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Helen D'Alton and Mr. Bywater. Mr. Kempton conducted.

BRADFORD.—On Sunday, the 14th ult., the annual Harvest Festival was held in St. Paul's Church, Manningham, when full Cathedral Services were sung. Sullivan's Te Deum, J. H. Rooks' Jubilate, and Gadsby's Harvest Anthem "Blessed be the name of the Lord," were given with great effect in the morning. In the evening a Service of Dr. Wesley's to the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, with Beethoven's "Hallelujah" and Mendelssohn's "The night is departing" from the Hymn of Praise, were finely rendered. The powerful professional choir of the church was augmented for the occasion. Mr. James H. Rooks, the Organist of the church, accompanied with his usual ability. A novel feature in connection with the above service was, that by the aid of the telephone it was listened to and heard with great distinctness in Leeds, Halifax, Huddersfield, and several adjoining towns.

BRIDGE OF ALLAN.—On Monday, the 1st ult., a meeting was held for the purpose of forming a Choral Society. Forty-two names were at once enrolled; but it is anticipated that the Society will start with at least fifty members. Mr. Erskine was elected Conductor, and the work to be placed first in rehearsal is Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion.

BRIGHTON.—The members of the Sacred Harmonic Society gave the first Subscription Concert of their thirty-eighth season in the Banqueting Room of the Royal Pavilion, on the 9th ult. The programme consisted of selections from Handel's Semestra and Mendelssohn's St. Paul. The solo vocalists were Miss E. Umphrey, Miss A. Heale, Mr. J. Tapley and Mr. J. T. Hutchinson. The choruses were excellently rendered. The accompaniments were played on the piano-forte and harmonium by Mr. E. De Paris and Mr. A. Burton. Mr. R. Taylor conducted.

CARLETON.—A Ballad Concert was given in the Drill Hall, on the 4th ult., which was very successful. The artists were Mrs. A. Morris, Madame Frith, Mr. E. Hall and Mr. Frith, vocalists; Madame Helene De Lisle, violin, and Madlle. Marie Brunelle, pianoforte.

CHARLTON.—An Organ Recital was given in St. Paul's Church on Saturday afternoon, the 6th ult., by Dr. C. J. Frost. The congregation listened with great attention to the interpretation of a well-selected programme, all the pieces in which were excellently rendered. Vocal items were sung by Master H. Emus, Messrs. H. T. Cooper, C. R. Proctor, Williams, and Wakeley.

CHELMSFORD.—On the 10th ult. an Evening Concert was given at the Institute by the British Glee Union (Messrs. Barnby, Parkin, King, and Prenton) assisted by Madame Clara West, whose songs were highly appreciated. An especial feature in the programme was the glee and madrigal singing by the male-voice quartet. The Concert was in every respect a success. Mr. Lovett King acted as accompanist.

CLECKHEATON.—The Harvest Thanksgiving services were held in the Church of SS. Philip and James's Schools, on Sunday, the 14th ult. At the morning service the Te Deum and Kyrie were sung to settings by the Organist. There was a shortened service at 3 p.m. with Litany, T. Minton's anthem, "Praise the Lord, O my soul," being sung. Evening service included Thos. Smith's harvest anthem "Thou crownest the year," and special hymns. Mr. Frederick W. Whitehead played with much effect on the organ (previous to and after the evening service) "With verdure clad" (Haydn), Allegretto in F from 4th Sonata (Mendelssohn), "Nazareth" (Gounod), "Harvest Festival Thanksgiving March" (J. B. Calkin), and "Grand Chorus" (Guilmant). As usual, the services were fully choral.

CROYDON.—An Evening Concert was given on the 9th ult., in St. Saviour's Room, before a large and appreciative audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Bessie Diamond, Miss Stiele, Mrs. Cameron, Messrs. E. N. Day, Austen, and Burgess. Miss Diamond's singing was greatly appreciated, encores being demanded; and Mr. E. N. Davis was highly successful in his solos. Mr. J. Wildman gave a violinello solo with much effect, and the Sunday School Choir rendered some part-songs under the able conductorship of Mr. C. H. Smith. Mr. C. J. Wood, Organist, was an efficient accompanist and pianist. A vocal solo, under the direction of Mr. Henry Prentiss, was sung on the 18th ult., under the direction of Mr. Henry Prentiss. The artists were Madame Ernst, Miss Evelyn Ellice, Mr. Henry Parkin, Mr. Lovett King, Miss Kate Chaplin (solo violinist), and Mr. Thomas Davy (solo cornet). The principal items in a very interesting and varied programme were the trio "I Naviganti"; Schumann's "Gipsy Life"; and the Violin Solo of Miss Kate Chaplin, all of which were entered. Mr. Lovett King was an efficient accompanist, and sang several buff songs.

CWMBRAN.—The first of a series of Concerts announced by Mrs. A. Morris was given at the Wesley Hall, on the 2nd ult. Mrs. Morris was assisted by Madame Frith, Messrs. Hall and Frith, vocalists Madame De Lisle, violin, and Mdlle. Brunelle, pianoforte.

DOWNTON, WILTS.—An Amateur Concert was given in the British School-room, on the 12th ult., by Mr. Augustus Aylward and about twenty-five members of his amateur orchestra from Salisbury. The vocalists were Mrs. Wells and Mr. Acott (of the Cathedral choir). The Concert (which was for a local charity) was patronised by the Earl and Countess Nelson and the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood. The programme was highly appreciated. Mr. Augustus Aylward was the Conductor and accompanist.

EASTBOURNE.—The third and last of the series of Subscription Concerts organised by Mr. Julian Adams was given at the Floral Hall, Devonshire Park, on Saturday evening, the 13th ult., and was highly successful. The vocalists were Mdlle. Mathilde Enquist and Mr. Charles Chilly. The violin playing of Miss Dinelli was a feature of the evening. Mr. Adams conducted, and also presided at the pianoforte.

ENFIELD CHURCH.—The Harvest Festival Services in the Royal Small Arms Factory Church were held on Sunday, the 14th ult. The Morning Service (fully choral) was Sullivan in D; Special Psalms lxvii., to Chants by Smith in G, and Hopkins in G; anthem, "Ye shall dwell in the land," by Dr. Stainer. The Sermon was preached by Rev. C. H. Roberts, B.A. (Chaplain). At the Evening Service (also fully choral) Jackson's Service in F was sung, and Special Psalms cv., cvi., to Chants 190 and 212 in the York and Lincoln Book; anthem, "Sing praises to God," by Warcing. The evening preacher was Rev. L. G. Fry, M.A., Vicar of St. James's, Upper Edmonton. At the conclusion of the Evening Service, select Voluntarys by various composers were played by the Organist, Mr. E. J. Holt. The church was crowded, and the musical attainments of the choir reflect the highest credit on their talented Precentor, Mr. Holt, father of the Organist.

FAIRLAWSON.—The local press speaks highly of a new Cantata, called Davida, the Shepherd Boy, which was twice given before large audiences, on Sunday, the 9th ult., at the New Jerusalem School, the principal vocal parts being effectively sustained by Mr. Thomas Allen. The first Concert of the season in connection with the educational department of the Fairlawson Co-operative Society took place in the Large Hall, Dob Lane, on the 9th ult. The singers were Miss Pattie Standen, Miss Dutton, Mr. K. Thompson, and Mr. James Whitaker; solo pianist, Miss Banks; all of whom were most successful, receiving throughout the evening warm applause from a crowded audience.

FALMOUTH.—The Choral Society began its session on the 16th ult., with Gaul's Holy City, under the conductorship of Mr. C. W. Robinson. There has been a considerable accession to the Society since its re-formation, and it bids fair to be very successful.

HADDINGTON, N.B.—On Wednesday evening, the 3rd ult., a highly satisfactory performance was given, in the Assembly Rooms, of Farmer's Oratorio Christ and His Soldiers, by the members of the Trinity Episcopal Church choir, assisted by a small orchestra. There was a large and appreciative audience. The soloists were Masters Milne and Rutherford, Mr. A. Crimston, Mr. James, and Mr. Crombie. Mr. R. E. Martin conducted.

HEATON.—At the annual Harvest Festival at St. Barnabas's Church, a selection of music from The Creation was performed on Saturday evening, the 20th ult., in the presence of a large congregation. After the harvest hymn had been sung, the first part of the evening service was read by the Rev. G. B. Flynn, curate in charge. The principal parts in The Creation were sustained by the Rev. R. W. Easton, Miss Chieroffi, and Mr. Charlesworth Prince. Mr. James Rooks, of St. Paul's, presided at the organ. The choruses were well rendered by the choir, assisted by several members of the Bradford Festival Choral Society, the leader being Mr. Alfred Padfield, Choirmaster of the church.

LANIVET, CORNWALL.—At the Harvest Festival, held in the church on Tuesday, the 2nd ult., there was full Choral Service, with appropriate hymns. The anthem, "The earth is the Lord's," was excellently rendered by the large choir, under the direction of Mr. Downing, Choirmaster, and Mr. C. E. Juleff (Organist of St. Austell Church) who presided at the organ, and at the conclusion of service gave a selection of music from the works of Handel, Clark, Edwards, and Batiste, which was highly appreciated.

LENZIE, NEAR GLASGOW.—The members of the Literary Institute inaugurated their season on the 12th ult., by giving a Grand Concert, which was chiefly supported by the local amateurs of the district, headed by Dr. Smith. The programme consisted of vocal and instrumental selection, which was on the whole exceedingly well executed. The instrumental part included Wagner's March from Tannhäuser, and Auber's Zanitta Overture. The part songs "A Franklyn's dogge," "May-day," "All among the barley," and the trio "Vadasi via di qua," were especially successful.

LEWES.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at All Saints' Church, on Sunday the 14th ult. The hymns in the morning were Nos. 382, 381, and 379. The chants used were from "The Cathedral Psalter," Venite to Alcock; Psalms, C. E. Stephens and Dr. Garrett; Te Deum, H. Lawes, R. Cooke, and E. J. Jones; Kyrie, Kramer; Gloria, Garrett. In the evening Goss's Deus Miseratur was sung; and the anthem was "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works" (Barbny). Sermons were preached by the Rector, the Rev. C. F. Nolloth and the Rev. Canon Sutton. The musical portion of the service was under the direction of Mr. G. Morphew, jun., Organist and Choirmaster.

LIVERPOOL.—On Saturday evening, the 20th ult., the 218th of Mr. William Lea's Saturday Popular Concerts was given in the Philharmonic Hall. The vocalists were Miss Woodatch, Miss Clara Wollaston, Mr. L. E. Auty, Mr. Charles Santley, and a local vocal quartet. Conductor, Mr. Josef Carter. On Saturday, the 20th ult., the sixth annual distribution of prizes gained by the candidates in the Trinity College (London) local examinations in elementary musical knowledge and in instrumental and vocal music, took place in the small room of the local committee. The prizes were occupied by Mr. Palgrave Simpson, chairman of the local committee, the Hon. Secretary (Mr. Monk) after reading the annual Report, paid a well-deserved compliment to the visiting Examiner, Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, and stated that in the coming examinations in instrumental and vocal music, candidates, to pass at all, would have to gain 25 per cent. of the maximum marks for their selections. The execution of the songs, and, secondly, the limit of age for junior candidates in singing would be raised from sixteen to eighteen years. After the performance of an excellent programme of vocal and instrumental music by a number of the successful candidates, the prizes were distributed by Mrs. Palgrave Simpson. It has been decided, since leaving St. Cuthbert's, not to offer the services of the well-trained "Bannock" Choir to any other church, at all events for the present; but, under the direction of Mr. S. Claude Ridley, they will proceed to rehearse Spohr's Last Judgment, which will probably be shortly publicly rendered with orchestral accompaniments.

LONG MELFORD.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at the Parish Church, on Sunday, the 7th ult. Hymn 382 (Ancient and Modern) was sung as a Processional before Morning and Evening Services, and Hymn 381, as Recessional, after evensong. Special Psalms were used. The Te Deum was Hopkins in G; the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Spark in D (Unison), and the Anthem, Lahee's "Praise the Lord," all of which were well rendered by the choir. Mr. B. H. Hurst presided at the organ throughout the day. The Voluntarys at Evening Service were Calkin's Festival March in C, "Sing unto God," and Guilmant's Grand Chorus in D.

MANCHESTER.—Mr. De Jong's thirteenth season commenced on Saturday, the 13th ult., when the vocalists were Madame Sterling, Miss Davies, Miss Robertson, Messrs. H. Reeves, McGuckin, Maybrick, and Signorini, all of whom were highly successful. Mr. Emil Mahl played several fine solo and duo parts, and accompanied. There was also an efficient orchestra. The members of the Athenæum Musical Society gave the first Concert of their seventeenth season, in the Athenæum Hall, on the 15th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of Cowen's Cantata, The Rose Maiden, which was excellently rendered. In the second part, which was miscellaneous, the glee singing was a special feature. Dr. Hiles presided at the pianoforte.

On the 18th of the first Concert of the Gentlemen's Club was given, when Misses Davies and S. Jones appeared, and solos were played on the oboe by Mons. Dubruq. Mr. Williams' Saturday afternoon "At homes" continue to be well attended; and on the 20th ult. Mr. J. Greaves gave a Pianoforte Recital. Mr. Hallé's season successfully commenced on the 25th ult.

MANSFIELD.—Mr. E. Gouk gave a first-class Concert in the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 23rd ult. The vocalists were Miss Bessie Holt, R.A.M., Mr. Barrow, Mr. A. Castings, Mr. Bingley Shaw, and Mr. T. Hunter. Solo pianist and Conductor, Mr. W. Drury, R.A.M. The Hall was filled in every part, and the Concert was a great success.

MATLOCK BRIDGE.—The members of the Matlock Choral Society performed Acis and Galatea and Hear my prayer on the 18th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. A. Castings, Mr. B. Bowser, and Mr. E. Barwick. The instrumental parts were played by an efficient band. The several solos were well rendered, Miss Beaumont's singing of the soprano solo in Hear my Prayer making a great impression. The choruses were effectively sung. In the absence (through illness) of Mr. Smith, the Conductor of the Society, Mr. Statham officiated.

MELBOURNE.—The seventh Concert of the season, given by the Metropolitan Liedertafel at the Town Hall, on August 6, was in every respect highly successful. There was an excellent orchestra of about forty-five performers, under the leadership of Mr. Edward King, and the solo singers were Miss Alice Rees, Signor Coy, and Herr Ernst Hartung. The programme included the whole of the third act of Wagner's Tannhäuser, in which both the solos and choral pieces were excellently sung. The rest of the Concert was miscellaneous. Mr. Julius Herz was an efficient Conductor, Mr. Summers presided at the organ, and Mr. Hammond at the pianoforte.

MOULSHAM.—The Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held in the Church on Sunday, the 14th ult. The morning service commenced with the hymn "Come, ye thankful people, come," in which the congregation joined. The Venite was sung to Jones in C, for the Te Deum. Dr. F. Jiff's Service in A was used, and the Jubilate was sung to Wesley in F. Barnby's Anthem, "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works," was given with much effect, the verse-parts being taken by Master Alfred Pilgrim, Messrs. G. Hayward, C. W. Barnard, and F. Hayward. The Psalms were chanted to Dr. Woodward in F and R. Cooke in G. In the evening, Sir John Goss's Anthem, "I will magnify Thee, O God, my King," was given with care and precision. The Psalms were sung to Smart in G, and in G; the Cantate; to Dr. Stainer's fine double Chant in C, composed for the Chelmsford Choral Festival in 1882, and the Deus Misericordiarum to an excellent double Chant in B flat, composed for the occasion by Mr. A. G. Barnard, the Organist. At the close of the service Helmore's Te Deum in E flat was sung. Mr. Barnard efficiently accompanied throughout, and played a well-chosen selection of voluntaries.

NEWBURY.—On the 9th ult., an Evening Concert (in connection with the Institute) was given in the Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. Henry Prentiss, assisted by Messrs. J. W. Clark, Miss Clara Wollaston, Mr. Henry Parkin, Mr. Lovett King, and the Chevalier Niedzielski (solo violinist). There was a large and appreciative audience. Mr. Lovett King was an efficient accompanist.

NEW SWINDON.—At the Wesleyan Chapel, on the 24th ult., Mr. George Whitehead (Organist of Christ Church, Swindon) gave a Recital on a fine new two-manual organ by Messrs. Alex. Young and Sons, Manchester. The programme included the Grand Fugue in G minor (Bach) and selections from the works of Handel, Haydn, Batiſte, &c., in the rendering of which the various qualities of the instrument were adequately displayed. The performance was attentively listened to by a large and appreciative audience.

NORTHFLEET.—Special Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held in the Church on Sunday, the 7th ult. In the morning, Miss Clara Te Deum, in F, Farebrother's "O give thanks," and Dr. Newsham's Mass, in B flat, were performed by the choir. At Evensong the Canticles were given to Stainer's arrangement, the anthem being "Fear not, O land," by Sir John Goss. At the conclusion Barnby's Harvest-tide Thanksgiving was sung. Mr. James Walter presided at the organ, the Rev. F. Southgate, Vicar, acting as precentor.

NOTTINGHAM.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at St. Ann's Church on Sunday, the 7th ult., when sermons suitable to the occasion were preached by the Vicar, the Rev. J. D. Lewis. At the morning service, the Te Deum was sung in F, and the Jubilate and Gloria were by the Choirmaster, Mr. G. N. Partridge. At the evening service the choir was accompanied by a band, under the direction of Mr. Hodgkinson. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were Bunnett in F, and the anthem Dr. Stainer's "Ye shall dwell in the land," with special orchestral accompaniments. The hymns were "Come, ye thankful people" (tune, St. George), "We plough the fields" (tune, Dresden), and "O Lord of Hosts" (tune, Almſgiving). The opening and closing voluntaries for organ and orchestra were "He shall feed His flock" (Handel) and the March from Athalie (Mendelssohn). Mrs. G. N. Partridge, Organist of the church, presided at the organ. Miss Fannie Lynn, R.A.M., gave a Concert in the Albert Hall, on the 17th ult., before a large audience. The following artists, also, of the Revue Artistique de Music, gave vocal solos, viz., M. and Mme. Johnson, Mr. Arthur Thompson, Mr. Musgrove Tufnal (vocalists); Mr. W. Richardson (solo violin), Mr. John Cullen (solo pianoforte), and Mr. T. B. Knott (Conductor).

OTTAWA.—Excellent Organ Recitals have been given by Mr. J. W. F. Harrison, Organist of Christ Church, at the close of Sunday evening services. The programmes have been exceptionally well chosen, the selections including vocal solos well rendered by Miss Denzil and Mr. Humphreys.

ROCHDALE.—The Orpheus Glee Club gave its eighth annual Concert on Tuesday, the 9th ult., with much success. The artists engaged were Miss Fannie Sellers, Mr. T. Kershaw, jun., Mr. E. H. Howarth, and Mr. J. H. Greenwood. The club, numbering twenty male voices, under the direction of Mr. John Towers, Manchester, gave several glees, the ability of the Conductor and the skill of the vocalists being amply proved by the excellent manner in which these compositions were rendered.

ST. AUSTELL, CORNWALL.—The Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Service took place in Holy Trinity Church on Wednesday, the 10th ult. The Psalm and Canticles were taken from the Festival Book of the Anglican Choirs, held at the Twelfth Festival in July. The Processional Voluntary was Batiſte's Overture in F, which was effectively given on the fine organ, by the Organist and Choir Director. The Choral Society resumed its rehearsals on Tuesday the 23rd ult., when Mozart's Twelfth Mass, with full orchestra, was practised for performance in the Assembly Rooms at Christmas. Mr. C. E. Juleff, Organist of the Parish Church, has been appointed Conductor.

SHREWSBURY.—The Concert given by the Orpheus Gesang Verein, at the Music Hall, on the 17th ult., attracted a large audience, and was highly successful. All the part-musics were exceedingly well sung, the "Nere Queen's" music by Mr. Walter Hay (which was accompanied by the band), being one of the most attractive of the choral pieces. There was a good selection of orchestral works; and solos were given with much effect by Mr. Frank Weston (violinello), Mr. Charlesworth Fawcett (clarinet), and Mr. A. Knight (bassoon). Mr. Rawlings was the accompanist. Great credit is due to Mr. Walter Hay for the excellent manner in which he has trained the choir.

SOUTHWELL.—The lay-clerks of the Minister gave their Annual Concert on Tuesday evening, the 3rd ult., in the Concert Hall. The vocalists were Miss Besse Holt, R.A.M., Miss L. A. Stubbs, Messrs. A. Barrow, E. Longmore, Bingley Shaw, and T. Hunter. Solo pianist, Miss Calvert; violinello, the Rev. R. F. Smith; Conductor and accompanist, Mr. A. Marriott. The part-singing of the lay-clerks was, as usual, a special feature of the Concert.

STOCKLEY.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Services took place as usual in the Mission Church, on the 7th ult., the anthems being "O give thanks unto the Lord" (Sydenham) and "The earth is the Lord's" (Lowe). An appropriate carol by Mr. Lowe was also sung. An important feature in the afternoon Service was the new tune composed for the hymn "Let us with a gladsome mind," by the Vicar of Stockingford.

STROOD, KENT.—The Harvest Thanksgiving was held on Wednesday, the 10th ult. There was a celebration at eight a.m., and Evensong was sung at eight p.m. The Psalms (lxv. and cxlv.) and the Magnificat were sung to Gregorian tones, as arranged in the "London Gregorian Harvest Festival Book." The Nunc dimittis was sung to Tene v. (Vienne). There were processional hymns and the anthem was "O give thanks" (Farebrother). The Organist (Mr. Arthur J. Millars) and at the conclusion Harvest Thanksgiving March (J. Baptiste Calkin). The Ambrosian Te Deum was sung before the Blessing. There was a good congregation, and the service was, musically, very successful.

TEWKESBURY.—A Choral Festival was held (as part of a week of Commemorative Services) in the Abbey Church, on Tuesday, September 25, when choirs numbering upwards of 400 voices assisted. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were written for the occasion and conducted by Dr. C. J. Frost, and the anthem was Gounod's "Sing praises to the Lord." Mr. Henry Wray conducted the Festival and Mr. Knowles presided at the organ. In the evening an Organ Recital was given by Dr. C. J. Frost, the programme being selected from the works of Best, Volkmann, Frost, Moscheles, Handel, Mendelssohn, Smart, and Morandi. The choir during the course of the Recital sang Spohr's Cantata God, Thou art great, and the "Hallelujah" Chorus.

TRINIDAD.—On September 18, a special Service was held at the Holy Trinity Cathedral, Port of Spain, at which Mr. E. Doory's new Oratorio, Lazarus, was performed. The chorus numbered about fifty voices, and the work was accompanied by the organ (at which the composer presided), piano (Mrs. W. S. Doory) and string instruments. The Rev. W. S. Doory, Organist and Precentor of the Cathedral, conducted. The solos were effectively rendered by Mrs. W. S. Doory, Mrs. W. Archer, Mr. J. W. Tomlinson, and Mr. J. H. Collens. The Resurrection Chorus was given with a degree of religious fervour which made a marked impression upon the large congregation. This was the third musical service of the present year; at the former ones Dr. Armes's St. John the Evangelist and Sir A. Sullivan's Prodigal Son having been given.

TURVEY, BEDS.—On Sunday, the 7th ult., the Harvest Festival was held at All Saints' Church, Mr. C. J. Winney, Organist of St. Philip's Church, Battersea, presiding at the Organ at the afternoon and evening services. After the evening Service an excellent selection of music from the works of Bach, Batiſte, Guilmant, Handel, Hopkins, Mendelssohn, Silas, Smart, Wely, &c., was given. Mr. Winney's fine performance was listened to with much attention by a crowded congregation.

WALTHAM ABBEY.—On the 7th ult., the Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held in the Abbey. The Service, which was partly choral, was effectively rendered. Special Psalms and Hymns relative to Harvest were used. The Morning Anthem was "Oh! give thanks," by Elvey. At the Evening Service, King's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F were used. The anthem was "The Wilderness," by Sir J. Goss. The solo parts were well rendered by Mrs. Chamberlain, Miss Morgan, Mr. J. Turnham, and Mr. W. Turnham. Mr. J. Chalk, the Organist, presided at the organ. Special Sermons were preached by the Rev.—Davidson, M.A., on behalf of the Bishop of St. Alban's Diocesan Fund. There was a large attendance at both services.

YORK.—On the 16th ult., at the York Fine Art and Industrial Exhibition, a grand Concert was given by the following artists: Mesdames Albani and Enriquez, Mr. Reffern, Hollins, Mr. Bridson, Signor Pasacini, and Mr. Frederic Cliffe. Mr. Arthur Sample presided at the organ. There was a large audience.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Walter J. Lancaster, to the Parish Church of All Saints, Kingston-on-Thames.—Mr. O. S. Marshall, R.A.M., Organist and Choirmaster to St. Paul's, Augustinian Church, Rome.—Mr. Samuel C. Hanbury, to Bandon Hill School Church.—Mr. Charles J. MAGNA CHARTA. New Historical Cantata by HENRY COWEN, performed four times, and received with increasing and unequivocal marks of approval. The solos composed for and sung by Miss Clara Samuel, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. J. Bridson with unbounded success. Complete, 19 numbers, 124 pages, 38., 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d.; Tonic Sol-fa, 9d. "The Cantata will doubtless take a high place amongst compositions of its class, if, indeed, it will not occupy a position at the head of them all." "The conductor might, had he been disposed, have accepted the plaudits of the audience as an encore of each number." "The work is a new one, and possesses unusual merit. . . . Choruses seem to be the composer's strong point, for they are all, without exception, excellent."

JOHN GILPIN

AND

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST

Humorous Cantatas for Solo Voices, Chorus, and Orchestra, by

EDMUND ROGERS.

"Skillful construction, refined humour, and a spontaneous flow of graceful melody characterise Mr. Rogers's cantatas."—Queen.

"Mr. Rogers, by the successful composition of his clever cantatas, has done much towards the advancement of humorous music in our day."—Musical Standard.

"We cordially commend this Cantata ('Beauty and the Beast') to the attention of choral societies."—Musical Times.

Address, Composer, 4, Melrose Gardens, West Kensington Park, W.

EUDORA

OR, THE BRIDE OF THE GREEK ISLE
A DRAMATIC IDYL

FOR

SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

WILLIAM CRESER, MUS. DOCT., OXON.

"There are many touches of melody and brightness and powerfully concerted passages."—Leeds Mercury.

"The chorus for women's voices only, 'Gloomy lies the shore,' is not merely an attempt, but a successful adaptation of music to the spirit of the words. Not the least important part of 'Eudora' is its orchestration."—Yorkshire Post.

"The music has a charming freshness which, combined to the touching story of the book, cannot but be thoroughly admired. It is a clever production, and the composer, it is evident, has a vigorous comprehension of dramatic effect."—Newcastle Daily Chronicle.

THE HOLY CITY

A SACRED CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

NEW PART-SONG. PRICE 3d.

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"This Part-Song, written for, and dedicated to, the Kyrle Society, is laid out in Mr. Gaul's very best manner, and while recalling, for its beautiful effects, his elegant Part-Song 'The Silent Land,' the resemblance begins and ends there. Mr. Gaul knows to the very letter the capabilities of the voices he writes for, and one is perfectly safe, even after a single experience only, in predicting a widespread popularity to 'The Children's Hour.'—Birmingham Daily Mail.

THE ART OF PLAYING AT SIGHT. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF.

"The author believes his system to be infallible; after a fair trial, we must say, we believe so too."

"We have almost practised our finger-ends off, but could never read half-a-dozen bars correctly. The few hints in this little manual have shown us the way to accomplish it."

LITTLE DIFFICULTIES WHICH OCCUR IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING, ILLUSTRATED AND EXPLAINED. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF. Price 1s.

"The little difficulties which occur to the average player, and which make playing so irksome, are here fully illustrated and explained. It is astonishing what an amount of information is conveyed in a small compass."

OFFERTORY SENTENCES

SET TO

TUNES FROM "THE HYMNARY"

BY

J. POWELL METCALFE.

Price Fourpence.

PREFACE.

There is an ever-increasing conviction that decency and order are better promoted by the singing than the saying of the Offertory Sentences—and that not only in our larger, but in our smaller churches as well. In the latter the adoption of the desired use is to a great extent prevented by the anthem character of the music employed in the usual offertory setting.

The following arrangements are more especially intended for the use of those choirs which, not being regularly trained in anthem singing, are accustomed to rely on the tuneless, form and compactness of the hymn-tune for aid in fittingly rendering the words they sing.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"This is a composition of great merit, very much superior to most of the productions that come under our notice. . . . The baritone solo is charmingly written, and the accompaniment well thought out. . . . We commend the composition to the notice of choirmasters with sufficient resources to do justice to a somewhat elaborate setting of well selected words."—London Church Times.

"It contains a fine baritone solo. . . . A charming trio. . . . The entire work is skillfully and effectively written for church choir purposes."—Melbourne Argus.

MORNING, EVENING, and COMMUNION SERVICE in G

BY

GERARD F. COBB.

Complete, 2s. 6d.; or, separately: Te Deum and Jubilate, 6d.; Benedictus and Benedictus, 4d.; Communion Office (mainly unison), 6d.; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, 1s.

"To those who like ecclesiastical music to combine the qualities of impressiveness, effectiveness, and moderate facility Mr. Cobb's service should commend itself. No part of the work lies beyond the powers of the better class of parish choirs. . . . The style is a happy combination of impressive solemnity with popularity and variety, the abstruse and the commonplace being alike avoided with considerable skill. . . . The Creed, Sanctus, and Gloria are exceedingly good and thoroughly effective."—The Pall Mall Gazette.

"We cordially recommend Mr. Cobb's thoughtful and effective service to the notice of preceptors and choirmasters."—The Musical Times.

Bright and modern in feeling without undue elaboration or difficulty.—Athenaeum.

Also, by the same Composer, MAGNIFICAT and NUNC DIMITTIS (Unison) in E flat. Price 4d.

CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."
SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).
PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).
MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

A system of construction which, by a careful application of scientific principles, Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have brought to great perfection, is now generally acknowledged as the only one calculated to render the Piano almost impervious to the deleterious influences of damp and extremes of temperature, while it stands better in tune with one-fourth of the usual tuning—a most important consideration where tuners are not readily obtained. The inestimable advantages thus secured are augmented by an increased power and purity of tone hitherto unattainable in the Upright Piano.

A selection from numerous testimonials will be a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the Pianos manufactured by this Firm:—

The Pianettes manufactured by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.—Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Opera.

I consider that Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. Their Pianettes are specially deserving of notice in being remarkable both for their cheapness and general excellence. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,

English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Brackly Villa, Dulwich.

I have on several occasions selected Pianos from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, and have great pleasure in stating they have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate.

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON's Pianos may be purchased on the Hire System, and obtained of all the principal Music-sellers throughout the World.

BAILLIE HAMILTON'S VOCALION.

MR. GLADSTONE,

Speaking of Mr. BAILLIE HAMILTON'S new Instrument, "The Vocalion," at Harrow, March 27, 1882, said:

"I will offer one word—no longer of solace or encouragement, but of congratulation—to your friend Mr. Hamilton. I know not whether I should congratulate him most upon the musical inspiration which has guided him for so many years, or upon the indomitable courage with which he has sought to give practical form to his idea, or upon the wonderful result, the marvellous expressiveness of that instrument which he has produced, and which I have heard to-day for the first time."

EPPS'S COCOA.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by the careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage, which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette. Prepared by James Epps and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.

HOW TO ACCOUNT FOR IT.

Music, latest by birth of all, is the only fine art the work of which in the scheme of human perfection seems still in course of fulfilment, the only art which still "marches," the only art about which men still ask themselves, what and whence is it? Architecture, sculpture, painting, have grown out of the first stirrings of the desire for beauty into the fullest expression of that desire human imagination and dexterity seem able to produce. In regard to these arts the world is old, the last word has been spoken; cause and effect have been investigated, philosophy has proved the phenomena of these arts, science has recognised and defined their position and limits, history has recorded their growth and decay. But with music it is not so. This, the least imitative of all the arts, and the least fettered by the laws on which its physical basis rests, is as much a source of speculation and wonder now as in the day when the savage first drew sound from a hollow reed. Even in this self-conscious age, in spite of our accumulated knowledge of natural laws, our science of acoustics and theories of practical harmony, our notions about culture, and our dissection and pigeon-holing of emotions, the secret of music, the why and wherefore of its existence and its power remain a crux for the scientist, a still unfamiliar tool to the utilitarian, to the idealist a field for the most transcendental speculation. A long interval lies between the grave acceptance of music by the Greeks as a practical demonstration of immutable laws of proportion, to study which was an education in obedience for youth and an honour for age, and the latest thing propounded by a distinguished scientist—Mr. Herbert Spencer—that music having had its origin in vocal phenomena on a physical basis—such as the coo of a pleased baby, or the shriek of a termagant—will find its apotheosis as a vehicle for the interchange of emotional communication, a kind of glorified and developed speech. The gulf which extends between these theories is filled with objections, enthusiasms, speculations the most fantastic, dicta the most dogmatic, while across the strife of tongues sounds some clear philosophic utterance or the emphatic voice of a "maker of music" ringing with conviction.

To give an historic summary of all surmises and theories about the essence and purpose of music would take volumes instead of a page or two. But within limits it may be feasible to gather and set forth a few out of the many "views" of the matter taken by outsiders, that is, not by musicians as musicians. Your musician does not require or feel disposed to ask questions about that which for him contains its own answer, as saith Abbé Vogler, "The rest may reason and welcome, 'tis we musicians know." It is not to the makers or executants of music that, as a rule, you must turn to get any light upon the raison d'être of their art. But the words which men great in other fields of knowledge have been urged to utter about music are so many witnesses to its power, so many links of evidence as to its nature.

At the outset one cannot but be struck with the fact, that when men come to think about this thing, this fact, music, the wonder of it seems always fresh, there is ever something intangible and divine about it. The Greek myth set the sun-god on the summit of Parnassus, lyre in hand and mouth vocal with rapturous sound. The frailest earth-born musician could not touch his instrument to the measured minor cadence of choral song or rhythmic dance without following far off the laws on which the spheres themselves were revolving in their order and making celestial melody. The Christian Church found the worship of psalmody in use among Jew and Gentile, and adopted what she found as with other rites and symbols, though she long looked askance upon the elaboration of harmony, and still longer regarded instrumental accompaniments as savouring of false gods and fleshly delights. But finding the hold of music over the multitude a useful and seductive ally in the tabernacle, the Church wisely discovered that God had given men voices to praise Him withal, and declared that music was a divine ordinance whereby, as St. Basil puts it, "it pleased the wisdom of the Holy Spirit to borrow from melody that pleasure which, mingled with heavenly mysteries, causeth the smoothness and softness of that which toucheth the ear to convey, as it were by stealth, the measure of good things into men's minds." Luther's sturdy utterance that "Satan is a great enemy to music, which is one of the most beautiful and noblest of God's gifts, the devil cannot abide it," is a thoroughly logical sequence to the teaching of St. Basil. "Music drives away the devil and makes folks cheerful," said Martin; "at the sound of it one forgets all anger, lust, pride, and other vices." And, as we know, Luther did his best to convince the faithful that the devil ought not to have the best tunes. A good deal came out of Luther's convictions about music, the congregational singing of chorals and the magnificent use of those grand spiritual songs by Bach and other great writers. We might quote plentifully on this phase of feeling, the theory of divine inspiration and mission of music—its soul- uplifting power. Naturally it has found eloquent exponents among ecclesiastical writers, old and new, from the dignified periods of Hooker to the straightforward testimony of Charles Kingsley or the ecstatic utterance of Father Faber. The imagery of the Apocalyptic vision, and the simple realism of the artists of the middle ages, helped to connect fanciful ideas about the musical offices of the saints in a hoped-for future life with the passionate thrill of emotion and restless promptings of the spirit that music could arouse in the susceptible; but even apart from such traditional influences, men have found no way to comprehend the wonder of music save that which should associate it with the source of their spiritual aspirations. One of the most eloquent passages on this side comes from the pen of John Henry Newman:—

"There are seven notes in the scale, make them fourteen if you will—yet what a slender outfit for so great an enterprise! Out of what poor elements does some great master create his new world. Shall we say that all this exuberant inventiveness is a mere ingenuity, a work of art like some game or fashion of the day without reality, without meaning? . . . Is it possible that the inexhaustible evolution and dispositions of notes, so rich, yet so simple; so intricate, yet so regulated; so various, yet so majestic, should be a mere sound which is gone and perishes? Can it be that these mysterious stirrings of heart and keen emotions, and strange yearnings after we know not what, and awful impressions from we know not whence, should be wrought in us by what is unsubstantial, and comes and goes, and begins and ends in itself? It is not so. It cannot be. No! They have escaped from some higher sphere; they are the outpourings of eternal harmony in the medium of created sound; they are echoes from our home; they are the voices of angels, or the magnificat of saints; or the laws of Divine governance, or the divine attributes. Something they are besides themselves, which we cannot compass, which we cannot alter, though mortal man—and he perhaps not otherwise distinguished above his fellows—has the power of eliciting them."

Faber's well-known hymn lies partly in the same lines, but approaches nearer to a philosophic speculation. Leaving the utterance of Christian teachers we glance at the "interpretations of music as the play of Nature's forces" from the mouth of her high priests. Says Coleridge—

What if all of animated Nature
Be but organic harps diversely framed,
That tremble into thought, as o'er them sweeps,
Plastic and vast, one intellectual breeze,
At once the soul of each and God of all—and Wordsworth:—

By one pervading spirit
Of tones and numbers all things are controlled,
As sagas taught, whose faith was found to merit,
Initiation in that mystery old.
The heavens, whose aspect wakes our minds as still
As they themselves appear to be,
Innumerable voices fill
With everlasting harmony;
The towering headlands, crowned with mist,
Their feet among the billows, know
That Ocean is a mighty harmonist;
Thy pinions, universal air
Ever waving to and fro,
Are delegates of harmony, and bear
Strains that support the seasons on their round.

This is what an exponent of modern speculation in the school of Mr. Herbert Spencer calls the projection of ideas of vocal and other conscious action behind the tones, which are thus transformed into displays of an objective might. Music, according to this writer, is most powerful in awakening memories of our own conscious energies. He cites the well-known saying of Beethoven about the first movement of his C minor Symphony, "Das Schicksal klopft an die Pforte," as referring not only to a "likeness of emotional effect—a sense of awe—but also to a distinct parallelism between musical sound and conscious energy, conceived in grand proportions as the power of supreme nature or of objective necessity." "Even more abundantly than vague ideas of motive energy"—still we quote Mr. Sully—"does music convey ideal shadows of that emotional life which is associated more or less with all muscular activities when not voluntarily put forth, and which holds such an intimate relation to vocal action as the great instrument of expression. How finely music expounds the emotional experience of life appears a familiar truth." Here we fall into the midst of Mr. Spencer's theory of music—namely, its origin in vocal phenomena, the product of muscular action induced by emotional conditions. This theory leads to the conviction that the beginning and end of music is its function as a language of the emotions, of more or less subtlety and comprehensiveness according to the development of the art. "The passionate enthusiastic temperament of the musician, which leads him," says the analytic philosopher, "to express the feelings of others as well as himself in extreme intervals and more marked cadences than they would use (in other words, to develop the art), also leads him to give musical utterance to feelings which either he does not experience, or experiences in but slight degree." This is why, Mr. Spencer explains, "music not only excites our familiar feelings, but also produces feelings we never had before, arouses dormant sentiments of which we had not conceived the possibility and do not know the meaning; or, as Richter says, tells us of 'things we have not seen and shall not see.'" The scientist was almost off his iron way here, but speedily pulling himself up, returns to the point, and sets forth clearly that, as intellectual language is a growth, so emotional language is a growth, and that, on his hypothesis that music develops the language of the emotions, we may accept the feelings it arouses as the prophecy, to the fulfilment of which itself is partly instrumental, of a happy state of things to come, when men will be able to impress on one another all the emotions they experience from moment to moment in an infinitely more vivid and complete way than they can at present, and that thereby the happiness of men will be greatly increased and be of higher quality. Under this theory Mr. Spencer is able to understand the power and meaning of music, otherwise he confesses himself non-plussed!

The expression "language of the emotions" is, of course, a mode of defining by analogy; but the idea indicated is one of the most accepted theories of the purpose and significance of music—although not approached from Mr. Spencer's side of the question, the physical origin. Numberless citations might be given from poets and thinkers, from which we will cite a few only that will link together in a short chain. Schiller shall take the lead:—

"Leben athmet der bildende Kunst, Geist fordr'ich vom Dichter, aber die Seele spricht nur Polyhymnia aus."

"La musique dit tout ce que l'âme rêve et pressent de plus mystérieux et de plus élevé. C'est la manifestation d'un ordre d'idées et de sentiments supérieur à ce que la parole humaine peuvent exprimer. C'est la révélation de l'infini."—(Georges Sand.)

"Next to poetry no art is so profoundly important for the inner life of man as music."—(F. D. Strauss.)

"Les chrétiens, comme les païens, ont entendu l'empire de la musique après la mort. De tous les beaux arts c'est celui qui agit le plus immédiatement sur l'âme. Les autres la dirigent vers telle ou telle idée; celui là seul s'adresse à la source intime de l'existence et change en entier la disposition intérieure. . . . La musique double l'idée que nous avons des facultés de notre âme, quand on l'entend on est capable des plus nobles efforts."—(De Stael.)

"The soul of man is audible, not visible. A sound alone betrays the flowing of the eternal fountain, invisible to man."—(Longfellow.)

"When the cycle of Christian ideas had been accomplished by the painters, and when the first passion for antiquity had been satisfied, it was given at last to music to express the soul in all its manifold feeling and complexity of movement. In music we see the point of departure where art leaves the domain of myths, christian as well as pagan, and occupies itself with the emotional activity of man alone. Melody and harmony, disconnected from words, are capable of receiving most varied interpretations, so that the same combinations of sound express the ecstasies of earthly and of heavenly love, conveying to the mind of the hearer only that element of pure passion which is the primitive and natural ground material for either. They give distinct form to moods of feeling as yet undetermined, or as the Italians put it, 'La musica e il lamento dell' amore o la preghiera agli Dei.' This, combined with its independence of all corporal conditions, renders music the true exponent of the spirit in its freedom, and therefore the essentially modern art."—(J. A. Symonds.)

The last quotation shows the influence on the modern writer's conception of music of the German philosopher Schopenhauer, whose principles for the metaphysical essence of the art, though not his conclusions, are accepted and theoretically obeyed by the modern school of musicians, marching under the banner of Richard Wagner, who himself is an eloquent exponent of æsthetic theory. To state briefly Schopenhauer's view, we quote, but not verbally, from "Music of the Future," by Mr. F. Hueffer. The aim of all arts is to express the eternal essence of things by means of those ideas in the Platonic sense—i.e., archetypal forms which fashion the cosmos, of which the single phenomena are further sub-divisions. Music alone of the arts does not embody those ideas as conceived through phenomena, the visible and real. The musician finds in nature no model for his purpose, nothing more than a suggestion; he therefore approaches close to the original source of existence, so that, as Schopenhauer puts it, music is not a copy of those ideas of which the visible universe is the phenomenon, but is "a representation of the cosmical will co-ordinate with the ideas themselves." Thus the musician is the only creative artist. "The invention of melody—in other words, the unveiling thereby of the deepest secrets of human will—is the achievement of genius furthest removed from all reflective and conscious design." By various analogies in the construction of music Schopenhauer illustrates his meaning, such as the image of the perpetual transitions from unrest to rest of the will of man to be found in the nature of melody; which in a thousand ways and by every possible combination is constantly swerving and wandering from the key-note, always perforce to return to it at last. To give a just notion of the philosophic speculation from which our last quotations are made, were to require more space and more strenuous effort from the reader than would here be advisable to expect. The object in quoting at all on such lines has been to make our glance at the whole subject more complete. The reader will find on looking back over our extracts curious links of sympathy between theories the most apparently antagonistic, and this impression will deepen if he draws for himself out of the wells from which but a tasting cup has been here and there filled. In one point all thinkers susceptible of the influence of music are at one, a deep sense of its import to humanity, a recognition of its high function in the finer culture of the mind, in the purging of gross and stupid tastes, of its unique power as an emotional counter-balance to the arid utilitarianism of the age, as a source of pure and natural joy in our artificial and hysteric civilisation.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

M. ARTHUR POUGIN finishes the chapter devoted to Cherubini's relations with his contemporaries in these words: "I will here terminate this long chapter, not because more documents fail me, but because it threatens to go on for ever and fatigue the reader." In truth, however, the reader could stand a great deal more of the same kind, for here we have a contribution to the master's real biography. It removes the veil that covers the more personal life of the man, and enables us to penetrate beneath the conventional mask which every individual, above all the public individual, is compelled to wear. Happily, M. Pougin does not omit reference to Cherubini and Berlioz. In our notice of the French composer, the opinion which Berlioz had formed regarding the head of the Paris Conservatoire was set forth by copious extracts from his "Memoirs." It there plainly appeared that Berlioz cherished a genuine animus against the Italian master, and not only held him up to ridicule—in itself a sufficient offence, considering the relative positions of the two men—but tried to make him hateful as well, crediting him, for example, with mean and despicable motives. Our readers may possibly remember the case of the "Requiem" composed by Berlioz, at the instance of the Government, for the anniversary of the July Revolution, but actually performed at the Invalides in memory of General Damrémont and the heroes of Constantine. Berlioz tells the world in his "Memoirs" that he chanced to be at the office of the Journal des Débats one day when Halévy called to interview the editor, Bertin, and to tell him that the preference of the Government for the French composer had so affected Cherubini as to make him ill. Berlioz adds that "Halévy had come to beg M. Bertin to use his power to obtain for the illustrious master the Commander's Cross of the Legion of Honour by way of consolation. M. Bertin's stern voice then interrupted him with these words, 'Yes, my dear Halévy, we will do what you wish in order that a distinction he has well merited shall be bestowed upon Cherubini. But as to the 'Requiem,' if any arrangement regarding his work is proposed to Berlioz, and he is weak enough to yield a hair's breadth, I will not speak to him again as long as I live.' Halévy must have withdrawn rather more than confounded by this answer." In reply, M. Pougin does not call Berlioz a liar outright, but he more than insinuates as much. Here are his words:—

"I do not hesitate to declare that Berlioz here lost a fine occasion of holding his tongue, and that this little narrative does more honour to his invention than to his delicacy. What person will he make believe that Cherubini, of whom we cannot cite a single trait of envy or jealousy in the whole course of his career, was so jealous of Berlioz as to be 'ill in bed' in consequence? . . . What person will he make believe that Cherubini could commission any one to go to M. Bertin and beg a Commander's collar of the Legion of Honour for him, a Member of the Institute, the Director of the Conservatory, an artist illustrious among the most illustrious, and who certainly needed no one's 'patronage' or 'recommendation' to obtain no matter what? What person, lastly, will he make believe that, desiring so eagerly this distinction, Cherubini had to wait for it several years, since he did not receive it till 1844, towards the end of his life, when he resigned the post which he held in the Conservatory? Of a truth, all this is puerile, as well as rather naïve, and calculated to prove that Berlioz was merely a persistent hater."

The foregoing argument to character first appeared in Le Ménestrel—M. Pougin's work being published by weekly instalments—and at once drew forth remonstrance and complaint from the admirers of Berlioz. M. Pougin lost no time in putting forth a crushing reply, beginning thus: "I am absolutely obliged to remark to my kind correspondents that my severity was, if anything, rather less than it should have been." He then went on to observe that Berlioz had actually written to Cherubini on the very matter in question, thanking him for efforts made on behalf of himself and his "Requiem." Here is the conclusive document:—

"Sir—I am deeply touched by the noble abnegation which has led you to refuse your admirable 'Requiem' for the ceremony at the Invalides. Kindly believe that I am profoundly grateful. As, however, the determination of the Minister of the Interior is irrevocable, I now earnestly beg you to think no longer of me, and not to deprive the Government and your admirers of a masterpiece which would throw so much lustre on the solemnity. I remain, with profound respect, Sir, your devoted servant, H. Berlioz."

Although some points in this letter are not quite clear, it leaves no doubt of the main fact at issue, and compels us to agree with M. Pougin when he says of Berlioz that he "did not always trouble himself to observe the exact truth with regard to things on which he was better informed than any one else."

Cherubini's record, between his appointment as Master of the Royal Chapel, in 1814, and as Director of the Conservatoire, in 1822, is almost entirely taken up with compositions for the Church. His secular works during that period are easily enumerated. Thus we read of a Cantata, "Le Mariage de Solomon," written for the wedding festivities of the Duc de Berri, and performed at the Tuileries, June 17, 1816. This was shortly followed by a two-voice romance, "Je ne t'aime plus," two pieces for oboe and bassoon respectively, and an air for "Lodoiska," in view of a revival of that opera. In 1821, the birth of a son (the late Count de Chambord) to the Duchesse de Berri caused Cherubini to write a "Cantata for several voices, with choruses interspersed," which was performed at the Hôtel de Ville, on May 2. He also collaborated with Berton, Boieldieu, Kreutzer, and Paer in the production of a one-act Opera, "Blanche de Provence," first represented at the Court Theatre, on May 1, and subsequently twice at the Académie Royale, then located in the Théâtre Favart, the opera house having been destroyed after the Duc de Berri's assassination. M. Pougin says: "Of this unfortunate work all that survived was an adorable chorus of the most exquisite effect, 'Dors, mon enfant,' which formed part of the third tableau, precisely the one written by Cherubini. This chorus, still celebrated, was inscribed in the programme of the first Concert given on March 9, 1828, by the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire; since then it has always remained in the repertory of that famous institution." It was of this chorus, no doubt, that Moscheles, who attended a performance, wrote in his diary: "The final chorus, by Cherubini, made an indelible impression on my mind."

The more important sacred works during this period were an "Iste Dies" (1817), a "Tantum ergo" (1817), a "Regina Cœli" (1818), of which a French critic, Girod, remarks: "It is incontestably the most beautiful piece of its kind, and a magnificent ovation to the Queen of Heaven"; and a Mass in E, attributable to the last-named year, but, according to one authority, not yet published. To 1819 belongs the Mass in G, composed for the coronation of Louis XVIII. This, it should be observed, is not the work generally known as Cherubini's "Coronation Mass," which was written five years later for the ceremony wherein Charles X. acted the principal part. The Mass of 1819 brought Cherubini at least an honorary recompense. He was created a Knight of the Order of St. Michael—one of those ephemeral distinctions which sprang up with the return of the Bourbons, only to be crushed by the next revolution. To the year just named belongs also the Quartet in E flat, which, if Spohr's evidence may be credited, was composed in ignorance of the masterpieces by Mozart and Beethoven. From evidence supplied by M. Pougin, it would appear that, about this time, Cherubini much desired the managership of the Opera, and was actually a candidate for the place, against his old friend Viotti, who carried off the honour. This seems to have been unknown, or, at any rate, unremembered, till M. Pougin found, among the documents entrusted to him by Cherubini's family, a letter from Viotti, dated (November 5, 1819) after his appointment. In that letter, Viotti said:—

"I have been informed, my dear friend, that you are angry. If it is with me, you are wrong, and it will not be difficult for me to convince you of this. . . I did not seek the post with which I am honoured or the position which once more puts an end to my tranquillity. The whole matter has been arranged I know not how, and it was only ten days or a fortnight ago that I was sent for from Châtillon to give my consent. . . As a matter of course I appreciate profoundly the kindness of the Comte de Pradel; he has a right to my gratitude and I shall do all I can to prove this to him; but I cannot help feeling extremely sorry at having been the rival of a friend whom I love and whose genius I have always respected and appreciated—of a man whom I shall never cease to love, whatever changes may take place in his heart."

A letter thus frank and manly should have soothed Cherubini's ruffled spirit, at least as regards the writer; but this does not appear to have been the case, and the two friends were never again to each other as before.

We now come to the time (1822) when Cherubini found himself at the head of the great institution which he, as a professor, had helped to establish.

On April 19, 1822, the Minister of the King's Household formally invested our master with all the honours and privileges of Director of the Royal School of Music for a term of twenty years, vice Perne resigned. The choice took nobody by surprise, for not only was Cherubini the greatest available composer, but the most successful professor. With three of his pupils he had, in five years, won seven nominations to the Grand Prix de Rome. All circumstances, therefore, pointed out Cherubini as a man likely to raise the school from the depths into which it had fallen since the Restoration, and he soon began to justify the trust reposed in him. M. Pougin thus sums up the comprehensive measures carried out under the régime of the new director:—

"Not only was his directorship fertile in salutary measures and ameliorations of every kind, but it was specially excellent as regards the exactitude, the method, and the regularity in the work of each day, the general course of study, and the happy impulse imparted to every branch of instruction. It was under Cherubini's reign that a double committee of instruction was created for music and for elocution, as well as a committee of management; that the boarding-house for male pupils (and even that for female pupils, which it was afterwards necessary to do away with) was re-opened; that public performances were re-established and their number fixed; that the terms of engagement between the pupils and the Theatres Royal were settled; that classes for the harp, double-bass, preparatory piano for women, and reading aloud were created; that opera and comic opera and instruction in lyrical declamation were divided into two distinct branches; that the schools of music in the departmental towns of Lille, Toulouse, Marseilles, and Metz were created branches of the parent school; that the terms on which the professors should retire were exactly defined," &c., &c.

This statement says enough for Cherubini as an organiser and administrator—as, in fact, a man of business in his art. It would be easy to add many other particulars, such as those found, for example, in Lassabathie's Histoire du Conservatoire. There we learn that the master devoted his whole time to the work of the institution. His discipline was severe and carried out under his own personal observation, as, by the way, Berlioz found when he presumed to enter the Conservatoire building by the door set apart for female students. As he was himself, so he expected all the professors and servants to be. Ever firm and impartial, he gave way to no considerations but those of strict duty. He even dared to refuse the request of royalty. On one occasion Queen Marie-Amélie recommended a certain Mdlle. Hebler for admission into the school, little doubting but that, as usual in such cases, her request would be acted upon as a command. Cherubini answered her Majesty's private secretary thus:—

"I have just heard Mdlle. Hebler, whom you did me the honour to recommend on the part of the queen, and who desired to be admitted into the Conservatoire. Despite all my inclination to second her majesty's kind intentions with regard to the young lady, I regret very much that it is impossible for me to receive her, on account of the feebleness of her natural means. I acquainted her verbally with the motives preventing her admission, and advised her mother to bring her up to some other career than that of the stage, for which nature has denied her the most indispensable qualities—exterior and voice."

Cherubini could say "No" to his best friends with equal readiness, when duty seemed to require it. We are told that, on one occasion, Halévy used his influence on behalf of a lady, well endowed with musical means, whose husband had suffered a heavy reverse of fortune. The Director's favourite pupil simply requested that she might be admitted to Levasseur's operatic class, with a view to earning a living on the stage. Cherubini readily consented to an interview with the applicant, and when she entered the room, said: "Are you the lady, madam, who wished to come out at the opera?" "Yes, sir." "It is impossible." "Why, sir?" "Why! Ask your glass." We agree with M. Poug'n's comment upon this: "It was harsh, without doubt, and somewhat brutal, but was it not artistically honest?" The qualities of harshness and roughness to which reference is here made, and has often been made before, seem to have developed under the constant friction of a great institution, with its conflicting interests and many worries. This was partly the result of over-zeal. Cherubini would insist on seeing to everything himself, and taking directly upon his own shoulders responsibilities which should have been left to subordinates. Yet the entire Conservatoire felt the influence of his untiring and unswerving honesty. His influence descended through all grades to the lowest, and the great French School rapidly became great in the best sense of the term.

Many stories are told of Cherubini's punctilious regard for what most people look upon as small matters. On one occasion he said to the Minister of the King's Household, who was behind time at a prize distribution, "You are very late, Monseigneur!" Habeneck, it appears, would never learn punctuality, and was always being rated in consequence. One day, however, he bustled in hot with hurry and said triumphantly to the Director, "You cannot reproach me now!" Cherubini looked at his watch and answered, "You are three minutes too soon; you are not punctual now." As regards the Director's very plain speaking, the following stories are not without interest:—

At an examination of candidates for admission as singing pupils, a poor mis-shapen fellow appeared and sang with excellent taste, displaying also a beautiful voice. The examiners felt that they could not admit a person so disqualified by nature for stage work, but they desired to make known admiration of his talent. Cherubini undertook to settle the matter with the candidate, and going to him said, "My young friend, your voice is magnificent. Yes, your voice is superb, and you sing with a great deal of taste. The Committee are, in consequence, delighted to have heard you. At the same time they regret exceedingly they cannot admit you." "What is their reason, sir?" asked the anxious applicant.

"What is their reason!" replied Cherubini. "Why, my young friend, because we cannot on your account open a theatre for monkeys." This, most people will agree with us, was simple brutality, so unmanly that had the candidate inflicted personal chastisement upon the Director then and there no more than justice would have been done.

A second story affords more pleasant reading. Miel is responsible for it, and we may use a translation of his words, premising that the people concerned were, besides Cherubini, an anxious father of gigantic stature, and a pretty little boy, his son, who, being musically gifted, was a candidate for admission to the Conservatoire. "Advised by their friends, the applicants (tall father and tiny child) posted themselves in a room which the Director never failed to traverse when starting on his visit to the class-rooms. On opening the door, Cherubini found himself confronted by a colossus, who, from the eminence of his six feet, was awkwardly holding by the hand a perfect little cherub. Surprised at the meeting, and, no doubt, taken aback by this contrast between the extremes of human stature, he said in a haughty tone to the giant, 'What can I do for you?' Then, on being informed of his visitor's wish, he added, proceeding on his way, 'I do not take infants to wet nurse.' The poor father was thunderstruck." Subsequently Cherubini found the little boy in one of the class-rooms, seated at a pianoforte. "There was now no father present. . . . The choice of the pieces and the manner of their execution struck him; he stopped, sat down, and listened. The age, the grace, and the talent of the executant had produced their effect. Caresses and words of encouragement were, followed by questions; on the principles of the art the child was not to be shaken. 'Bravo, my little friend!' said Cherubini, delighted, 'but why are you here, and what can I do for you?' 'Something very easy for you,' replied the applicant, 'and something which will make me very happy; admit me to the Conservatoire.' 'The thing is done,' replied the Director, 'you are one of us.' Thereupon he left the room and gaily related what had happened, adding, laughingly, 'I took very good care not to push my questions further, for the brat would have proved to me that he knew more than I did.'"

The foregoing tale, which no biographer of Cherubini ventures to omit, is the best practical illustration of Adolphe Adam's remarks upon his master's character:—"The sensations experienced in approaching Cherubini were so strange that it would be hard to define them and much more to understand them. The veneration that you had for his great age and fine talent was suddenly altered by ridicule aroused by little trifles to which he clung with a persevering obstinacy. Then, at the end of a few minutes, as though he had understood that it was too long a time to act the disagreeable to no purpose, his face relaxed, that smile, so refined and shrewd, came to animate the fine head of the old man, good nature resumed the ascendant, little by little the faults of a spoilt child disappeared, he became a good man in spite of himself; his heart opened out to yours, and then you could resist him no more; you left him charmed, and altogether surprised to have felt towards this extraordinary man, in so short a time, sentiments so different—repulsion, admiration, and enthusiasm."

After what has been said regarding the bearing and conduct of Cherubini, there is no need for further details in explanation of his somewhat tyrannical and often stormy reign at the Conservatoire. The master suffered from nerves and gave way to them; his attention to trifles was a perennial source of irritation, and as years went on his sensitiveness grew into a chronic infirmity of temper, so as almost to hide the real goodness that existed beneath. How loveable he was, au fond, his pupils have told us with all the warmth of passionate affection.

Cherubini's rule of the Conservatoire was distinguished by the establishment (in 1822) of the famous and still existing Concerts, initiated by Habeneck and supported by the Director with all possible energy. It was through Cherubini that the proposal to give Concerts in the hall of the Conservatoire obtained Government sanction and aid, while the master himself acted as President of the Committee by whom the new institution was managed. It is important to observe that the main purpose was the performance of Beethoven's works. Both English and Germans are apt to sneer at the backwardness of the French as regards appreciation of Beethoven, but we may reasonably question whether any society outside France can show such a record of true homage to that master as the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire. Mr. Bellasis tells us that in thirty-four years there were 280 performances of his symphonies, 38 of his overtures, 41 of his works for the chamber; in all, 359. As for the great "Choral" Symphony, till within the last few years almost unknown in England, it was executed in Paris during the above-mentioned period no fewer than nineteen times. The wonderful perfection of the concerts given under Habeneck has often been described, and the secret of it is found, as usual, in the absolute authority of one master mind, having at command unlimited opportunities for impressing upon subordinates his slightest will. We have now amongst us an eminent artist—M. Santon—who belonged to Habeneck's orchestra, and can tell of the extraordinary preparation which that body had to undergo. Every section was separately rehearsed again and again, if needful, till all its component parts worked together like one man; the first violins, for example, bowing every passage with absolute uniformity, and playing with such regulated expression—the expression determined by the conductor—that the effect might have come from a single instrument. The sections being thus drilled, the grand divisions were brought together, and finally the entire orchestra, so that, in performance, each player was but a machine carrying out his part of a great executive design conceived by the one presiding mind. It is thus, and only thus, that famous things are done in the performance of musical masterpieces. Compared with the result so produced, that attained by English orchestras after, at best, two rehearsals, is but a scramble, wherein whatever appears really excellent comes from chance, or the power of extraordinary skill triumphing over adverse conditions.

Another memorable incident of Cherubini's period at the Conservatoire is the publication (1835) of his "Cours de Contrepoint et de Fugue," in order that, as he himself said, "instruction in counterpoint should form part of the course of study in the establishment which I have the honour of directing"—words that mean, perhaps, more attention to counterpoint, rather than the setting it up as a new study. The Director seems to have intended presenting this work to the Académie, and a memorandum intended to accompany it was found among his papers. This document begins by declaring that counterpoint is universal rather than national—"the same in all countries." It then continues: "By counterpoint the faculty of composing purely and vigorously is acquired. Thus, when a man is thoroughly master of counterpoint and fugue, he is certain of being an accomplished composer; he then knows sufficient to give himself up to the impulses of genius and imagination, to undertake what is called high composition, whether vocal or instrumental. It is then that the Italian, German, or French style may be embraced, according to the choice, taste, and liking of a young composer. But he must, above all, have learned counterpoint, as mentioned above." It is not quite needless to cite these remarks at the present moment.

WEBER'S "OBERON."

By LUDWIG NOHL.

It is honour to a man to be the slave of his word.—Weber.

"NEVER, since there have been operas, has a work been produced in which the inner contradictions in this style of writing have been more consistently encountered and more openly demonstrated by a composer, great alike in talent, in depth of feeling, in love of truth, and in noble determination to achieve the utmost. These contradictions consist," says Wagner in his book "Opera and Drama," "in associating the absolute, and completely self-sufficing melody, with undeviating truth of dramatic expression. One of the two had necessarily to be sacrificed—melody or drama—Rossini sacrificed the drama; the noble Weber wished to restore it by the power of his more intelligent melody. He had to learn that this was impossible. Worn and exhausted by the painful labour of his 'Euryanthe,' he sank down on the soft cushions of an Oriental fairy-like dream, and through the wonder-horn of 'Oberon' he breathed out his last sigh."

Weber writes on March 1, 1824, to his friend Danzi, in Carlsruhe: "The expectations of the general public have been screwed up to an impossible pitch by the wonderful result of the 'Freischütz,' and now comes the simple, grave work, that seeks to achieve nothing but truth of expression, of passion, and of delineation of character, and is destitute of the manifold variety and excitement of its predecessor. Well, God's will be done!" Nevertheless, the worthy representation of the work, that was to be "the cradle of the new school of music," met with an equally worthy reception on the 31st, in Dresden.

All the more deeply did Weber now feel the value of other truly artistic productions. "What a glorious work," he writes, after a performance of the "Seasons"; and, concerning a performance of "I know that my Redeemer liveth," the biography says: "He, who disliked all public display of feeling, fought for a long time against the emotion, half religious, half artistic, that overpowered him; but suddenly he was compelled to lay down his conductor's bâton, bowed down his head on his desk, and burst into a flood of tears." A pause had, moreover, occurred in his own creative faculty. Deep mental exhaustion had followed his over-exertion in "Euryanthe." He also began to have a presentiment of his early death, and his warm affection for his family never left him free from the thought of leaving them in a permanently secure position by his intellectual labours.

On his return from Marienbad, in 1824, he found an offer from the lessee of Covent Garden Theatre, the admirable actor Kemble, that he should write a new opera and conduct the "Freischütz" and "Preciosa." Here was a prospect opened to him of earning at once fame and money. Kemble suggested "Faust" and "Oberon" as subjects; Weber chose the latter, which was thoroughly congenial to his nature, and he, the sick man, nearly forty years old, learnt English that he might write in the spirit of the English people.

In a letter to Kemble, he says: "The English opera is rather a drama, with songs"; and thus he was here obliged to give up that unity of musical drama which he had achieved. Moreover, he knew the English to be "partial to drastic effects, with strong nerves, not quick in artistic appreciation, wedded to established forms, but in their phlegmatic constitution requiring strong stimulants."

During his whole life, Weber's thoughts and feelings were wrapt in the beauties of nature, as we see in the "fragrant forest" of the "Freischütz." It was to him a second existence, in which he refreshed his mortal being and felt immortal life. These lovely charms he has, by the power of his all-achieving art, thoroughly associated with his "Oberon." This, and the mysterious attraction of distant lands of romance, the gorgeousness of Oriental life, and droll, clumsy strength of the Turkish element, the latter represented by an original melody, constitute lasting and valuable qualities in "Oberon." During the composition of this opera, Weber suffered much, and his work rendered a journey to Ems absolutely necessary. There he was destined to experience the sunshine of real celebrity. Although when he passed through Weimar, the old lion of literature who viewed his fame, through Zelter's spectacles, as "a mushroom growth without any real timber," had received him with patronising coolness, he shortly afterwards, at Wiesbaden, had evidence of his popularity, in a "moving scene," which he himself describes in the following pleasant fashion to his wife:—

"A Doctor Horn was sitting by me, a highly cultivated man, and a great lover of music. After we had had a very interesting conversation about literature and many subjects, and he found that I was from Saxony, where he had formerly studied, he questioned me concerning a thousand things. The music band was playing brought our discourse upon the 'Freischütz.' I artfully evaded every question that could have betrayed me, until the man, quite astonished to find me so much at home in the subject, asked my name. Well, it is an honest name, and accordingly I could not conceal that I was called Weber. 'Weber!' cried he, quite eagerly; 'Gottfried Weber?' 'No,' said I. 'From Berlin, then?' 'He's dead long ago. But,' with a pause, like one who holds his breath in joyous surprise, 'you can't be—' 'Carl Maria von Weber,' replied I, quite quietly, filling my glass. You should have seen how the man sat stiff and motionless, for five minutes, as if struck by lightning, and at last, while his eyes moistened, he said, with a quiet earnestness, 'What a joy God has allowed me to experience!' You know, dear Lina, that the biggest and thickest clouds of incense neither tickle my nose nor bewilder my senses. But here, I thanked the Creator for having given me the power to touch a good man's heart so deeply; and I do not think that a better reward will ever be offered to me."

On his return from Ems, a powerful stimulus to exertion was given him by the performance, after long delay, of his "Euryanthe" in Berlin, where, in opposition to the foreign taste of the Court, with its favourite Spontini, the people and the educated classes began to follow the ideas of the war of liberation, even in the domain of art. Nevertheless the opera was scarcely understood by the Berlin people, and a deficit of 25,000 dollars had to be provided for. It was Wagner's works that first awakened true appreciation for this jewel of German art.

Meanwhile the illness of the composer was increasing in an alarming way. "How am I? Very well, only that I've consumption in the throat; but that is of no consequence, dearest patron," said he to Holter. And with still more despairing irony he explained to Gubitz: "Dear friend, I shall earn a good bit of money in England that I owe to my family; but I know very well that I am going to London—to die there. Silence—I know it!" A morbid eagerness to work took possession of him, and the biography says, with justice: "The conviction that he had not a moment to lose, if he was to succeed in turning the fame he had purchased with his life into so much money, that his wife and children should not have to starve, is to be regarded as the mainspring of his actions during those concluding months." But even this satisfaction he was not to experience. Neither the opera nor his other undertakings in London brought a rich profit. "I have heard his coffin shut," cried Caroline in anguish, when, on February 7, 1826, he had climbed into the travelling carriage, his already swollen feet wrapped in thick velvet boots.

Very grateful to him on his arrival in England was the reception he met with from Sir George Smart, with whom he was invited to take up his residence, and he was soon to learn that he was really held in high esteem by the English public, for when he went to a theatre, and, supposing himself to be entirely unknown, stepped forward to the front of the box. "That is Weber—there's Weber!" cried a voice; and such a storm burst forth that he could not be persuaded it was meant for him, until he recognised his name, in its English pronunciation, and bowed his thanks, deeply moved. "Are these the cold Englishmen who receive me thus—it is incredible with what heartiness?"—he himself writes.

The cast of "Oberon" was admirable, the rehearsals went excellently; but "Where is the joyous, strong courage I once felt?" he exclaims. Above all things it made him at last quite angry, that he was obliged everywhere and always to hear and perform only the "Freischütz," and that too at concerts. He noticed more and more that music was not life and happiness to the English, but an enjoyment to be bought and paid for like others, and this gave him a desolate feeling. He was already almost a dead man; but still he kept to his duty in every particular, and, after various delays, the first representation of his last work took place on April 12, 1826.

His entrance into the orchestra was a signal for the whole audience to rise like a rushing wave of the sea, and for almost a quarter of an hour nothing was heard but cheering, hammering of benches, and other sounds of welcome. Not a single piece went by without tokens of approval; but the same demonstrations were called forth by the beautiful scenery—a plain proof that there was no heart in the affair. When at last the curtain had fallen, there occurred, what was till then unprecedented in England, loud cries were raised for Weber, continually increasing in vehemence. Then the curtain was raised, and Weber stepped modestly forth, bowed amid a whirlwind of joyous welcome, and disappeared. "The honour of being called out had not been given even to Rossini," says the biography.

"Herr von Weber was received with a warmth that has seldom—perhaps never—been exceeded in a theatre," says the Harmonicon. But as that important musical journal observed concerning the music, that it was more calculated to satisfy the scientific judgment of connoisseurs than to please the general public, though "not destitute of melody," so did also a German afterwards notice the real result of the work with the simple words, "'Oberon' here rejoices in the quiet approval of the numerous educated people, who have lately begun to know and to love German music. The general public, whose interest was aroused by the more striking music and incidents in the 'Freischütz,' seem less attracted by it." But in time the work was destined to take its place with "Euryanthe," side by side with the "Freischütz."

On the morning of June 5 the noble master was found dead in his bed, here in the strange land.

THE VIOLIN-MAKER OF BREMEN.

By EDWARD HERON-ALLEN.

(From the French.)

Not a hundred years ago there dwelt in the city of Bremen a luthier, who, being a man of refined tastes and superior education, was an artist in the fullest acceptance of the term.

Daily coming into contact with, and being largely patronised by, the most celebrated artists, whether poets, painters, players, or singers, that the country contained, he quickly reached the goal to which he was striving—namely, to become a Mæcenas, a dilettante, an art connoisseur—and thus surrounded by the comforts of life, the pleasures conferred by wealth, and the company of men of talent, it became his habit to give weekly soirées, which were prolonged late into the night, on which occasions all the intellect and musical talent of Bremen were wont to assemble under his hospitable roof, and what with music, dancing, and flirtation, these little réunions became renowned from afar as the most delightful rendezvous in the vicinity. To such a point did he sound all the depths and shoals of social delight that all classes in the State became jealous of him, and their very jealousy only goaded the happy fiddle-maker to new exertions to maintain and improve his social and artistic position.

It was, however, obvious from the first that this state of things could not last; by degrees, as he began to pay less attention to his business, his connection (i.e., the remunerative one) began to become small by degrees and beautifully less, the importunate creditor began to make his appearance, and the sheriff's officer hovered in the background ready for his final swoop. Our luthier laughing at his troubles, did not worry himself about them, and as a natural consequence another week brought him to the end of his tether, and he was a ruined man. Confined to his house by the huissier, and besieged by creditors who guarded his house jealously to make sure that he did not carry away the smallest article of furniture, or a single valuable instrument, another man would have given over to despair; not so our friend, his wits were, on the contrary, rather sharpened than otherwise, and he hit, in his embarrassment, on a grand expedient.

He had arrived at the eve of the day on which he was to be attached in person, and his effects sold at auction, when he put into operation the following stratagem. To upwards of forty friends, all first-rate musicians, he sent copies of the following note, sub rosa—

"MY DEAR FRIEND,—To-morrow morning the law will take its course and I shall be imprisoned. To-night, therefore, I must bid a last farewell to the delightful life I have been leading, and to the pleasures I have experienced in our intellectual réunions, pleasures for which I have to so great an extent to thank you, mon cher, and for which I am so largely indebted to your talents. Come, therefore, for the last time, this evening, and we will, for the last time, make a night of it. There will be music.

"N.B.—Don't bring your instrument with you.

"Yours,

"THE VIOLIN-MAKER OF BREMEN."

Every one came, and immediately on the last arrival he made his guests execute together, on instruments taken from his trade stock, the fortissimo passages of a crashing Overture.

The night was as black as ink. Whenever the crash of the instruments reached its culminating point the Violin-maker threw some costly article of furniture out of a back window, to friends who immediately made away with them to a place of safety. When the house had been stripped every visitor left, carrying with him an instrument. Last of all, the luthier got away by the back door, locking it after him, and the creditors breaking in next morning wreaked their vengeance on—a bottomless chair, a broken bridge, and a set of used strings. These were the only traces left of the "VIOLIN-MAKER OF BREMEN."

THE St. James's Gazette took occasion lately to remark upon the fact that musical works, being written in "a sort of universal language," are just now enjoying a good deal of international hospitality. Beyond doubt the witness is true, and, indeed, it seems as though the "divine art" has begun to realise, in its way, what Gerald Massey sang about long ago: "The parliament of man, the federation of the world." Our contemporary mentioned several instances of actual or intended welcome given to musical compositions of one nation by the public of another. Two Frenchmen—M. Reyer and M. Godard—will each produce an opera at Brussels during the present winter. This, however, is not remarkable, Brussels, though politically Belgian, being more a French town than many towns in France. We learn also that a French version of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" is in contemplation at the Monnaie. Some significance belongs to this event, the apparition of Wagner in a Gallic dress having at least the attraction of novelty and the interest of suggestiveness. Drawing "Die Meistersinger" from Germany, Belgium, or, rather, the Low Countries, will give in return the "Graf Hammerstein" of M. Jules de Swert, whose work is to be presented first at Weimar, then at Mayence, Darmstadt, and other places. We read further of the contemplated production at Trieste of "Nerone," the work of an Englishman, Mr. George Carter, while the performance at Hamburg of Rubinstein's "Sulamite" and a comic opera "Unter Räubern," has recently been noticed. So far the St. James's Gazette, but our contemporary strangely omitted all reference to facts more interesting in the eyes of Englishmen than any of those cited, save, indeed, the bringing out of "Nerone." We are not unaccustomed to the production in one Continental country of musical works by natives of another. The thing is in no sense a phenomenon, but we may fairly claim as unusual and remarkable the recognition by Continental amateurs of our own insular talent. During several centuries there have not been more than one or two precedents for this, and the case of Balfe's "Bohemian Girl," played both in France and Germany, alone comes readily to mind. What are the facts now? Simply that English composers are winning German fame in several instances, and that musical Germany is beginning to look towards musical England not only with respect, but with expectation. The change cannot be called less than astonishing, having regard to its completeness and suddenness. "But is it true?" some may ask. In answer, let us point to the numerous performances in Germany of Mr. F. Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony; to the representation at Hanover not long ago of Mr. Villiers Stanford's "Veiled Prophet," to the production at Cologne, the other day, of Mr. Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda," and to the contemplated performance at Vienna of Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba," which opera is soon to be witnessed in Hamburg; as also the "Savonarola" of Mr. Villiers Stanford. These facts are enough to show, not only how far circumstances have broken down Continental prejudice against English music, but likewise what an access of real talent our native composers are manifesting. The situation is one that sets imagination at work.

It may be that the wonderful era of German productiveness is coming to an end, and that the nation will lie fallow a while, leaving the kindred Teutons of the west to "take up the running." Who can tell? At any rate, the signs of the times rather encourage than repress the idea; while the world cannot say that it is not our turn to swell the riches of its music. One thing is clear: at no previous time has the cause of English music been more hopeful, or the wiping away of the reproach against us as an "unmusical nation" more certain.

We should be sorry to imagine that the position of the musical professor in England is shown by the terms we constantly see proffered to him for his services. Such advertisements as we have from time to time commented upon are, we hope, especially addressed either to the amateur, who exercises whatever talent he may possess chiefly for amusement, or to the young pupil who is desirous of adding something to his income during his studentship. The following announcement, however, extracted from a London daily paper, seems unique, both in the requirements stipulated for, and the sum offered to secure them:—"MUSIC MASTER WANTED at once, in a country boarding school. Must be able to teach pianoforte, violin, vocal music, and harmony well. Will be required to assist in school with juniors, if time not filled up with music. Good discipline indispensable." Here we pause to consider, in the first place, whether one could be found fully competent to teach all these branches of the art, and afterwards "assist in school with juniors"; and, in the second place, what terms could possibly repay such an unprecedented exercise of mental and physical power? Our first question of course cannot yet be replied to; but the second is thus answered: "Board, lodging, washing, and £30 per annum to commence with"! As this offer can scarcely be intended either for the amateur or the pupil to whom we have alluded, we may fairly infer that the advertiser wishes to engage a bona fide member of the musical profession; and as it is stated that the "salary will be raised after first term, if found suitable," it is evident that the office will be held on trial. Is it then supposed that an artist who has, by a large outlay of time and money, acquired such exceptional qualifications as are here desired is to be repaid by a pittance much less than would be given to a good cook? We had hoped that so accomplished a professor as this advertisement appeals to could command an adequate return for his laborious duties; but if such terms as these are offered and accepted, our Schools of Music will have powerful rivals in our Schools of Cookery.

A LETTER which appears in our present number upon "Cheap Music Books," awakens a subject which admits of much discussion. The writer expresses surprise that, considering the "enterprising firms" which now supply the public with cheap literature, no music-publishing firms should have issued works on music and musical works at an equally moderate rate. In these days, when most of the popular oratorios can be procured for the price of a "Royalty" ballad, it seems strange to complain of the want of cheap music; and we may therefore conclude that what is desired is that works upon the art should be placed within the means of all by publication in cheap monthly parts. But the books named in this letter are issued at a price which would be very soon reached by "monthly numbers at one shilling each," and we fail, therefore, to see what would be gained by their appearing in this form, especially as Primers upon every branch of music are to be had at one and two shillings each. Passing on to the suggestion that "most of the great symphonies (full score) could also be issued in the same way, also the full score of the oratorios," we are met by the fact that whilst everybody who has learnt to read can enjoy the works of our standard authors, the full scores of the works of our standard composers are unintelligible save to a small section of the public. "Imagine the eager demand there would be," says our correspondent, "for Gounod's 'Redemption,' the 'Elijah,' and other great works in sixpenny monthly numbers." Presuming that all those who would buy sixpenny monthly numbers of literary works would also purchase the full scores of equally popular musical works, this matter would be well worth the consideration of any "enterprising" firm; but the comparatively limited number of persons who desire to possess themselves of musical compositions in score will find that they are all published at a sufficiently moderate price. The question, however, is of much interest; and we shall be glad to receive, and give currency to, the opinions of our readers.

EXPERIENCE has proved that, even when the words of a foreign language have been presumably rendered into English, it becomes sometimes absolutely necessary to translate the translation. An instance of this has recently come before us in a prospectus forwarded from Paris, which announces a new musical undertaking thus: "I have just established in Paris, 13 rue de Verneuil, an office under the firm of International Musical Publishing Office, in order to get the persons taking interest in music acquainted with the different publications made either by the authors or by the editors of music, and which are often forgotten for want of sufficient relations." There is certainly much truth in this, strangely as it is expressed, and anxiously reading onwards for an explanation of how "sufficient relations" can be successfully established, we find that "every three months will be printed thirty thousands copies of the Catalogue of Worths, which will have been referred to my judgment," and that these catalogues will be sent gratis to "every person minding music, as well in France as abroad, to the Organists, Capelmasters, Directors of Philharmonic Societies, Flourishes, Choral Societies, Conductors of bands, Leader of military bands, young men's and ladies boarding schools, etc., etc." It might be imagined that for the intended purpose the names of compositions furnished by composers or editors would be sufficient; but it appears that ten copies of each work must be sent "in order to pay the expenses of office printing and publicity." It seems also that all compositions forwarded for insertion in the catalogue will be subject to criticism, for the manager of the establishment, M. Léon de Nys, tells us that "an approbation will be given of every valuable piece, for the ordinary pieces I will only announce them." The advantages to be derived from dealings with the International Musical Publishing Office are perhaps a little obscured in consequence of the imperfect translation of the prospectus from the French, but the price to be paid for the advantages is stated in extremely plain English.

AN evening contemporary has recently given us some remarkable revelations respecting the existence of a colony of organ-grinders in the centre of Birmingham. It seems that some years ago an Italian and a young girl purchased an Italian piano, and, by playing in the streets, rapidly accumulated a sum of £100. With this the man went to Italy and engaged a number of men—some of them actual brigands—and good-looking girls, whom he brought to Birmingham at his own expense, and employed them to turn organs in the streets. At the present time he has under him upwards of 200 individuals, who all live together, having rooms specially provided for eating, cooking, and all domestic arrangements. Some of these itinerant musicians, it is said, earn as much as ten pounds a week, the chief of this remarkable tribe living in ease, and owning large property in Italy, and also in this country. It is no uncommon thing for the men to go to Italy in the summer for a holiday, and to send their wives to the seaside for two or three weeks' relaxation from their work. If all this be really true, there must certainly be a much greater love for the sound of the organ in the streets of Birmingham than in those of London, for not only are the poor performers constantly brought before the magistrates for "annoyance," to the peaceable inhabitants of the metropolis, but we too often see the depressing result of their day's work in that unmistakable expression of want and suffering which cannot but excite the sympathy even of those who would gladly dispense with their music. Should the colony of organ-grinders from Birmingham, however, ever invade London, we cannot say that the tide would not turn in their favour. There may be a manner and bearing about these men—derived from consciousness of their master's power in the state—which would command attention from the passers by; and, assuredly, there would at least be a delightful novelty in seeing a real brigand turn an organ.

At a meeting convened for the purpose of forming a "Borough of Chelsea Philharmonic Society," the Chairman, Sir Charles Dilke, spoke in warm terms of the desirability of not permitting Chelsea to be any longer without a musical institution such as now exists in so many other districts. It is always satisfactory to find those who cultivate the art earnestly engaged in promoting its best interests: but it is perhaps still more so to find one who tells us that, although he was "rather a hard student, both at the pianoforte and at harmony, he altogether failed to become a musician," not only engaged in organising a Philharmonic Society, but even accepting the office of Vice-President. Sir Charles said: "Music was exceedingly valuable as a training to all those who took part in it, and he did not think people made a mistake in giving up a good deal of time to the acquisition of a good knowledge of music, even if such knowledge did not result in success from a popular point of view." We sincerely congratulate the Borough of Chelsea upon being represented by one who so heartily sympathises with an art which he confesses to have wooed but not won; and trust that the new Society—of which it is probable that Lord Cadogan will become President—may receive that extensive and influential support which alone can ensure its success.

MR. W. J. WINCH, the most prominent native tenor of the United States, has just arrived in London, and intends remaining for some considerable time in this country. He will appear very shortly at some of the best Concerts, both in London and in the provinces.

In our notice of Richard Slater's tabular statement of the varied bars in Wagner's "Parsifal," which appeared in our last number, the figures showed, we find, stand thus: of silent bars, 8; of purely vocal music, 75; of instrumental music, 1,250; and of voice and orchestra, 3,014. As these errors arose from ourselves, we take the earliest opportunity of correcting them, in justice to the energy and earnestness of our correspondent.

ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THIS excellent and prosperous association made a brilliant commencement to its new season on the 7th ult., with a performance of Berlioz's "Faust." The popularity of this remarkable work suffers no abatement, and the Albert Hall was nearly full, additional interest being given to the occasion by the engagement of Madame Albani. The Canadian prima donna invested the part of Marguerite with infinite charm, avoiding all theatrical effects and artificial grace, and thus realising the simple purity and tenderness of the music. Mr. Lloyd as Faust, Mr. Santley as Mephistopheles, and Mr. Pyatt as Brander, repeated their familiar successes in these parts. The rendering of the choruses reflected the very highest credit on Mr. Barnby, the ensemble being absolutely perfect, and considering the large body of voices, this is the warmest praise that could be offered. Power was forthcoming when needed, and the more delicate numbers were rendered with exquisite refinement. The orchestra was thoroughly satisfactory, and the immense audience manifested its appreciation of the performance by enthusiastic applause and demands for encores, which in three instances were complied with.

Gounod's "Redemption" was announced for the 28th ult., too late for notice in our present number.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

JUDGING from the crowded state of St. James's Hall at the first Concert, for the present season, of this resuscitated Society, on the 16th ult., it may be fairly anticipated that a new and prosperous career has been entered upon, which is likely not only to bring honour upon the Institution itself, but to be in the highest degree beneficial to the progress of sacred art in this country by the performance of works of modern composers, as well as of those masterpieces which have been bequeathed to us by the writers of the past. True to the mission which, happily, the Society has now resolved unflinchingly to pursue, the opening Concert was devoted to the production in London of Sir George Macfarren's successful Oratorio, "King David"; and that its triumphant reception at the Leeds Festival, for which it was expressly written, was decisively ratified by a metropolitan audience is a proof that the sterling worth of the music will assert itself with equal power when removed from the surroundings of a Festival Concert-room and presented as one of the works selected in the season's programme of a London society. It will not here be necessary to repeat our opinion either of the magnificent contrapuntal writing displayed in the choral portions of the work, or of the tender and sympathetic treatment of much of the solo music; but we may say that every number was listened to with the keenest interest, and that the applause was so frequent and so enthusiastic that had Sir Arthur Sullivan—who conducted the Oratorio—yielded, the performance might have been prolonged to an indefinite extent by repetitions. One chorus, however, "The seed of David," was so vociferously re-demanded that the Conductor was compelled to infringe the wholesome rule of resisting encores in a sacred work; and there were few, if any, of the audience who objected to hearing the fine fugue in this number a second time. The chorus, which concludes the first part, "Vengeance belongeth unto the Lord," may be also cited amongst the great successes of the evening, and indeed all the choral numbers were thoroughly appreciated, the scholarly treatment of the well-marked themes, even when not made prominent by being thrown into fugal form, creating a deep impression upon the audience. The only alteration in the cast of the work, as performed at Leeds, was the substitution of Miss Anna Williams for Madame Valleria. All the songs which fell to her share—especially "The path of the just"—were given with excellent effect, and her portion of the duets "Help, O King" (with Mr. Santley) and "Like as a father" (with Madame Patey) evidenced the care she had taken in the preparation of the music. The singing of Mr. Santley throughout the evening was of the highest order, his rendering of the deeply pathetic song of lament over the death of Absalom being, indeed, a lesson to every vocal student in the room. Madame Patey and Mr. E. Lloyd gave the utmost effect to the solos which fell to their share, and elicited the warmest applause. Many of the choruses were finely sung, but the tendency to flatten—particularly in the unaccompanied choral piece, "Remember not, Lord, our offences"—was often painfully apparent. The orchestra, too, was by no means irreproachable, the need of more rehearsals being evidenced throughout the evening; but with all these drawbacks "King David" sufficiently asserted itself as a work of the highest class; and when Sir George Macfarren, in answer to a unanimous and enthusiastic call, was led forward on the platform by Sir Arthur Sullivan, the storm of genuine applause with which he was greeted must have convinced him that it is possible for a man to become a prophet in his own country. Another performance of the work by Mr. Willing's Choir will take place on the 11th inst.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE Saturday Concerts since our last notice have been singularly devoid of novel or exceptionally interesting features. Only one of the five performances with which the present record is concerned stands forth from the rest, not on account of its artistic excellence, but owing to a feature perhaps unique in the history of art. The distinguished James Yellowplush must surely have presided at the directors' council which decreed to devote an entire Saturday programme to the musical knights of England. That these noble champions and their deeds were numerically strong enough for such a task could not be doubted. For some occult reason the accolade of our Sovereign Lady the Queen has been bestowed upon musical professors with a liberality withheld from other arts. If not exactly as plenty as blackberries, knighted musicians are more numerous even than musical doctors, to say nothing of painters, or sculptors, or literary men. Without further reflections as to the relative value of genuine merit and external distinction, let us say briefly that the Concert under discussion (October 27) was, as a matter of necessity, of a somewhat miscellaneous character. A Festival March, "Edinburgh," by Sir Herbert Oakeley, opened the proceedings, which were brought to a close by Sir Arthur Sullivan's Overture "Di Ballo." The distance between these extremes was filled up by Sterndale Bennett's Overture "Paradise and the Peri," miscellaneous songs by Sir Julius Benedict, Sir Michael Costa, and Sir Henry Bishop, and an Orchestral Prelude "The Eve of St. John," by Sir Robert Stewart, the raison d'être of which, apart from the Cantata it serves to introduce, was not sufficiently apparent. Amongst these smaller pieces Sir George Macfarren's Symphony in E minor stood forth as a solid piece of deliberate workmanship. It is earnestly conceived and carried out with that firmness of purpose which is characteristic of the composer's style. The stern features of the opening Allegro are it is true somewhat relaxed in the Serenade which stands for an Andante, and in the Gavotte which takes the place of the Scherzo. But even in the graceful old dance form a certain feeling (not uncommon by the way in English ball-rooms) as if dancing were a duty rather than an enjoyment, seldom leaves hold of the hearer's mind. The Symphony in E minor was written for the late British Orchestral Society in 1874, and may claim a prominent place amongst Sir George Macfarren's works. It remains to add that at the same concert Mr. Edward Howell, a consummate master of his instrument, played with excellent effect Goltermann's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra (No. 3, in D minor), to which he added an Andante and Allegro by Boccherini for the same instrument. The first concert in November was given on the 3rd of that month, which, although not the date of the death of Mendelssohn, was sufficiently near that fatal day to make it the excuse for a commemorative programme, including the master's Italian Symphony "Walpurgis Night" and Violin Concerto (Mr. Carrodus). The second Concert of the month introduced a trifling but graceful novelty in the shape of two little orchestral pieces by F. H. Cowen, respectively named "Melody" and "A L'Espagnole," the second of which was received with a perfect storm of applause. Mr. Maas lent the beauty of his voice to the prize-song from "Die Meistersinger," made familiar to English concert-rooms by Mr. Lloyd's unsurpassable rendering. The Symphony was Beethoven's in A, and the Concert opened with an admirable performance of Brahms's "Tragic" Overture. The most remarkable feature of the third November Concert was the performance of Chopin's F minor Concerto by M. de Pachmann, in which that excellent pianist surpassed himself. Those who remember Chopin's playing are reminded of the poetic charm of his style by the Russian virtuoso, and it is impossible to imagine that the master himself could have done fuller justice to his most delicate imaginings than did M. de Pachmann by his truly inspired rendering. Miss Griswold, a young American artist of French training, evinced dramatic qualities of the highest order in the "Air du Livre" (from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet"); and Mr. Harold Thomas's Overture "Mountain, Lake and Moorland" formed an enjoyable opening to an exceptionally enjoyable concert. Those familiar with the numerous compositions of Herr Carl Reinecke will not expect a detailed analysis of his Violoncello Concerto in D minor, Op. 82, which displays its composer's refined and facile but not very original style of writing in a favourable light, and found, on Saturday, the 24th ult., a congenial interpreter in Mons. Fischer, a new comer. Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor was the most substantial item of the Concert, which wound up with the ballet music from "Colomba," stupidly called in the announcements "La Colomba," as if the name of that opera had something to do with a pigeon.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE spectacle of St. James's Hall crammed from end to end on the 5th ult. was welcome to those who watch with interest the steady progress of a love for all that is best and purest in musical art among the English public. There may have been special reasons why Mr. Arthur Chappell's season commenced in an unusually brilliant manner. The programme of the first Concert contained the most popular of Beethoven's Quartets, that in C, Op. 59, No. 3 of the famous Rasumovsky set; and the pianist of the evening was M. Vladimir de Pachmann. The co-operation of Herr Joachim used to be considered essential to the perfect interpretation of a Beethoven Quartet, but the most hypercritical listener could not wish for a better performance than that given with Madame Norman-Néruda as leader, her playing being distinguished by powerful tone, breadth of style, and all the freedom and vigour demanded by the work. The immense popularity of M. de Pachmann is easy to explain, but the fact itself presents some singular features. He is not in the slightest degree a sensational pianist, and though within his limits he is without a rival, these limits are clearly defined, and when he exceeds them the result is unsatisfactory. Nothing could be more delightful than his rendering of Chopin's Barcarole in F sharp, and a graceful little Wiegandell of Henselt, and the same marvellous delicacy of touch was exhibited in a Toccata by the last-named composer, which he gave as an encore. But his playing in Schubert's Quintet in A (Op. 114) might be described in the words of Pope, "Fine by defect and delicately weak." The piano-forte was at times almost inaudible, and the full effect of the work was therefore unrealised. Madame Néruda played the Ballade in G minor, by her brother, Herr Franz Néruda, which has been heard on former occasions at these Concerts, and Signor Piatti brought forward, for the first time, a Nocturne in F for violoncello by Ignaz Lachner. The piece is not remarkable in any way, but the composer is one of three brothers, all of whom have attained high repute in the musical world. The eldest, Franz, who still survives, was an intimate friend of Schubert, and the youngest, Vincenz, will be remembered by many English musicians as the conductor of a German opera company in London, in 1842. It only remains to be mentioned that Miss Santley, who is always welcome at these Concerts, sang with refined taste two dainty little songs by Mr. F. H. Cowen, and Handel's "O had I Jubal's lyre."

There was again an overflowing attendance at the first of the Saturday Concerts, but a mere formal record of the programme will be sufficient, as it consisted wholly of familiar works. Mozart's Quintet in D, and Schumann's Quintet in E flat, are acknowledged masterpieces which it would be an impertinence to criticise. Madame Néruda has so frequently played Corelli's Violin Sonata in D, Op. 5, that she might with advantage introduce some other number of the same set. M. de Pachmann was more at home in a Nocturne and a Mazurka of Chopin than in Weber's Rondo Brilliant in E flat. Mr. Santley contributed songs by Schumann and Gounod.

In the programme of the 12th ult. the least familiar item was Chopin's Pianoforte Trio in G minor, Op. 8, as the work had only been performed twice before at St. James's Hall. This neglect is not difficult to account for, nor can we say that it is unmerited, for the Trio is one of the least satisfactory of Chopin's compositions. In form it is vague and eccentric, the development of the themes is poor, and the interest is confined to the pianoforte part. M. de Pachmann made the most of this, and he was also acceptable in Schubert's Impromptu in A flat, Op. 90; but his rendering of Mozart's fine Fantasia in C minor could not be admired. In consequence, perhaps, of defective memory he played several passages incorrectly, beside taking liberties with the tempo, which can only be considered permissible in music of a far later date than that of Mozart. Mendelssohn's Quartet in E minor, Op. 44, No. 2, is a favourite at these concerts, and the piquant scherzo was redemanded, though Madame Néruda wisely declined the compliment. Mozart's beautiful Sonata in A, for pianoforte and violin, the last of four such works in that key, completed the instrumental portion of the programme. Mr. Edward Lloyd sang in his best manner the Preislied from "Die Meistersinger" and Blumenthal's "Evening Song." The former piece has become a cheval de bataille with tenor singers, and if the public does not speedily weary of it, it will not be for lack of frequent repetition.

On the assumption that toujours perdrix is cloying to the appetite, the appearance of Mr. Charles Hallé as the pianist at the concert on Saturday, the 17th, gave a welcome variety to the proceedings of the season thus far. The veteran artist selected Beethoven's Sonata in E minor, Op. 90, in the Allegretto of which he is heard at his best. So thought the audience and insisted upon an encore. Madame Néruda played the Adagio from Viotti's Concerto in A minor, and the concerted works of the afternoon were Beethoven's Quartet in C minor, No. 4, of the Lobkowitz set, and Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in A, Op. 26. The programme of the following Monday commenced with Spohr's Quartet in E minor, Op. 45, No. 2, one of those denominated "first-violin quartets," from the prominence given to the leading instrument. The work is full of delicious melody, to which Madame Néruda gave the utmost expression. Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor provided M. de Pachmann with the means of displaying his ability to the utmost advantage. Signor Piatti is fond of reviving excerpts from the works of semi-forgotten Italian composers, and this time he brought forward an air in D minor from a Sonata by Geminiani, to which he had added a preamble, an elaborate cadenza, and a pianoforte accompaniment. Miss Santley selected songs by Rubinstein, and two former Royal Academy students, Miss Maude White and Miss Alice Borton. Beethoven's Trio in D, Op. 70, No. 1, concluded an enjoyable Concert.

The lengthy programme of Saturday, the 24th ult., included two novelties. It is strange that Mozart's Trio in C, No. 7, should have been neglected so long, and unfortunately this delightful work, which belongs to the composer's ripest period, was commenced so late that a large proportion of the audience did not stay to hear it. The other addition to the répertoire was a Pianoforte Quartet in E minor by Fibich, a Bohemian composer, whose name is entirely unfamiliar in this country. This, however, is not surprising, as he is only thirty-three years old, and it is but recently that a feeling of interest in Czechish music has been aroused in England. Herr Fibich is conductor of the National Theatre in Prague, and his works already comprise an Opera, two Symphonies, and a number of smaller compositions of all kinds. The E minor Quartet is numbered Op. 11, and is in three movements only, a Scherzo being wanting. The work is strongly national in feeling, but without extravagance or disregard of the laws of form. There are signs of immaturity, but there is also much that is interesting in the music, and the Quartet was warmly received. Mozart's Quintet in C, and Schumann's Humoresque, the latter played by Mr. Charles Halle, completed the instrumental portion of the programme, and Mr. Maas was the vocalist.

On Monday, the 26th, the programme commenced with Mozart's delightful Quartet in A, No. 5 of the set dedicated to Haydn, and concluded with Rubinstein's Trio in B flat, Op. 52. The latter work exhibits the Russian composer's genius in a favourable light. The pianist was Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who played Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, omitting three of the variations. Miss Carlotta Elliot gave an interesting selection of songs by Kjerulf, Godard, and Miss Alice Borton.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

This Society gave its first Concert of the present season on Monday, the 26th ult. The pièce de resistance was Mendelssohn's "Athalie," which occupied the first portion of the programme. The solo parts were sustained by Miss Mary Davies, Miss Evelyn Gibson, and Miss Marian McKenzie, who sang their respective numbers with artistic grace; the rendering of the duet "Ever blessed child rejoice," and the trio "Ye who through servile fear," being especially to be commended. The chorus showed great precision of attack, and promises to fall nothing short of its former efficiency. The orchestra left little to be desired, showing great improvement on previous seasons. The Rev. Gordon Calthrop, M.A., acted as reader. The second part was miscellaneous. Miss Marian McKenzie gained great applause in a Cavatina by Bellini, Miss Mary Davies sang Hummel's "Alma Virgo" in her best manner; and the Allegro Vivace from the "Reformation" Symphony (Mendelssohn) and the overture to "Rosamunde" (Schubert) were well played by the orchestra. An effective new Chorus, by Eaton Fanning, with orchestral accompaniment, was a noteworthy item, and much to the taste of the audience. Dr. J. F. Bridge conducted as usual.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

SINCE our last number went to press an autumnal season of these Concerts has begun and ended. It was short, therefore—three performances, in point of fact; each performance relatively as brief as the season. Moreover, the programmes contained only the most familiar works in Herr Richter's catalogue. It follows that the musical historian has little to say, and the musical critic less. The result scarcely, perhaps, fulfils hopes; but, on the other hand, if Herr Richter's patrons are content, it is hard to find a basis for reasonable objection. These Concerts have a special audience, with whose taste, and its satisfaction, no outsider has a right to interfere.

The first performance took place in St. James's Hall, on October 29, the composers represented in the scheme being Brahms ("Die Akademische" Overture), Wagner ("Huldigung's March"; Introduction to third act of "Die Meistersinger," and "Walkürenritt"), and Beethoven ("Pastoral" Symphony). At the second Concert (the 3rd ult.), three other selections from Wagner were given—to wit, the "Tannhäuser" Overture, introduction and closing scene of "Tristan und Isolde," and the Preislied of the "Meistersinger." These were supplemented by Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The final programme (the 10th ult.) comprised Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture and Seventh Symphony; Bach's Orchestral Suite in D, and the Prelude to the "Meistersinger." These selections thoroughly gratified the public to whom they appealed. On each occasion the hall was full; by each audience Herr Richter was treated as a hero, and every selection from Wagner elicited applause compared with which that bestowed even upon Beethoven "paled its ineffectual fire." Let us add that this preferential honour was not without reason, looked upon as a tribute to executive merit. Herr Richter sustains his fame as a Wagnerian conductor. We decline to say he is that and nothing else, but certainly he is that before and above all. He knows Wagner's spirit and method from outer skin to core, and he can produce exactly the effects intended by the master. Listening to the well-known pieces above named, therefore, it was both possible and reasonable to feel that we were in the presence of perfection. We cannot say as much in the case of the works by Beethoven, Bach, and Brahms. When dealing with these, Herr Richter failed to astonish by reason of superiority. He did no more with them than others, while in certain cases he laid himself open to a distinct challenge. Why, for instance, was the finale of the Seventh Symphony taken at a pace that made its correct and clear execution impossible? and why did he play the Gigue in Bach's Suite so slowly that it might have been an allegretto? thus robbing the movement of its characteristic spirit. Herr Richter, no doubt, has reasons worthy of respect, but at present we agree with the majority in impugning his judgment. Apart from these matters the rendering of every work had conspicuous merits, due to Herr Richter's perfect control over his forces. We have known English orchestras made up of better materials, especially in the "wind" department; but there are few, if any, more conspicuous instances of what can be done with average players than that furnished at each Richter Concert. The singer of the Preislied was Mr. Lloyd, who gave it every advantage of voice and style.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

THAT the first performance in London of Dr. Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalen" would excite the interest and attention of the music-loving public there was no reason to doubt. The hall of the Bow and Bromley Institute on the night of Tuesday, October 30, was crowded almost to inconvenience with an appreciative and by no means uncritical audience, which accorded the composer an ovation on his appearance at the organ, and cheered him to the echo at the conclusion of his work, a demonstration which must have been scarcely less gratifying to him than to the body of management to whose enterprise and labour the Cantata owes its introduction to the metropolis. Of the Cantata itself we spoke but two months ago, on the occasion of its production at Gloucester, at such length as almost to preclude us from further detailed criticism, but we may at least say that the good opinion of the composition that we then formed and expressed was more than confirmed upon the present occasion. That "St. Mary Magdalen" is the work of the same mind which has already given us "The Daughter of Jairus" might almost have been asserted had its composer's name been suppressed, owing to certain unmistakable traits common to both works; but while the earlier stepped almost immediately into popularity by its elegance and grace and its never ceasing flow of melody, the later work will, we are inclined to think, rather win its way, perhaps more steadily but no less surely, by its thoughtful tone, its abundant pathos, and deep religious feeling. After having given throughout his career abundant proofs of scholarship and musical learning of a rarely high order, Dr. Stainer has been bold enough to proclaim himself a decided apostle of the latter portion of the nineteenth century as far as regards composition, and we congratulate him on having produced a work marvellously free from those features which constitute what is often known as "organists' music," and free, moreover, from even the semblance of a fugue from beginning to end; a work, too, where the interest heightens rather than flags in its latter numbers.

The performance on the present occasion, although deserving in some respects considerable praise, was by no means as perfect as it might have been had the orchestra—most of whose members played in "St. Mary Magdalen" at Gloucester—enjoyed the advantage of fuller rehearsal under their strange conductor. The accompaniments sadly lacked finish, and sometimes were marked by even greater faults. This, however, is all the adverse criticism we have to offer. The choir knew their work thoroughly and sang, not only with the confidence of knowledge, but so as to prove that, long sure of the letter, they had had time to enter into the spirit of Dr. Stainer's music. A better rendering of the choruses no reasonable person in the audience could have desired. The solo vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. King—a strong quartet, familiar with the composer's requirements, and able to meet them as only accomplished artists could. Dr. Stainer himself presided at the organ, where he did material service, and, with Mr. M'Naught as Conductor, the Cantata was rendered so to the satisfaction of the audience that again and again prolonged applause checked the steady flow of its music.

The second part of the programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection, including the three latter movements of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony. In consequence of the great success of Dr. Stainer's Cantata on its first performance here, it was repeated on the 10th ult. with organ accompaniment only. The interest in the work showed no abatement, and a large number of persons were unable to gain admittance. It is proposed to give a third performance of the work during January.

HARROW SCHOOL.

THERE is a Musical Society, we are glad to say, in connection with the historic foundation on the top of Harrow Hill, and yesterday week (23rd ult.) the Committee thereof gave a Concert in the Speech House, which was crowded by an audience of boys, and many distinguished visitors from London as well as the adjacent neighbourhood. None of the members of the Society took part, the occasion being a very special one, and thought worthy of professional talent in every department. Hence the resources of the Royal Academy of Music were drawn upon, not only for a conductor (Signor Randegger) and an orchestra, composed of past and present students and professors, but also for principal vocalists and chorus. The work performed with all these advantages was a new fairy opera, "Cinderella"; words by the late H. S. Leigh, music by Mr. John Farmer, whose connection with Harrow School everybody knows. It having been stated that the right of representing "Cinderella" on the stage belongs to Mr. Carl Rosa, and that he intends to exercise it in Liverpool next January, and later in London, more than usual curiosity was aroused, though with no hope of complete satisfaction. The mere "recital" of an opera gives but a poor idea of effect, and, indeed, can only be accepted for what it reveals concerning the music. Enough here, as to the libretto, that Mr. Leigh followed closely the lines of the nursery story, adding to the usual characters only Cinderella's father and the Prince's tutor, who, however, is a personage of small dramatic significance. The lyrics are good, and the dialogue to the point, if not brilliant; but as a drama for the stage, there seems to be lack of sufficient action. This will require spectacle for compensation, and Mr. Rosa must make up his mind accordingly when the time comes to carry out his purpose. Concerning Mr. Farmer's music it is needful to premise that the opera is intended for children; its formal description being "a little opera for big children and a big opera for little children." Keeping this in mind, we have in hand a key to the extreme simplicity within the narrow limits of which Mr. Farmer restrained himself. All the music, solo and concerted, is plain as plain can be; dance rhythms prevailing everywhere. The work shows, however, that the most elementary forms are compatible both with beauty and musicianship. There is not an unpleasing or ungainly number in the whole opera; the music flowing on agreeably and in an interesting manner, even when its themes are most wanting in freshness. There are several orchestral numbers, dances, and so on, and these are among the best in the work, while much of the vocal music is distinguished by a happy propriety of expression within the scope allowed by the conditions imposed. The concerted finales will have to be expanded for the stage; this done, we do not see why "Cinderella" should fail of popularity with the audience to whom it appeals. The Harrow performance was sufficiently good for the end in view, and at its close, the opera having been received with great favour, Mr. Farmer was "called" and much applauded. We may add that the copies of the libretto supplied to visitors were unusually artistic, and contained numerous charming etchings by Mr. Heywood Sumner. The little book, published by Wilbee (Harrow) and Novello & Co. (London), is worthy of special mention as one for children.

THE LONDON CHURCH CHOIR ASSOCIATION.

THE chief points of musical interest in the eleventh Festival of this Association, which took place in St. Paul's Cathedral, on Thursday, the 8th ult., were naturally the Service and Anthem, both written for the occasion, the former by Mr. C. E. Miller, the latter by Dr. Stainer. In writing of previous festivals we have been more than once led to question the success, if not the wisdom, of the rule which makes specially-composed chants and hymn-tunes a sine quâ non with the Association at its annual meetings, and this year's experience has served to strengthen our previously expressed opinion; for none of the hymn-tunes or chants rise above the level of mediocrity, while some scarcely reach it, and we hardly think that any (we speak now of the hymn-tunes) will supersede those already associated, to a greater or less degree, with the words to which they were allied.

Of the Service, composed by the recently appointed organist of the neighbouring church of St. Augustine and St. Faith, we may say that we consider it the best work which its composer has yet produced; it is very effectively written both for the voices and the organ, and the general impression left by the music is that of devotional solemnity. But we can scarcely imagine that the extremely slow pace at which the Service was sung could have been in accordance with the composer's intentions; since the music, although not metronome-marked, seems obviously intended to be taken at a considerably greater speed; but, whatever may be said in favour of reduced tempi on such an occasion, both on account of the large mass of voices and the peculiar acoustic properties of the cathedral, no defence can be made for constant dragging and hesitation, amounting in places, to a positive rallentando.

In his Anthem "And all the people saw" (perceived rather) "the thunders and the lightnings," contemporary as nearly as possible with the Oratorio of "St. Mary Magdalen," Dr. Stainer has added to the Church's repertory an Anthem for a season where a want is much felt, namely, Whitsuntide. The opening recitative, for all the tenors and basses, to two verses of a chapter of Exodus, is remarkable for its breadth and simplicity, and as sung by so large a body of voices was highly effective. The succeeding chorus to the first verse of the well-known hymn, "When God of old came down from heaven," is highly dramatic in character, and is followed by a quasi-choral, in a well contrasted style, to the next verse of the hymn; to this a melodious duet for two tenors "Beloved let us love one another" succeeds, and the Anthem concludes with a repetition, slightly prolonged, of the choral, to another verse of the same hymn. Where two reliable tenors are available, this Anthem cannot fail to be found of much use, particularly at Whitsuntide, combining as it does, very considerable vocal effect with no undue difficulties to the executants.

Of the singing of the large and not very easily manageable choir of some 700 voices, we are glad to be able to speak this year in terms of more decided praise than we have before been able to do, notwithstanding the blemishes to which we have already alluded; while the manner in which the voices were kept together reflects the highest credit on Mr. H. R. Bird, the Organist. Mr. J. R. Murray conducted, as usual.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

ORCHESTRAL music has never held a stronger or more promising position in Birmingham than it does at the present moment, thanks in great measure to the public spirited and persistent efforts of Mr. Stockley, whose influence promises to be no less beneficial in this department of executive art than it has unquestionably been in choral singing, with which he was originally identified. The eleventh series of his orchestral Concerts was inaugurated on the 8th ult. by one of the most interesting and meritorious performances which has yet been given here by a local body of instrumentalists, and it is satisfactory to be able to add that the attendance on this occasion was not unworthy of the merits of the entertainment. The orchestral pieces were five in number, including Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Rhapsody "The Dance of the Hours" (from Ponchielli's "Gioconda"), and the Overtures to "Mignon" (Ambroise Thomas) and "Egmont" (Beethoven). The playing throughout showed a marked advance upon that of previous seasons, more particularly in unity and balance of tone; but there was an occasional lack of refinement in the Andante of the Symphony, and the brass instruments were not invariably under perfect control. Mr. Mackenzie's Rhapsody, running over with Scottish colouring and youthful enthusiasm, greatly pleased the audience, and Ponchielli's brilliant ballet-music, illustrating "Morning, Noon, and Night," was also warmly applauded. The vocal selections were invested with special interest on this occasion from the fact of its being Madame Lemmens-Sherington's farewell appearance in Birmingham, where she has been a great favourite ever since the Festival of 1861, when she first sang here. For her farewell efforts she chose "With verdure clad" ("Creation"), "Let the bright Seraphim" ("Samson"), and Beethoven's grand scena "Ah perfido!" in each and all of which she produced a deep impression. Indeed, the enthusiasm of the audience knew no bounds after the performance of the Beethoven Scena. Mr. Edward Lloyd sang the prayer from Wagner's "Rienzi" and Gounod's "Lend me your aid" ("Irene") with excellent effect.

The second of Mr. Stratton's Chamber Concerts, which took place in the Masonic Hall, on the 13th, was chiefly remarkable for the large proportion of novelty, or quasi-novelty, comprised in the programme, every one of the items being new to the frequenters of these entertainments. The solo pianist was Miss Constance Bache, a younger sister of the lamented F. Edward Bache, "the Birmingham Mendelssohn," one of whose compositions, a manuscript Concerto, or rather "Morceau de Concert," for pianoforte, two violins, violoncello, and contra basso, served to open the Concert. The composition was originally written for pianoforte and orchestra, in which form it was produced here some years ago, at a concert given by the Royal Society of Artists, when it won general encomiums in virtue of its melodious grace and refinement, and the charm of its harmonic treatment; but the arrangement played at Mr. Stratton's Concert is scarcely so effective, owing to the undue prominence given to the pianoforte part. The latter was admirably played by Miss Bache, who possesses a beautifully clear and articulate touch and a sympathetic feeling for her brother's music. The excellence of her technique was yet more strikingly exemplified in Beethoven's delightful variations upon a theme in F major (Op. 34), his earliest work of this class, and further evidence of her versatility was afforded in Grieg's Duo Sonata in the same key for piano and violin, in which Mr. Abbott proved a highly competent associate. Mr. Ward was heard to advantage in Joachim's arrangement for viola of a Hebrew melody, and he contributed largely to the effect of Schubert's noble string Quartet in A minor (Op. 29).

On the 26th, the second of Messrs. Harrison's Popular Concerts drew an overflowing audience to the Town Hall. There was, as usual, a powerful array of vocal talent, including Madame Albani, Miss Annie Marriot, Madame Enriquez, and Mr. Maas, besides several artists of minor note, whilst instrumental art was represented by M. Vladimir de Pachmann (pianoforte), Signor Papini (violin), and Mr. Frederic Cliffe and Signor Bisaccia, conductors and accompanists. The interest centred naturally in the performances of Madame Albani, whose selection comprised Bellini's "Qui la voce" ("I Puritani"), Jean Ingelwou's Scotch song "It's we two," and a part with Mr. Maas and Mr. Bridson in the trio "All'erta," from Gounod's "Faust." There is no need to expatiate upon the singing of the renowned Canadian songstress, whose charms of voice and style are nowhere more warmly appreciated than in Birmingham, and whose reception was never more enthusiastic or better deserved than on this occasion. Mr. Maas sang Mora's song "Years and Years" and Dibdin's "Tom Bowling." M. de Pachmann's performances comprised a couple of Bagatelles by Henselt, "La Fontaine" and "Wiegenlied," and a "Nocturne" (Op. 29) and Valse (Op. 64) by Chopin, Signor Papini delighting his audience by his brilliant playing of Spohr's Barcarole in G major, and a Fantasia of his own on "Garry Owen."

Of the first production here, on the 29th, of Mr. F. H. Cowen's Cantata "St. Ursula," at the second Subscription Concert of the Festival Choral Society, I must reserve my report until your next issue.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THERE was a good, though not a crowded attendance at the Concert given by the Festival Society, on October 26, at Colston Hall. The first item in the programme was the Overture to "Leonora," almost faultlessly rendered by Mr. Hallé's band, the strings being especially good. This was followed by "The Desert" (Felicien David), with Mr. Santley as reader and Mr. Edward Lloyd as solo tenor. The finished elocution of the former excited the greatest admiration, and Mr. Lloyd's rendering of the tenor music was beyond criticism. The pure quality of his voice showed to especial advantage in the beautiful solo "Night" and in the "Call of the Muezzin," which latter produced a marked effect upon the audience. The work of the male chorus reflected great credit on their training. The music which fell to their share was not very interesting, owing to constant unison and endless repetitions, but the expression was well kept up throughout, and the idea of the dreary sameness of the Desert was well sustained. The second part of the programme opened with Svendsen's Rhapsodie Norvegienne, played by no means perfectly by Mr. Hallé's band. In one place there was a decided hitch, which even Mr. Hallé's clever conducting could not entirely cover. Madame Albani, who was in splendid voice, sang "Ah fors é lui" ("La Traviata") and "Son vergin vezzosa" ("Puritani"), receiving hearty encores after each effort. Miss McKenzie and Messrs. Lloyd and Santley each contributed a solo, all of which were much appreciated. The other items were the sestet and chorus "Chi mi frena" ("Lucia"), quartet "Un di si ben" ("Rigoletto"), Prayer "To Thee, great Lord" ("Moses in Egypt"), "Liebeslied" (Taubert), and overture "L'Etoile du Nord," the last two being given in an excellent manner by the band.

On the afternoon of the following day, October 27, the Hall was full in every part to hear the "Redemption." As a whole, the work was successfully given, though there was room for improvement in both band and chorus. One would have liked a more subdued accompaniment, notably in some of the solos from the former, and there was occasionally a conspicuous want of attack on the part of the latter, especially in Part II. The tone of the choir was full and good; the sopranos were fresh and bright, and the usual weakness in the altos was hardly noticeable; the tenors sang well, but were a little over-weighted by the basses, who were very strong and sometimes a little flat. But they all sang with spirit and energy, and Mr. Rootham may fairly be congratulated on the result of his careful rehearsals during several months. The solos received full justice at the hands of Miss Anna Williams, Miss McKenzie, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. Miss Williams was especially successful in the soprano solo and chorus "From Thy love as a Father," and Miss McKenzie gave the song of Mary "While my watch I am keeping" with exquisite pathos. Mr. Lloyd infused wonderful life and interest into the trying music of the tenor narrator, and Mr. Santley's rendering of the part of Jesus left nothing to be desired. Mr. Worlock also deservedly gained commendation for his careful singing of the music of the bass narrator.

The People's Concert Society gave the "Hymn of Praise" at Colston Hall, on the 5th ult., in a very creditable manner, though the absence of the organ was greatly felt. Mr. Whitaker conducted as usual.

Mrs. Viner Pomeroy gave her first Classical Chamber Concert for this season on the 15th ult., at Victoria Rooms. The performers were Mr. Henry Holmes (first violin), Mr. John Pardlev (second violin), Mr. W. H. Hill (viola), Mr. J. Pomeroy (violinello), and Mrs. Pomeroy (pianoforte). The effect of the first item, Schubert's beautiful Quartet for strings in A minor, was considerably marred by the want of harmony among the instruments, the tenor being distinctly sharp and the 'cello flat. This was remedied in the succeeding pieces. Beethoven's charming Trio in G major, for piano, violin, and violoncello, was very enjoyable, though the pianist was a little wanting in sympathy in the Largo. Bach's fine Concerto in D minor, for piano and strings, was most satisfactorily rendered, Mrs. Pomeroy's powers of execution appearing to great advantage. Haydn's Quartet in B flat major, for strings, beautifully played throughout, brought the evening to a close. The attendance was less scanty than usual, and it is to be hoped that these delightful concerts will be more heartily supported in future.

The Bristol Musical Association gave its nineteenth Concert on Saturday evening, the 17th ult., at Colston Hall. The programme included Romberg's "Lay of the Bell" and a miscellaneous selection. Mr. George Riseley was at the organ and Mr. Gordon conducted. The principal singers were Miss Kate Spary, Mrs. Gridley, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. H. J. Dyer. On Monday, the 19th ult., Colston Hall was crowded to excess to welcome Mr. Sims Reeves and a party of distinguished singers. An attractive programme was provided, and Mr. Reeves sang with absolutely perfect expression, the audience rising and cheering him enthusiastically after every song. The other performers were Miss Clements, Miss Spenser Jones, Mr. Herbert Reeves, Mr. Barrington Foote, Signor Bisaccia (solo pianoforte), and Mr. Nicholson (solo flute).

A grand Concert is announced to be given on the 10th inst. at Colston Hall by Mrs. Ellicott, in aid of a local charity. Lady Benedict is the pianist, and one of the special attractions of the evening will be a male choir of forty voices, under the direction of Mr. Riseley. The choice of date is unfortunate, as on the same evening Mrs. Pomeroy is to give her second Chamber Concert.

The works under rehearsal for the special Advent Services at the Cathedral are "Lauda Sion," "God, Thou art great," and "The Messiah." The voluntary choir numbers over 300, and the rehearsals take place weekly under the direction of Mr. Riseley. Great disappointment is felt at the announcement that, owing to want of funds, there will be no orchestra at the final service to be held in the nave on the 20th inst.

A grand Concert was given at the Guildhall, Plymouth, on the 14th ult., in aid of the S. D. and E. C. Hospital. The first part of the programme consisted of E. Prout's dramatic Cantata "Alfred" and the second of songs, part-songs, band selections, &c. Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail were the vocalists, and there was a full band and chorus of 180 performers.

Active preparations are being made by Mr. F. N. Löhr and his choir for the performance of "The Redemption" on the 12th inst., this being their nineteenth Concert since the formation of the society in 1867. The following artists have been secured: Miss Marriott, Miss McKenzie, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Signor Foli. The orchestra will be complete and largely augmented, band and choir numbering 275. The tickets are being rapidly taken up, and it promises to be one of the greatest musical successes ever known at Plymouth.

I hear of nothing of importance from Exeter, Gloucester or Salisbury.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

New York, November 7, 1883.

OUR musical season of every year begins, as I may perchance aptly remind English readers, with the late autumn days, which see the return to town of widely-scattered summer visitors to springs, or hills, or sea. The fair opening of it, after certain preliminary notes, may be said to be the beginning of the first of our two opera seasons, one of which is now in course, and lasts until the new year or thereabouts, while the second occurs in the spring.

The New York musical season, thus far, is more a matter of social interest and subject of reporters' comment than of critical notice. The superb new Metropolitan Opera House and the Academy of Music both opened their doors on October 22, to very full houses, Mr. Abbey producing, at the first, "Faust," with Mdmes. Nilsson and Scaldi, Mdle. Lablache, Signor Campanini, Signor Novara, Signor Del Puente, &c., and Mr. Mapleson offering "La Sonnambula" at the Academy, with Madame Gerster, Signor Vicini, Signor Cherubini, &c.

The first night at the new theatre was of course an occasion of great interest, since everything was fresh, the singing company and orchestra, the house itself, and the whole enterprise of attracting a partly new audience and setting-up of a new haunt for a considerable portion of society. The throng present was enormous, and the prices paid for stalls and boxes enormous. As the company is entirely familiar to you, it is only needful to say that it is fairly approved here, though there are backward-turning looks toward the maidenly presence of Madame Nilsson a dozen years ago, and some regrets temper the charm which Signor Campanini yet exerts over his admirers. Madame Sembrich has made a very considerable success, as has also Madame Trebelli, to whom Madame Scaldi yielded the part of Azucena for her first appearance. Signor Vianesi and his orchestra are doing excellent work.

The acoustic properties of the new Opera-house have not proved entirely satisfactory. I believe that the architect, Mr. Cady, insists that the reason is to be found in the raising of the orchestra to the usual position. He had designed and constructed a sunken place, after the Bayreuth manner; but Signor Vianesi, on his arrival, insisted that it should be rebuilt in the fashion of ordinary theatres. However, it has now again been depressed, in preparation for giving "Lohengrin" this evening, and we shall see whether the house, as designed, better meets the expectation of its builders.

At the Academy Madame Gerster, who is singing better than ever, and Signor Galassi have been very warmly welcomed back. Miss Josephine Yorke has been very well received. Madame Pappenheim has not yet appeared in any rôle especially suited to her style. No other members of the company require particular mention at present. Madame Patti has arrived, and will be heard for the first time on Friday evening in "La Gazza Ladra." The works produced at the two houses up to this time have been of little consequence—besides "Faust," only the usual run of Bellini, Donizetti, and Verdi's earlier operas. The particulars of the "operatic war" between the rival managers, which have amused New Yorkers, would hardly interest your readers.

The serious business of the musical season began with the first Concert of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, under Mr. Theodore Thomas, on Saturday, November 3. The programme was the "Eroica" Symphony, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Burns" Scotch Rhapsody (Op. 24), and the Ball Scene from the Dramatic Symphony ("Romeo and Juliet") of Berlioz. The performance was superb. In the "Eroica" the wood wind-parts were doubled, in order to balance the seventy-two strings, with an effect of surprising richness and sonority. Madame Trebelli sang at this Concert Handel's aria "Lord, to Thee," from "Theodora," and Gluck's "Che farò," in very pure and noble style, but the effect was marred by an uncertainty about the pitch, which, though slight, was persistent.

This spirited Society has this year enlarged its scheme and will give eight Concerts, each with its "public rehearsal," and four orchestral matinées, to consist of lighter music than can rightly find place in a Philharmonic programme. The first of these occurred to-day, the programme being the "Tannhäuser" Overture, Andantino, March movement from Spohr's "Consecration of Sound" Symphony, Rubinstein's "Bal Costumé," the "Tell" Overture, Schumann's "Trauerei," the Blue Danube Waltz, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.

The New York Philharmonic Society, also under Mr. Thomas, will give its first Concert on Saturday, with the following programme: Toccata (Bach), adapted for grand orchestra by H. Esser; Symphony, No. 4, in B flat (Beethoven); Aria, "Deh, per questo istante" (Mozart), from "La Clemenza di Tito"; Ballad for Orchestra, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci" (A. C. Mackenzie); Songs, "Der Page" (Rubinstein); "Von Ewigser Liebe" (Brahms); Overture, "King Lear," Op. 4 (Berlioz).

Large numbers of people are disappointed every year in their efforts to secure seats for the Philharmonic Concerts.

All sorts of intrigues and subtle stratagems are resorted to in vain. Mr. Thomas has, therefore, decided to make the Concerts of his New York Chorus Society partly instrumental and partly vocal. At the first Concert the "Tannhäuser" March and Beethoven's Second Symphony will be given in addition to scenes from Schumann's "Faust" for chorus and orchestra. At the second Schumann's First Symphony and Brahms's Requiem will be given, and at the third Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," and selections from Wagner's operas.

The Concerts of this Society are "private" in the sense that no tickets are sold at the door. These are issued only to the limited list of 400 subscribers. The chorus of the society numbers 300.

The Symphony Society and the New York Oratorio Society, under Dr. Damrosch, so far propose nothing of special significance. It is announced that Mr. Cowen will conduct his "St. Ursula" under this management, but I believe that Mr. Cowen does not design coming to America.

"COLOMBA" IN SCOTLAND.

THE production of Mr. Mackenzie's Opera in Edinburgh and Glasgow by the Carl Rosa Company has been a marked success. The interest excited by its first performance in the composer's native city, Edinburgh, on the 5th ult., was manifested by the crowded state of every portion of the theatre, and by the fact of a number of Mr. Mackenzie's former colleagues in the musical profession volunteering their services to recruit the orchestra on the occasion. The local press is unanimous in praise of the work, rightly regarding it as a successful attempt to construct a "lyrical drama" for this country adapted to the musical requirements of the time. Respecting its performance in Edinburgh, the Edinburgh Courier, after sketching the plot of the Opera, says:—

"To this story Mr. Mackenzie has set music of most undoubted power and beauty, full of melodic grace, even to small detail, both in vocal and orchestral parts, and thoroughly in accord with the intense and tragic nature of the subject. It is also certain that it contains a high amount of originality with the slightest suspicion of effects, such as both Wagner and Gounod have rendered familiar to us, being, in fact, a connecting link between the opera of the past and that of the future—that is, the future according to Wagner and his disciples."

The Scotsman pronounces the vocal music "undoubtedly dramatic—some of it intensely so;" and thus sums up a few of the most popular numbers:—

"Among these may be mentioned the 'Vocero,' or Venedetta song, which forms the leading musical 'motive' of the work, and is as full of beauty as of power; Colomba's solo, in recitative form, at the beginning of the second act; the chorus, 'Salve Regina del Maggio,' and the quintet and chorus, 'Let the past be dead,' in the same act; the old Corsican ballad, 'So he thought of his love,' and the finale in the third act; and the love duet between Lydia and Orso in the fourth act. The prelude, which stands in place of an overture, though its subject is not remarkable, is admirably scored, and the ballet music and rustic march in the second act are clever specimens of orchestration, dexterously imbued with local colour."

Speaking of the composer's power over orchestral resources, the Edinburgh News says:—

"The orchestra in his hands becomes not merely the exponent of subsidiary ideas that please by their quantity and charm of ready invention; it everywhere enforces the action, sometimes indeed dominating the stage work; and has the strong vibrating quality only heard in the work of a musician of serious purpose, and who has that capacity of handling the various parts of the orchestra which amounts to genius."

Of the presentation of the work at the Royalty Theatre, Glasgow, on the 14th ult., the Glasgow Herald says:—

"Dramatic truth is, all the same, called for in the English opera of the future, yet that may be secured without subscribing to the Wagnerian doctrine in its entirety. There is a middle course open, and we are disposed to think that Mr. A. C. Mackenzie has struck a true chord in his first appeal to the musical public as a composer of opera."

The Glasgow News says:—"The orchestration, for a first essay in opera, is an astounding production. In point of sonority, variety of colouring, which shows an extensive and practical knowledge of instrumental possibilities in the way of effect, the score will ever remain a most interesting feature of the opera."

And the following is from the North British Daily Mail:—"The 'Vocero' and the Corsican love-song have already and most deservedly won popular favour. The duet between Orso and Lydia in the last act is another example of musical writing which is full of grace and refined poetic feeling. In speaking of the instrumental part of the work we must again state that it is scarcely possible to single out passages for special praise, since from first to last it is full of interest, of scholarship, and of charm."

These, and other equally laudatory notices from the Scottish press, must be highly gratifying to the young composer, who has already shown such deep sympathy with the music of the land of his birth.

CATHEDRAL SINGERS IN TIMES PAST AND PRESENT.

THE first lecture this season of the Gloucester Cathedral Society was delivered in the Chapter Room, by the Very Rev. E. H. Plumtre, Dean of Wells. The subject selected is of such general interest to all musicians, and was so ably treated by the lecturer, that we regret being unable to give more than extracts from his address. After tracing the history of psalmody from the earliest times, and describing the constitution of the cathedral body, the lecturer said:—

"It was assumed in the original constitution of these bodies that each prebendary or canon would have sufficient knowledge of music to be able to take his own part in the services of the church, and that, with rare occasional exceptions, he would be a resident member of the body. In practice, however, the reality fell short of the ideal. Nepotism or favouritism led to the appointment of men who were not musical experts. The same men held canopies in two or more cathedrals, or had rectories at a distance, where it was more convenient or more profitable to reside. It became necessary to attract men into residence by giving them a larger or an exclusive share in the common or divisible income of the Chapter, as distinguished from the estates which were assigned to the prebendaries individually. And with this first downward step there followed a long train of other evils. It was necessary to fill the places thus left vacant, and to provide substitutes for the canons who, though residentiary, were unable or unwilling to perform their duties according to the ideal of Cathedral life, and so we enter upon the stage of Cathedral history in which Vicars-Choral appear as part of the foundation. Of all words in ecclesiastical terminology there are, perhaps, none which so distinctly bear their witness to the evil out of which they sprang. It would have been well, indeed, both as regards Cathedrals and parishes, if that word 'vicar' had never found a place in the vocabulary of the English Church, for it speaks, wherever it is found, of neglected duties and misappropriated revenues, and richly-paid sinecures, and under-paid workers, and of the evil leaven of each man doing as little of his own work as possible, and leaving the remainder to be done by others. At first, it would seem, each absent or indolent or superannuated canon appointed his own vicar. It is not difficult, knowing what we do of the life of the clergy, both regular and secular, in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, to picture to ourselves the scandals which grew out of this practice. Take Chaucer's pictures of the lower order of the clergy, who left their flocks and ran up to St. Paul's to 'seek out a chantry for souls'; think of the hedge priests who were wandering up and down the country, ready to say mass for a morsel of bread, and craving to be put in some ecclesiastical position where there would be neither pastoral work nor enforced study; think of the love of sports and the intemperance which were inherent in the English character, and of the sensuality which the church's rule of celibacy stimulated rather than restrained; and you can imagine all too easily what must have been the scandal of our Cathedral cities; how the sensation caused in them by the arrival of the Franciscan or Dominican Friars with their visible poverty, their lives of self-denial, and their, in a very true sense, evangelic preaching, must have presented many striking parallels to that produced by the appearance of the Wesleyan preachers of the last century, or those of the Salvation Army of the present, in the same localities."

He then speaks of the palliative measures adopted to remedy the evil by the well-meaning Bishops, and continues thus:—

"It was, we may frankly admit, the conception of a grand ideal. The misfortune was that, like other ideal schemes, it would not work. The good bishops had not allowed for the deadening, hardening influence of a life passed in the discharge of a routine of ceremonial duties, with no special capacities for study and no special aptitude for activity in good works. The daily round of services, from matins to evensong, must have too often in such cases become a burden to the weary beast; and, as the records show, he found himself tempted, by way of change, to wallowing in the mire. And so it was that the Dean and Chapter, not always perhaps with the clearness of insight which belongs to those who have cast the beam out of their own eye, began making ineffectual attempts to cast out the mote from the eye of the Vicars-Choral. If they swore or quarrelled, if they were drunk or disorderly, if they preferred hunting, fishing, hawking, to the services of the cathedral, if they neglected their daily offices, and came only when there was a distribution of doles, if they were incapacitated by age or infirmity from performing their functions and did not provide a deputy; if they aped the dress and manners of the laymen of their own class, they were to lose their daily penny for a day, a week, a month, or might incur graver money penalties, or might be suspended, or, in the last resort, deprived of their office. ('Reynolds,' pp. 59-94). Matters did not improve during the disordered times that followed on the Reformation. The relations between the College and the Chapter were almost those of internecine warfare. The latter began about the last quarter of the sixteenth century to claim and exercise the right of nominating and perpetuating without the consent of the former. We can see, at any rate, that, the changes of ritual and life which followed what we loosely call the Reformation must have altered the conditions under which both canons and vicars lived. Two services a day left idle hands much more time to work their proverbial mischief than seven; the vicars became, as a body, more essentially laicised, and, with the exception of the three priest-vicars, who yet remained for distinctly clerical functions, took more and more to engaging in secular occupations."

Glancing at the Cathedral reforms of 1835—40, he says:—

"Whether the changes that have been, or are to be, proposed by the Cathedral Commissioners now sitting will overcome the obstacles of obstruction and blocking and counting out which seem to await all ecclesiastical legislation in the House of Commons, is a question which I do not venture to answer with any very sanguine expectations. But so far as we may judge from the reports which they have already issued, they are at least working with a more intelligent aim than their predecessors, are more anxious that the cathedrals should be, in some measure, what they were meant to be, and have some raison d'être to justify their existence beyond supplying pensions for merit which is fortunate as well as meritorious, or opportunities for learned, or unlearned, leisure. The dignitaries of the cathedral are, in their schemes, to be galvanised into a new vitality. The chancellor is to lecture on theology and look after the cathedral schools. The precentor is to regulate and direct the music, not of the cathedral only, but, as far as may be, to stimulate and influence that of the diocese also. The preaching rota is to expand so that the cathedral city may hear words of comfort and counsel from the gifted preachers of the day. One, at least, of the canons is to be ready to give himself, under the direction of the Bishop, to mission work of this character. In regard to the Vicars-Choral, lay clerks, singing men, or by whatever other name they may be called, their plans do not appear to go further than the initial step of sweeping away the corporate rights which place them in a false position, and are found hindrances to expansion and reform, and putting them on the footing of stipendiaries. The ground will, if these plans are carried into effect, be cleared for further action."

Treating then of Choral Studentship, he sketches the following plan:—

"What I suggest, following on the track of Mr. E. A. Freeman's hints in his 'Lectures on Wells Cathedral,' p. 139, is a system of short services, rather than of a long or life tenure, and I would connect that service with more favourable conditions. Where there is a theological college connected with the cathedral it would not, I conceive, be difficult to attract to it, by choral studentships of £80 or £100, young men with the necessary musical qualifications, and with a natural delight in their exercise, who would welcome the opportunity of thus coming under cathedral training. Even where there is no such college, a distinct provision might be made without much difficulty for their theological instruction after the pattern of which Dr. Vaughan, at Doncaster, and Dr. Gott, at Leeds, have set such admirable examples. Their student life, their initiation into pastoral work, would thus go on side by side with their work as singers, and would enliven, strengthen, ennoble it. Earnest and devout feeling would not fail to enhance the beauty of anthems and of chants. Studentships such as I have described might be tenable, in the first instance, for three years. At the end of that time their office might be prolonged at the discretion of the dean and chapter, and with the consent of the bishop, during a two years' diaconate, for which, in conjunction with work in some parish in or near the cathedral city, it should be a sufficient title. It is obvious that men thus trained would carry with them into their future work a knowledge and skill which would tend to improve the choral element of worship throughout the church at large. Six or eight would, I think, be enough for the daily matins and evensong. On Sundays and the greater festivals I would reinforce them, after the manner of our parochial choirs, with the help of volunteers. Thanks to Mr. Hullah, and the more systematic teaching of singing in our elementary schools, we are, in a far larger measure than we were, a musical people. The parish choirs who gather for choral festivals, as in my own Cathedral at Wells last July, the supplementary choirs who, for the most part, gladly bear the burden of evensong and special services in our cathedrals, show that a high standard of excellence has been already attained, and that a still higher is attainable. The neglect of this volunteer element, this freewill offering of worship, has been one of the blunders and neglects of the deans and chapters of the past. It is not, I hope, too late for us to learn now, as St. Paul's and Westminster, and it may be, other cathedral churches have learned already, the lessons which our more active and more zealous brothers in the ministry of the Church have taught us in their parishes."

He gives a graphic account of the lives of the choir boys "past and present," and then asks:—

"Is the corruptio optimi pessima to be forced upon us yet once more? Is the future history of our cathedrals to be in the point of training of their children, as in so many others, one of unrealised ideals and abortive reforms and frustrated aspirations? I am persuaded better things of that future, though I thus speak. Spiritual life is working now, as spiritual decay and death have worked before, and the tree that has been lopped and pruned will put forth new leaves, and be bright with fair flowers and bring forth goodly fruit. The material restoration of so many of our cathedrals implied a revival and a hope, and showed something of the spirit of self-sacrifice and of love, and where these are we may see the elements of future progress. Briefly, what we need in this last corner of the section of a great subject of which I have been speaking, is the personal care and sympathy without which nothing worth speaking of can be done in the way of education. Many details must, in the nature of the case, vary with varying circumstances. (1) The boys may be day-boys, children of local parents, or boarders from a distance. Each system has its advantages. The former, is, of course, the more economical, and I have known not a few cases in which the influence of home was distinctly favourable to the boy's regularity and good conduct, and father and mother responded to any suggestion or inquiry about their son's conduct. But this is not always so, and the companions and neighbours of a local choir-boy are sometimes rougher than we could wish. On the whole, then, it seems desirable to have, if not the whole body, at least half the chorists as boarders, trained under a more definite discipline, catching the tone of a well-ordered school.

(2) Choral Exhibitions, given by competition to boys of the diocese, and securing these advantages would scarcely fail to encourage the musical training of our parish schools and choirs and attract to the cathedral boys who have the special gifts of which it stands in need. (3) The possession of those gifts implies, for the most part, what we may call the artistic temperament, quick, emotional, sensitive, a little wanting, perhaps, in the elements of steadfastness and 'grind.' The life of a choir boy, with its constant service is, it must be remembered, a somewhat severe strain upon such a boy's nature. It requires to be balanced by more games and gymnastics than are often accessible in the precincts of the cathedral. A month's holiday at least, in every year, a half holiday every week, and a whole holiday every month would not, I think, be in excess. It is not good to let a boy go through the process described to me not long since by a cathedral schoolmaster as that of 'singing his brains out.' (4) Personal influence is however here, as in parish choirs, what is most wanted, and it will hardly be gained without something of the same watchfulness. To show boys that you trust and respect them, to talk to them sometimes as if they had hearts and souls, to provide for neatness and order in cassocks, surplices, vestry arrangements, to have a Sunday or week-day reading with them in Bible or story book, to lead them to use their gifts of song as helpers and fellow-workers, and not merely as hired machines, by the bedsides of the sick in hospitals or cottages, to show the interest of a common life by remembering their birthdays and letting them remember ours, to correspond with them when personal intercourse is for a time suspended, these are methods which have been practised by parish clergymen with their boys in various ways and with varying measures of success. The responsibility in this matter seems to me to rest on the shoulders of the dean, as the charge of the boys of a parish choir does on those of the rector. In most cases he will find the labour to which it calls a refreshing accompaniment to the 'learned leisure' which is the popular ideal of his office, and the labour will be its own reward. His watchword may well be, in regard to the persons committed to his charge and the means of influencing them, De minimis curat maxime Decanus."

OBITUARY.

THE well-known composer, Robert Volkmann, died at Ofen, after a short illness, on October 30, in his sixty-ninth year. Born at Lommach, in Saxony, April 6, 1815, and having received early instruction in music from his father, Friedrich Robert Volkmann, he removed to Leipzig in 1836 for the purpose of devoting himself to composition. He remained there three years, and made the acquaintance of Robert Schumann, whose works he greatly admired, and by whom he became largely influenced. His next move was to Prague, and then to Pesth, where he established himself, adopting Hungary as his country, and showing the earnestness of his preference by writing largely in the characteristic Hungarian manner. He was appointed professor of composition at the Pesth Conservatorium, but his modest and retiring disposition prevented him from making any considerable figure. According to some authorities, he knew so little how to "get on in the world" that he remained in poverty, and even distress, while his works were being performed in all the principal cities of Germany and Austria. It is even said that often he "found himself constrained to live upon vegetables and bread, to teach at starvation prices, and in winter, when short of lessons, to stay in bed to keep himself warm." This is painful to reflect upon, but it gives no reason for surprise. Even greater men than Volkmann have lived in misery, unable to make themselves understood by a world whose "most sweet voices" they could not, either through pride or constitutional infirmity, evoke on their own behalf. Volkmann was a prolific composer, and worked in every musical field save that of opera. His vocal pieces are numerous; but, two Masses excepted, of comparatively small proportions. So with his works for the pianoforte. According to the catalogue now before us, he composed no pianoforte Concerto and only one Sonata. Souvenirs, sketches, dances, melodies, marches, and such like, form the bulk of his contribution to this department, and very charming, it must be confessed, many of them are. In orchestral and chamber music Volkmann was much more ambitious. He wrote two Symphonies, in D and B flat respectively; two Overtures, "Richard III." and a Fest-Overture; two Serenades for strings, six string Quartets, a Concerto for violoncello, two pianoforte Trios, and many other things less pretentious in the same class. Volkmann latterly became known to English amateurs. His Symphony in D and "Richard III." Overture have been performed; several examples of his chamber compositions are in the repertory of the Popular Concerts, and his pianoforte works for two and four hands are much esteemed in musical homes. Volkmann, therefore, is something more than a name; and better than nominal regret is felt at his death, albeit he had no pretensions to rank among the great masters of his art.

The series of Philharmonic Concerts, under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas, have just been commenced in New York and Brooklyn. The programme of the first concert in Brooklyn was as follows:—

Symphony No. 3		Beethoven.
Air, "Lord to Thee" ("Theodora")		Handel.
Madame Trebelli.
Scotch Rhapsody, "Burns," Op. 24		A. C. Mackenzie.
Air, "Che farò" ("Orpheus")		Gluck.
Madame Trebelli.
Ball scene from "Romeo and Juliet"		Berlioz.

In speaking of Mr. Mackenzie's "Burns" Rhapsody, the New York Herald says:—

"The Rhapsody entitled 'Burns,' and inspired by one of that poet's ballads, has not before been heard here. Nor is the composer much better known in this country than he was in London last spring when he burst upon the musical world with an opera, 'Colomba,' which made him famous, not alone in England, but in musical circles throughout Europe. Mr. Mackenzie will hold before long, if he does not already, the foremost position among British composers. His studies were made in Germany, where he resided for many years, and the influence of the romantic school of Schumann, Wagner, and Liszt are clearly evident in his style. But he has an individuality of his own. No definite status can be assigned him after hearing this single work. In it he evinces an elevated mind which, if it never reaches the heights of sublimity, never descends to commonplaces. He apparently possesses a complete mastery of the art of orchestration—comprehends the individuality of each instrument and its resources. Local colour, too, he knows how to apply in this Rhapsody without ever becoming inartistic or bizarre. It is to be hoped that more of Mr. Mackenzie's music may be heard during the season." The New York Tribune gives the following details about the first of the Philharmonic Society's Concerts which took place on the 10th ult., at the Academy of Music, New York: "The audience was of the size and character peculiar to these, the most serious, dignified, and artistic musical occurrences in the country. The programme was as follows:—

Toccata		Bach.
(Adapted for Orchestra by G. Esser.)
Symphony in B flat. No. 4, Op. 60		Beethoven.
Aria, "Deh, per questo istante"		Mozart.
Miss Agnes Huntington.
Ballad for Orchestra, "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (MS.)		A. C. Mackenzie.
Songs { a. "Der Page"		Rubinstein.
b. "Von Ewig'er Liebe"		Brahms.
Miss Agnes Huntington.
Overture, "King Lear." Op. 4		Berlioz.

The programme more than fulfilled in the performance the promises held out in the reading. It maintained the traditions of the society; it afforded gratification to several phases of cultured taste; it had a stately beginning and a majestic end, and it furnished an interesting novelty which proved to be in harmony with the dignity of the society and the audience. The symphony has graced an opening Philharmonic Concert before, and its glad some character, dainty humour, and lovely sentiment have never failed to meet with appreciation when given by so noble a band as that which Mr. Thomas leads in these concerts. Perfection of technical execution is always wedded here with an entrancing beauty of tone and a poetical conception, and the most subtle of the tone-poet's intentions are realised. It was so last night, and the exuberant but chaste joyousness which followed the dispelling of the clouds that hang over the introduction shone in every bar of the scherzo and finale. Mr. Mackenzie's ballad showed him to be a musician of a higher order than the Rhapsody played at the first Concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society alone would lead one to suspect. His ingeniousness and learning in the art of handling instruments were evident in his treatment of the Scotch airs, but the demonstration in that instance did not go much further. The ballad disclosed that his ideals are good; that he is gifted with melodic inventiveness of no mean order, and that he has a poetical insight that penetrates deeper than the mere shell of his programme. The basis of his free orchestral composition is Keats's beautiful poem. It is full of striking pictures—a mournful knight, pale of face and slow of step, loitering beside a lake covered with withered sedge; a sympathetic inquirer; a mysterious lady, beautiful as a fairy, long-haired, light-footed, riding a prancing steed and singing 'A fairy's song'; an elfin grove; weepings, sighings, kissings, and protestations of love; a spectral dream, and an awakening to an endless and merciless thralldom. There is enough in such episodes to suggest many pages of musical delineation of the kind to which Raff was addicted, and it was greatly to the credit of Mr. Mackenzie that he succeeded in avoiding this superficial and materialistic style of writing. He has chosen to reach for the deep and melancholy sentiment of 'La Belle Dame sans Merci,' and he has been rewarded by inspirations that are more beautiful and poetic by far than would have followed any sustained effort at detailed narrative or delineation. The ballad is a meritorious composition, in which a high degree of the characteristic expression for which writers imbued by the spirit of the modern school strive is attained, and it was magnificently performed by the orchestra, as likewise was the Berlioz overture, in which there is so eloquent a publication of antique sorrow, and so overwhelming a description of the breaking of a great heart."

In the case of Novello, Ewer and Co., publishers and proprietors (in Germany as well as other countries), of Gounod's Oratorio "The Redemption," against the firm of C. G. Röder, of Leipzig, for having printed an edition of the work for the use of an American publishing firm; and also against W. Röthing, trading under the firm of Hofmeister, for having given the order for the said reprint, the Superior Court at Leipzig, consisting of President Dr. von Beyerle and six Imperial Court Councillors, has, on the Appeal of the Plaintiffs, just decided that the judgment of the Lower Court must be set aside; and they further direct that the case shall be now sent to the Lower Court at Dresden for revision. The following are some of the principal grounds on which this decision in the Appeal Court has been arrived at: (1) The opinion of the Lower Court that the Defendants only acted as irresponsible assistants of the American firm is erroneous because the very fact of the Defendants making a contract together for delivering the work under certain conditions and at a certain time, according to a stipulation of one of the Defendants himself, shows them to have been responsible agents in the transaction. (2) The opinion of the Lower Court that the Defendants had a right to manufacture this reprint, because it was to be used in a country in which the Plaintiffs had no protection and no rights, is entirely contradictory to section 4 and others of the law of June 11, 1870, which forbids any reprint of copyright works, be they intended to be sold at home or abroad. (3) The plea of the Defendants that, if they had not accepted the offer to manufacture the reprint, the American firm might easily have caused it to be made in their own country without the Plaintiffs being able to prevent them, shows simply that a want exists in the American law, and cannot be taken into consideration in Germany; and, in any case, American lawlessness cannot be allowed as a justification for the Defendants in Germany where literary property is protected.

THE choral Festival, given on the 3rd ult. at the Parish Church, Leamington—when 200 vocalists took part in the music, Mr. Frank Spinney presiding at the Organ—was made additionally interesting by an eloquent sermon upon "Musical Development," preached by the Rev. E. Husband, from the text, "Let us go on unto perfection" (Hebrews vi. 1) from which we extract the following, with regret that we cannot quote his entire discourse. Speaking of the Gregorian tones, he continued thus: "Of course I can admire such melodious exceptions as the 'Tonus Peregrinus,' which you have sung this evening, especially when sung so well, and by such a body of fine voices as those to-night. But I am speaking of the rule, not the exception, and it always seems to me as if Gregorian music, as a whole, was—to use an illustration—as if I wished to substitute for the improved harp of our own age, beautiful in tone, in construction, and in compass, the rough and clumsy 'harp,' or kinnor, of Jubal's day. But of the Gregorian Tones, especially to the unmusical, I admit their vitality, for they are cherished by many, even in this far off nineteenth century. But I am sure their antiquity is the real secret that enlists sympathy for them, and their connection with the ancient Church which makes them attractive to a certain section of earnest Churchmen. I know the emotion. It comes across me whenever I stand gazing upon some romantic ruin, the scene of some great historic event of bygone days. Or again, I need not refer to the notion which some a few years ago held, that 'good Churchmanship' and Gregorian music were inseparable. This absurd notion has, I hope I am right in thinking, passed quietly away to a nameless grave. And I would remind you, concerning these tones or modes, what I said just now concerning the Ambrosian chants, of which the Gregorian tones, are but a slight development, that the white notes of the piano only are used. Beautiful 'white notes!' But where are the black ones? Beethoven could never have written his sonatas with 'white notes only'; nor could Handel have penned his glorious Oratorios with 'white notes only.' 'White notes only' would have done for days when men could not point to the tombs of such musical giants as Handel, and Bach, and Mendelssohn. And then we pass on for another age of development, and I may instance Palestrina who was born in the year 1524. The music he gave the world was a great advance, and what before had been but, as it were, 'the blade,' now became 'the ear.' And now the world was getting ripe for some of those great musicians whose work in the realm of art will last for all time. A marvelous list of names—Sebastian Bach, the learned musician; Handel, the prince of composers, who if he had never written anything beside the 'Amen' chorus in the 'Messiah,' would still be first in the roll of musicians. The busy, tuneful Haydn, revelling in his symphonies; Mozart, who enriched the world with his talent down to almost the day of his death, when he gave us his 'Requiem,' great in harmony, great in melody; Beethoven, a giant in music—music 'full of deep thought, strong passion, and ever-varying feeling,' the very mention of this composer's name striking a chord of enthusiastic joy in the heart of every man who loves pure and noble music; Weber, who was one of the greatest in giving 'music an expression to romantic melancholy'; Mendelssohn, the boy of genius, who has bestowed upon the world some of its sweetest, tenderest music. Time would fail to tell of Cherubini, of Schubert, and of many it would be possible to name, but who have finished their earthly course, and are now at rest; for I only speak to-night of those who have left us, not of those who are with us, and enriching the world with their music still. But I think I have mentioned names enough to show that in these later days a great development has taken place. So sublime are some of these composers' works that it seems at first hard to imagine that music could higher go. Is it possible that musical development is still going on—going on unto perfection? One great composer, lately taken from us, called his music 'the music of the future.' I cannot wholly acquiesce in his opinion. I look for higher things. Allowing that the world has an immense history before her, it may be that even millions of years will pass by before the goal is reached. We are so apt to try and hurry things on; to expect mature growth to be quick and sudden. We want to build our Rome in a single day, and to expect the corn to grow from a 'blade' to 'full corn in the ear' in a single night. It can never be so. Divine creations and their developments move in harmony with the mind of their Creator, with whom 'one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.' But that music is still growing, I have not the slightest doubt. I believe that in the future history of the world, it may be in hundreds, or thousands, or millions of years to come, greater than even Handel, or Beethoven, or Mendelssohn will arise, to give it music such as ear hath not yet heard. Musical appreciation is also everywhere on the increase. Sometimes, comparatively speaking, little things show the current of public opinion. Sometimes the movement of the little piece of straw on the waters will show us which way the wind is blowing. It was only the other day that I was looking through a musical catalogue, and I noticed that, so far as I could ascertain, the late talented organist of St. Paul's Cathedral never published a musical setting to the Communion service. There are many services of his to Matins and Evensong, but not for the higher service of Holy Communion. I suppose it was because there was no demand for them. But you will see that his successor, the present gifted organist, never publishes a morning service without including the music for the office of Holy Communion. The development of time has brought the demand, and of course the demand has been met. And so we move on and on. And, to speak for a moment of this church, you, by your beautiful service to-night, which you have kindly given me the opportunity of enjoying, are helping forward the progress of music. First you render this service for the glory of God, but, by it, you are also helping to extend the divine art and appreciation of music. To do this is to do God's will, and to extend His truth; for music often preaches a more powerful sermon than you hear from the pulpit. I have never yet heard a sermon, speaking for myself, that has risen so high in eloquence, or in heart-melting appeal, as Handel's 'Messiah' or Bach's music of 'The Passion.'"

THE following letter has been addressed to the Morning Post by Viscount Folkestone on the subject of the People's Entertainment Society: "Sir,—May I ask you to afford me space in order to bring the following to the notice of your readers? The People's Entertainment Society, on whose behalf I am writing, has been in existence for five seasons, and is now commencing its sixth. The objects of the society are, briefly, to cultivate a taste for good, high-class amusement among the poorer classes in the hope of withdrawing them from lower places of resort, to introduce an element of brightness into their lives, and to establish a better feeling between the different classes by bringing them into closer contact with each other. The society has given for the last five years upwards of 100 free concerts each season during the winter months from November to April. These have been given in Bermondsey, Battersea, Clapham, Rotherhithe, Walworth, West Ham, Westminster, Whitechapel, &c. They are always crowded and eagerly looked forward to. The society makes use as much as possible of the best amateur talent, but is compelled to supplement it by professional assistance to a great extent, many of the best known singers frequently giving their services gratuitously. Numberless appeals from new districts are sent asking for help, which the society is obliged to refuse from want of funds, and more particularly from lack of sufficient active workers. The society has innumerable evidences of the good effected by its operations, and I venture to appeal to your readers either for pecuniary assistance or for personal help as vocalists, instrumentalists, reciters, &c., or for assistance in obtaining persons willing and able to help to fill up the programmes. Communications may be addressed either to me, at 8, Ennismore Gardens, S.W., or to Mr. J. M. Crament, Mus. Bac., 180, Brompton Road, S.W.; or to Mr. W. H. Leslie, Parliament Mansions, Victoria Street, Westminster. Subscriptions may be sent to Mr. J. M. Crament, as above. I may add that the society has started a choral and orchestral union, branches of which in Battersea and Bermondsey number over 120 persons each; for these amateur teachers, able and willing to help in the instruction of the different classes, would render valuable assistance.—I am, yours faithfully,—FOLKESTONE.—November 5."

At the ordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Sacred Harmonic Society, held at the hall of the Society of Arts, Adelphi, Mr. H. Gover, C.C., in the chair, the report for the year, ending August 31, 1883, was read. In this it was announced that, having secured the valuable services of Mr. Charles Hallé as Conductor, Mr. W. H. Cummings as Sub-Conductor, and Mr. Fountain Meen as Organist, a choir was established, including about four-fifths of the vocalists of the old Society, and that a series of four Concerts had been given, at which Gounod's "Redemption," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Schubert's Mass in E flat, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and Handel's "Messiah" were performed. The Council felt that they were fortunate in being able to include in the programmes of their first season two such interesting works as Gounod's "Redemption" and Schubert's Mass in E flat. The beauty of these compositions, without mentioning the rapidly acquired popularity of the former of them, had induced the Council to repeat them in the coming season. The financial result of the concerts given last season was stated to be highly satisfactory; but the Council at the same time pointed out to the shareholders the great importance of making an effort to increase the subscribed capital, so that the permanence and development of the Society might be thoroughly secured. After the adoption of the report, the meeting closed with a number of complimentary votes to the officials of the Society.

THE Dedication Festival at St. Paul's, Bow Common, took place on Tuesday, October 30, the services commencing at 7 a.m. with a choral celebration, at which the choir sang, for the first time, Mozart's Fourth Mass in C, arranged for the English service by Mr. Horace Buttery, Organist and Choirmaster of the church. At the evening service the choir was augmented to about one hundred and forty voices by the choirs of St. Mary's, Boltons, S.W., St. Peter's, South Kensington, and St. Mary's, Haggerstone, and others. The Rev. J. B. Powell's Processional "Salve Festa dies" opened the service with fine effect. The canticles were sung to Stainer in B flat, and the anthem was Mendelssohn's eight-part Psalm "Sing to the Lord a new made song," which was sung as written, the first two movements unaccompanied, the organ coming in at the third movement with splendid effect, and the whole service (concluding with Handel's "Hallelujah") was rendered with the greatest precision. Mr. Buttery conducted the anthem and accompanied at the organ other parts of the service, being assisted by Mr. Mortimer J. Dudman. Mr. Charles W. Pearce, Mus. Bac., played at the conclusion of the service one of Mendelssohn's organ Sonatas and a March by E. Silas.

AN elegant and costly testimonial has recently been presented to Mr. C. F. South, the late Organist of SS. Augustine and Faith, Watling Street, City, by the Rector, Churchwardens, and congregation thereof. The presentation was made at the residence of the Rector, the Rev. W. H. Milman, M.A., and took the form of a silver teapot, cream ewer, sugar basin, and salver, around the inner surface of which latter runs an inscription in Latin, setting forth, and bearing testimony to, the high qualities—not only musical, but personal—of the recipient. It may be added that prior to his departure from London, on receiving his appointment as Organist of Salisbury Cathedral, he was presented with a handsome marble timepiece, with a plate bearing the following inscription: "Presented to C. F. South, Esq., for 15 years Organist and Choirmaster of SS. Augustine and Faith, London. A tribute from the gentlemen of the Choir to his many excellencies both as a Musician and a Friend. July 13, 1883."

THE Harvest Festival at the Royal Military Chapel, Wellington Barracks, was held on Sunday, October 28, when the church was thronged in every part. The musical portion of the Service, conducted by Mr. Richard Lemaire, choirmaster of the Chapel, was most efficiently rendered. The band, composed of members of the Grenadier Guards' Band, was exceedingly effective. The anthems were "I know that my Redeemer liveth" and Garrett's "The Lord is loving." There is no organ in the chapel, but the band accompanies the service, which is open to the public every Sunday night at six p.m., when full choral Evensong is sung.

A PRIZE Competition of Sunday School Choirs, in connection with the South East Auxiliary Sunday School Union, took place on the 16th ult., in the Lecture Hall of Lewisham High Road Congregational Church. Choirs from the following schools competed: Maze Hill, Greenwich; Creek Street Mission, Deptford; South Street, Greenwich; High Street, Deptford; and Lewisham High Road. Mr. Curwen was the judge. The first prize, value four guineas, was awarded to Lewisham High Road choir, the singing of which, under Mr. H. E. Cockell, was highly commended by Mr. Curwen; the second prize, two guineas, to High Street, Deptford choir, under Mr. W. C. Pellatt; and a third prize, value one guinea, was offered by a gentleman in the audience to Creek Street Mission, which stood third on the list. The proceedings terminated by the combined choirs singing several pieces under the alternate leadership of each of the conductors.

A GOOD word must be said for the music in the Operetta "A Water Cure," recently produced at the Entertainment of Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, St. George's Hall. The composer, Mr. George Gear, who is rapidly making a name both in the creative and executive branch of the art, has shown much dramatic feeling in his setting of a solo, duet, trio, and quintet, all of which, although light and melodious in character, evidence the result of a sound musical training. Miss Marion Wardroper, Miss Fanny Holland, Mr. Alfred Reed, and Mr. North Home—whose acting in this amusing trifle is deserving of much praise—must be also commended for their effective rendering of Mr. Gear's clever music.

THE 178th monthly Concert of the St. George's Glebe Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 2nd ult., the chief feature in the programme being "John Gilpin," a comic Cantata by George Fox. The solos were taken by Miss Kate Hardy, Miss Marie Belval, Mr. Arthur Thomas, and Mr. Theodore Distin. The rest of the programme was miscellaneous, and included, besides songs by the artists before mentioned, several part-songs, among which were "The Charge of the Light Brigade" (Hecht) and "Damon and Phyllis" (Theodore Distin). Mr. Hirwen Jones also contributed two songs. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Kinkee and Mr. F. R. Kinkee. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

WE read in the Leeds Mercury that the inaugural meeting of the New Leeds Musical Society, which has been formed for the practice of vocal works, was recently held in the Society's room, Spencer Place. Dr. R. T. Land, who presided, stated that the Society would provide for a want that had long existed in New Leeds, and complimented Mr. J. B. Longley, the Conductor, and the committee who had assisted him upon the success which had attended their efforts. Mr. W. L. Jackson, M.P., had consented to become president, and Mr. J. Barran, jun., J.P., vice-president. It is proposed to give two Concerts during the season, and also to provide musical reunions for members and friends.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were held in Holy Trinity Church, St. Giles', on Sunday, the 4th ult., when the Church, for the first time, was decorated with flowers, fruit, corn, and vegetables. The Anthem in the morning and evening was Sydenham's "O give thanks," which was well rendered by the choir. The voluntaries, played by Miss Cope (the Organist), were Meyerbeer's "Coronation March," "With verdure clad," "O lovely Peace," and "Heaven and the earth display." The preachers were the Rev. N. Bromley, A.K.C., Incumbent, and the Rev. Jas. Street, of the Boys' Home, Hampstead. The flowers, &c., were afterwards distributed amongst the poor and the inmates of King's College Hospital.

ON Wednesday evening, the 14th ult., the third of the series of Entertainments for the People was given at Bethnal Green Road Congregational Church, Hackney, when Farmer's Oratorio "Christ and His Soldiers," was well rendered by the Bethnal Green Choral Society, and an efficient band. The solo vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Mr. C. J. Murton, and Mr. H. Prenton. Pianoforte, Mr. W. West; Harmonium, Mr. E. T. Temple; Conductor, Mr. R. A. Slater.

ON Monday, the 19th ult., a performance of "The May Queen" was given in the Town Hall, Shoreditch, under the auspices of the Popular Ballad Concert Committee, by the choir attached to this Society: Conductor, Mr. W. Henry Thomas. The artists engaged were Miss Edith Phillips, Mr. George Cox, and Mr. Henry Prenton, all of whom were highly appreciated. The Cantata was preceded by a short ballad Concert, at which, in addition to the above mentioned artists, Miss Rosa Leo, Miss Lavinia Walker, and Mr. Bernard Beard assisted. The performance of the choir reflected the greatest credit upon the Conductor, the choruses being given in a highly efficient manner.

ALTHOUGH the official balance-sheet of the Leeds Musical Festival is not yet issued, we are able to state that a sum of £2,000 will be distributed amongst the three medical charities—viz., the Infirmary, the Dispensary, and the Women and Children's Hospital. Besides this, £600 will be added to the "reserve fund," making, with £400 from the Festival of 1880, a sum of £1,000 to work upon for future Festivals. This gratifying result has been achieved notwithstanding increased expenditure, and we may mention, as an evidence of the interest shown, that 1,100 five guinea serial tickets were sold against 800 at the 1880 Festival.

THE Dedication Festival (All Saints' Day) was duly observed this year at All Saints' Church, Margaret Street, with full choral services on the eve (October 31), the Festival itself (the 1st ultimo), and the following Sunday. Mr. W. Crowther-Alwyn's Mass in F was chosen for the High Celebration of the Holy Communion; and at each of the evening services Mr. C. E. Miller's new setting of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, composed for the recent Festival of the London Church Choir Association, and Sir Frederick Ouseley's anthem "It came even to pass," were sung. Mr. W. S. Hoyte presided ably at the organ throughout the festival.

ON Sunday, the 11th ult., the organ in St. Luke's Parish Church, E.C., after having undergone complete reconstruction by Messrs. Henry Willis and Son, was re-opened by the Organist, Mr. Charles W. Pearce, Mus. Bac., Cantab. The instrument now possesses 37 stops, and is in every respect (in the reedwork especially) worthy of its eminent builders. Recitals have been given by Mr. Pearce on the 12th, 18th, and 21st; and Dr. C. J. Frost gave a most interesting and artistic performance on the 14th to a large congregation, the programme containing pieces by Wesley, Dagenhardt, Silas, Tours, G. A. Macfarren, Dubois, and Mailly.

THE competition for the Mendelssohn Scholarship, now vacant, is announced to take place early in the approaching year. The scholarship, the value of which is, at the least, £80 per annum, is conferred with the intention of enabling the scholar either to go abroad to finish his (or her) education at a foreign conservatoire, or to attain that object at home with increased facilities, under the direction and at the choice of the committee. Sir A. Sullivan was the first Mendelssohn scholar, and Mr. D'Albert, who is now appearing as a successful pianist in Germany, was the last. The scholarship is regarded as a great honour, as well as a valuable prize, among musical students.

AN Evening Concert was given in Wandsworth Town Hall, on the 16th ult., by Mr. William Gourlie Blackie, in aid of the funds of the Wandsworth Presbyterian Church. The principal artists were Miss Clara Samuelli, Miss Susie Fenn, Mr. Robert Hilton, and Mr. P. de Vos. The vocalists were highly satisfactory in their rendering of some of the most popular songs, and Mr. P. de Vos's pianoforte playing was thoroughly appreciated. The Concert was ably conducted by Mr. T. E. Chantler, Organist of St. John's Church, Clapham Road.

THE series of Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre came to an end on the 24th ult. The most noteworthy feature has been the appearance on three occasions of Mr. Sims Reeves, who was received with the utmost enthusiasm by an overflowing audience. Madame Lemmens Sherrington, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Damian, Signor Foli, and Mr. Santley also appeared in conjunction with Mr. Reeves.

THE Kyrie Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave a performance of "Samson," in the Stepney Meeting House, on the 14th ult. The soloists were Miss Agnes Allen, Mrs. Oram, Mr. Reginald Groome, Mr. Albert Orme, and Mr. Ap Herbert. The part of the Messenger was taken by Mr. Russell Broom. A second performance of the Oratorio was given on the 21st ult., in St. Jude's Church, Kensal Green, the soloists being Miss Edith Phillips, Miss Isabel Tomalin, Mr. Levetus, Mr. Albert Orme, Mr. Ap Herbert, and Mr. Bion Reynolds (Messenger). Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ on both occasions.

A "BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF MUSICIANS," compiled and edited by Mr. James D. Brown, assistant Librarian at the Mitchell Library, Glasgow, is announced for publication in the course of next year. One of the principal objects of this work is to give greater attention to the claims of contemporary musicians than has hitherto been done, nearly the whole of the articles upon living artists being based upon information furnished directly by themselves. A special feature in connection with the book is a "Bibliography of English writings on music," which forms an appendix to the dictionary.

MESSRS. RISEGARI, SPEELMAN, BERNHARDT, and VIEUXTEMPS announce five Classical Chamber Concerts at the Lecture Hall, Athenæum, Manchester. The executants are: violin—Signor Risegari, M. Speelman, Herr Hanne-mann, and Signor Scuderi; tenors—Herr Otto Bernhard, and M. Goedhart; violoncellos—M. Vieuxtemps and Mr. Henry Smith; double bass—Herr Neuworth; clarinet—Herr Grosse; horn—Signor Preatoni; bassoon—Signor Raspi; and pianoforte, Mr. Edward Hecht. The first Concert took place on the 23rd ult., and the next is announced for the 7th inst.

ON the occasion of the opening of the fine new organ, built for the Church of St. Margaret, Westminster, by Messrs. Hill and Son, on Wednesday evening, the 14th ult., Dr. Bridge's Oratorio "Mount Moriah" was performed, with orchestral accompaniment and a large body of voices. The work was admirably rendered, Dr. Bridge presiding at the organ, and Dr. Gladstone conducting. The solos were sung by boys of the Abbey choir, Mr. Edward Dalzell, and Mr. Robert Hilton. After the oratorio, Dr. Bridge played Handel's Second Organ Concerto, also with orchestral accompaniment.

A VERY successful Concert was given on the 6th ult. at St. Luke's Schools, Canterbury Road, Kilburn. There was a choir of about thirty-five voices. Pinsuti's "There is music by the river," given as a quartet by Mrs. Regan, Messrs. T. and F. Abel, and Mr. W. D. McLaren, gained a hearty encore, the last named gentleman receiving a similar compliment for his excellent rendering of the song "Anchored"; but the chief features of the evening were Miss Tankerville's song, Cowen's "Better Land," and her really fine pianoforte solo, Thalberg's "Home, sweet home."

A SURPRIZED choir of fifty voices has been formed for the magnificent Parish Church of All Saints, Maidstone, under the direction of Mr. W. de M. Sergison, of St. Peter's, Eaton Square, who has appointed Mr. S. Bath to be organist, in the place of Mr. Henry Streafild, resigned, having held the post since 1865. The choir will sing, for the first time, on Advent Sunday. A fine tubular pneumatic organ, by Lewis, was opened three years since by Dr. Bridge in the church, which accommodates 2,000 people without galleries, and is shortly to be restored by Mr. Pearson.

THE West London Choral Society, for male voices, under the direction of Mr. Frederick Scarsbrook, announces a series of Concerts during the coming season, which will conclude at the end of March, 1884. The Association, which has been formed for the practice and public performance of glees, part-songs, operatic choruses, cantatas, &c., for male voices, has commenced its meetings at 98, Ledbury Road, Bayswater.

THE Organ Recital at Holy Trinity Church, Gray's Inn Road, on Sunday, the 2nd inst., will be given by Mr. Stretton Swann, who will be assisted by the members of the Orpheus Amateur Orchestral Society.

UNDER the direction of Mr. Joseph Hay, a very successful concert in aid of the Royal Caledonian Asylum, Holloway, was given at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on Tuesday evening, October 30, Lady Colin Campbell, Miss Coyte Turner, Madame Agnes Ross, Mrs. Markwell; Messrs. Joseph Hay, Egbert Roberts, and Markwell, were the soloists. During the evening the juvenile pipers of the Institution played a selection of reels, marches, and strathspeys, under the direction of Sergeant Grigor McGrigor. Mr. G. H. L. Edwards presided with efficiency at the pianoforte.

ON the 21st ult., the Praed Street Church Choir gave a miscellaneous concert, assisted by the following vocalists: Mrs. W. J. Newstead, Miss Clara Clark, Madame Evans-Warwick, and Mr. Walter Joy. The first part of the programme consisted of choruses and Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," and in the second part the Choir sung several part-songs, and Miss Sampson played a pianoforte solo—"Triumphal March" (Kuhe). Mr. F. R. Kinke and Mr. W. J. Green acted as accompanists, and Mr. H. Sampson was the Conductor.

ON Wednesday evening, the 7th ult., a Concert was given by Mr. T. H. Fox, at Gresham Hall, Brixton. Vocal music was contributed by Miss Madeline Hardy, Miss Horton, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. Chaplin Henry. The instrumental items included the bénéficiaire's solo, Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso, Op. 14, Chopin's Third Ballade, played by Master Bertie Fox, and Mr. H. Newton's violin solo, an Andante and Allegro by Mendelssohn. Mr. G. F. Smith was the accompanist.

THE Dedication Festival Services at all Saints', Clapton, were held on the 1st ult., at 8 p.m., when the choir was largely augmented. The anthem was "O give thanks" (Goss), and the "Hallelujah" Chorus (Handel) was sung before the Benediction. Mr. G. S. Young, a member of the choir, presided at the organ, and Mr. W. M. Wait (organist and choir-master of All Saints') conducted from the centre of the chancel. The special preacher was the Rev. J. P. Waldo, vicar of St. Stephen's, South Kensington.

THE Saturday popular Organ Recitals at the Bow and Bromley Institute continue to attract good audiences. During the past month the recitals have been given by Messrs. Bonawitz, Hodge, Phillips, and Turpin. On the 1st inst. M. Guilman, the eminent Parisian composer, is to play, on the 8th Mr. H. R. Rose, and on the 15th Dr. J. F. Bridge. On the 10th the Choir will give the "Hymn of Praise," and Haydn's "Spring," under the direction of Mr. McNaught.

ON Wednesday, the 14th ult., the Dedication Festival was held at St. John the Divine, Kennington. At Evensong the canticles were sung to Prout in F, the Te Deum by the same composer being sung at the close of the service. On Sunday, the 18th ult., the Communion Service was sung to Haydn's "Imperial Mass," arranged to the words of the English Prayer Book. In the evening, the canticles were Barby in E flat, and the anthem "Hallelujah" from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives."

MR. F. E. CHOVEAUX gave his Annual Concert at Lamas Hall, Battersea, on the 19th ult. The principal vocalists were Madame Beatrice Wade, Miss Minnie Gwynne, Miss Estelle Carlton, Miss Grace Morant, Mr. Charles Lockwood, Mr. Sebastian King, and two pupils of Mr. Choveaux, Miss Edith Cross and Miss Minnie Pyne (pianist). The instrumentalists were Herr Ernst Reiter and Mr. W. E. Wright (violin), Mr. H. J. Derham (flute), and Mr. G. A. Higgs and Mr. Choveaux (pianoforte).

AT the special service on the 13th ult., at St. Paul's Church, Battersea, an interesting Organ Recital was given by Mr. C. W. Hanson, Organist of the church; the programme also including a varied and well chosen selection of sacred vocal music, Miss Bocquet, R.A.M., being the solo singer. The offerings were devoted to the Organ and Choir Fund.

DR. HUBERT PARRY's new Quartet, for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, will be performed at the Monday Popular Concerts on the 3rd inst. The work will be published immediately by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.

AN excellent chamber organ, built under the supervision of Mr. E. H. Turpin, was presented to Miss Berrie Stephens, on the 3rd ult. at her residence. The president of the committee, the Rev. J. W. Horne, opened the proceedings by a highly complimentary speech; and after formally handing over the testimonial, accompanied with a purse of sovereigns, an interesting Recital was given on the new instrument by Mr. Turpin.

ON Tuesday, October 30, an Evening Concert was given in St. Michael's Hall, Hackney, on behalf of the Church Schoolmasters, and Schoolmasters' Benevolent Institution. The vocalists were Madame Clara West, Madame Christine Wallace, Miss Annie Cole, Mr. Müllerhausen, Mr. Stanley Cockton, Mr. Pegler, and the St. John's College (Battersea) Glee Party. Concertina, Mr. Hobday; pianists, Miss Pharoah and Mr. Sharp. There was a large and appreciative audience.

THE Committee of the Goss Memorial has, since our last number was issued, been increased by the names of the Duke of Beaufort, the Bishop of Carlisle, the Dean of Lichfield, Sir George Grove, Rev. Dr. Troutbeck, Rev. S. S. Greathead, Mr. Walter Macfarren, many of the Cathedral organists, and other influential persons. A meeting will shortly be held to determine as to the presentation of the memorial to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's.

THE Daily News says: "Dr. Villiers Stanford has completed the new comic opera which will form a leading feature of the Carl Rosa season at Drury Lane next Easter. The work, which is in four acts, will probably be entitled 'The Canterbury Pilgrims.' The baritone has a more than usually important part, and the chief characters will probably be played by Madame Georgina Burns, Miss Burton, Messrs. Davies, Ludwig, and Crotty. Mr. A. Beckett is the author of the libretto."

HERR EMIL BEHNKE gave an interesting Lecture, entitled "Science and Singing," at the South London Institute of Music, Camberwell, on Wednesday evening, October 31. Some valuable original photographs of the vocal apparatus were thrown upon the screen by means of the oxy-hydrogen light. The chair was taken by Dr. Stainer, supported by Dr. Lennox Browne, the lecturer's collaborateur.

MISS FLORENCE WYDFORD's annual Concert took place at St. James's Hall, on the 14th ult. Besides the concert-giver, Madame Edith Wynne, Miss Josephine Pulham, Miss Kate Evans, Miss Kate Beck, Mr. Bernard Lane, Mr. Egbert Roberts, and Mr. Thurlay Beale, Miss Bessie Waugh (pianoforte), and Mdle. Bertha Brouil (violin), appeared. A lengthy programme was gone through, much to the satisfaction of a numerous audience.

ON the 22nd ult. (St. Cecilia's Day), a selection of sacred music was given at St. Alban's Church, Holborn. The principal item was Dr. Stainer's new Cantata "St. Mary Magdalen," which formed part one, the second part consisting of sacred solos, &c. The vocalists were Master H. Tebbutt, Mr. E. Hall, Mr. T. Powell, Mr. Knott, and Mr. H. Pyatt. Mr. Farquharson Walenn accompanied on the organ.

THE first of a series of "Monday Ballad Concerts for the People," was given in the Victoria Park Tabernacle, on the 19th ult., under the direction of Mr. Henry Behling. The artists were Miss Josephine Pulham, R.A.M., Miss F. Wydford, Miss M. Claire, Mr. R. Evans, Mr. G. Weige, Mr. H. Behling, and Mr. G. J. Rayner, Organist and accompanist. The Concert was thoroughly appreciated.

THE St. Saviour's Young Men's Society, gave an evening Concert at the Schools, Herne Hill Road, on the 13th ult. The principal contributors were Miss Ada Tolkien, Miss Patten, Mr. Henry Yates, and Mr. W. Wilding. Mr. Alfred Izard acted as accompanist, and played as a pianoforte solo Chopin's familiar Polonaise in E flat.

MR. FOUNTAIN MEEN gave a Recital on the fine organ, built by Bryceson Brothers, at Woodberry Down Chapel, Seven Sisters Road, on the 20th ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The programme was well selected, and included vocal selections by the Woodberry Down Vocal Union.

The organ in the church of St. Margaret, Westminster, was opened, after reconstruction, on Wednesday, the 14th ult., with a special Choral Service, at which Dr. Bridge's Cantata "Mount Moriah" formed an important feature. At the conclusion of the service, Dr. Bridge gave a Recital upon the organ.

On Saturday evening, the 3rd ult., an excellent performance of "The Messiah" was given in the Assembly Rooms, Mile End. The principal vocalists were Madame Clara West, Mrs. Day Winter, Mr. H. D. Field, and Mr. C. T. Marriner. Mr. Bellman presided at the organ, and Mr. Day Winter conducted. There was a large audience.

The London Gregorian Choral Association held a Festival on Thursday evening, the 22nd ult. in the Parish Church of Shoreditch, in which about one hundred and fifty members of the choir took part. The Service Book for the present year was used, and Mr. C. Warwick Jordan presided at the Organ.

An excellent Concert was given at the Surrey Masonic Hall, on the 5th ult. The programme was carefully selected, and well arranged. The principal artists were Miss Frances Bellew, Miss A. E. Eyres, and Messrs. Harle and C. Montague, all of whom were highly appreciated.

MESSRS. CASSELL & COMPANY have issued for the second time a volume entitled "The History of the Year," the musical article in which, although somewhat better than that which appeared in the same work last season, is perhaps too sketchy to be of interest, save as a mere record of events.

MESSRS. RICHARD RICKARD AND A. COLLARD gave a Pianoforte and Flute Recital, at the Grosvenor Gallery, on the 23rd ult. The programme was an interesting one, and was excellently rendered by the concert-givers, in conjunction with Miss Cora Cardigan (flute) and Mr. Waley (pianoforte). Miss Clara Myers was the vocalist.

We are glad to find that the Lincoln Harmonic Society, although formed but a few weeks, already numbers 320 members. The first concert is fixed for January 29, 1884, under the conductorship of Mr. F. Marshall Ward, of Nottingham.

The special Advent service in St. Paul's Cathedral, when Spohr's "Last Judgment" is to be sung in its entirety, will take place on Tuesday next, the 4th inst., commencing at 7 p.m. No tickets are required for admission.

On the 17th ult. Mr. Charles Villiers Stanford, M.A., Mus. Doc., Miss Mundella, Miss Mary Davies, and Miss Mary Travers were elected Associates of the Philharmonic Society.

DVORAK'S "Stabat Mater," which created such a great impression when performed at St. James's Hall last April, will constitute one of the most interesting items of the Worcester Festival next Autumn.

We understand that Mr. Barnby's setting of the ninety-seventh Psalm, "The Lord is King," which was so successfully given at the Leeds Festival, will be performed by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society at an early date.

We are informed that Dr. Gladstone's Cantata "Philippi" is to be performed at the Glasgow Athæneum, early in January, under the direction of Mr. J. Ives.

A WINDOW of stained glass has been placed in the north aisle of Westminster Abbey in memory of the late Organist, Mr. Turle, and his wife.

REVIEWS.

"Le Rythme Musical, son origine, sa fonction, et son accentuation. Par Mathis Lussy, lauréat de l'Institut de France, &c., &c. [Paris, 1883.]

M. Lussy has completely identified his name with the history as well as with the perfecting of the modern notation of music. His latest work on "Le Rythme Musical"—the orthography of the word rythme, it may be observed, has been recently changed by the French Academy—is intended to complete the analysis of a subject already considered in his treatise on "Musical Expression." The latter work, as well as M. Lussy's aid in reference to song in France, has been gratefully alluded to by the author of the article "Song," in Grove's Dictionary. The method M. Lussy adopts in his treatment of technical questions, is what our neighbours call "philosophique," and his phraseology is not easy to paraphrase in homely English; nor are even the technical terms he employs easy to translate literally. But if any adventurous publisher should essay a translation of M. Lussy's work, it is to be hoped it will not be mangled and vulgarised to suit schools, and what our musicsellers understand by "amateurs"; a class that, to say the least of it, seems to be in their eyes intensely practical. In running over a collection of airs arranged for "flute, violin, voice, or cornet-à-piston," it might not be thought essential to comprehend such terms as "catalectique," "acatalectique," "anacrousique," or "prothétique," but the more we surrender ourselves to the guidance of M. Lussy the more satisfied we become that it is quite essential to know all that is involved in the terms he employs, if we are to intelligently render a musical composition. Naturally music is, and has been, intelligently rendered without the signs of expression in the notation being reduced to a science; but, in this respect we owe much to traditional imitations of the performances of their own works by composers themselves, whose genius, as M. Lussy remarks, is independent of rules in the construction of certain rhythms, and who, careless in notation, reverse, in regard to their playing, the old clerical injunction, and tell us "to do as they do and not as they say." The best composers, in writing, for example, a Sonata for pianoforte and violin, will studiously bow the violin part and leave the piano part meagre in the extreme, in respect to marks of expression. To remedy similar defects in all music appears to be the main object of M. Lussy's laborious analysis of measure, rhythm, and accent. He has not, like Westphal, any idea of reviving the elaborate rhythmical conceptions of the Greeks. He prefers to take the art as it now exists, and, guided by natural sentiment, subject the music of our own time to a careful analysis. He claims for the present work that it is not simply a compilation, but an independent dissection of the physiology of music, and his success thoroughly justifies the claim. On emerging from our musical catechisms we have all of us, in our day, been puzzled at the little respect composers seem to have for the orthodox sections and periods of four bars or eight bars. A departure from the elementary rules of form is still, rightly enough, considered as an irregularity; and it is in these rhythmical irregularities—in the pathology of the subject, so to speak, where M. Lussy most assists us. As he says, whatever may have been the case in ancient music, modern music is filled with strong pulses or accented notes in apparently wrong places, destroying all regularity, and defying measure, rhythm, tonality, and mode. It is precisely to these irregular and destructive notes that M. Lussy has given the general name pathetic accent. They present themselves in any beat of a bar or in any part of a passage. The ordinary accents, rhythmical or metrical, can be displaced by what M. Lussy terms an incision, or break in the continuity of a rhythmical figure. The incision can mean a change from semibreves to quavers, or a change from unison to harmony, or from harmony to unison. It results also from the intrusion of a rest, which in music is an entity and often an intrinsic element of the unity of a rhythm. The first note of an incision is strongly accented wherever it may appear in the bar. If it falls on what would otherwise be an unaccented beat, the beat becomes accented; so that in critically examining a musical period we have not only to count the bars which may be irregular in number, but to determine when and where the strong accent occurs. Pulsation in music differs from the beat of the pulse, which in a healthy subject is regular, and represents the ictus, or first and strongest beat in a bar; that is to say, the metrical, not the rhythmical accent. As M. Lussy well observes, rhythm plays quite a different part in music compared with poetry. A poem would be intelligible as prose, but he seems to think that the whole soul of music is in rhythm. This may be disputed, as we can have motion without rhythm; but it is certainly correct to slightly invert the case and say that what is called metre in poetry is of far more importance than in music. The irregular pulsation, the pathetic accents, the throb of modern dramatic music, would be intolerable in verse, or would reduce it to prose. On the other hand, metre in music means a strict division of time, which in poetry is less absolute. There are no literal "bars" in poetry. There is no rigid prosody in music. M. Lussy enumerates five principal causes of irregularities in rhythm—contraction, dilation, repetition, melodic progressions, and the echo. To re-establish regularity composers employ the ellipsis, the coda, and the pause. He adheres to the broad division of rhythms into masculine and feminine, and gives this familiar and characteristic example in which in each two alternate bars the feminine accent falls entreatingly on the weak beat of the first bar and the masculine on the strong. With a little exaggeration of accent and attention to piano and forte, the melody can well represent a dialogue between a lady and a gentleman, the lady evidently retaining her distinctive costume:—

In the phrasing of music the member of a phrase is denoted by suspense, and the complete phrase by repose. Here a new element is introduced quite independent of rhythm, since a melodic cadence or repose is determined by the modern tonic or the ancient final, and both can be neutralised by the accompanying harmony. Mattheson, in his "Theory and Science of Melody," endeavours to punctuate and scan a minute by employing the usual signs of punctuation and of prosody. M. Lussy gives the example and says, "We will add nothing to this analysis so bizarre and so remarkable, considering above all the epoch at which it was made." We are to presume, therefore, that we have got very much beyond Mattheson in the question, and beyond longs and shorts, and commas and colons. At the same time, as M. Lussy rules, long rhythms correspond to long lines in verse, and different cadences in music correspond exactly with grammatical signs of punctuation; and in poetry, as in music, there are masculine and feminine accents, as well as suspensive and cadential properties which the musician imitates in following the sense of the words he is setting. We must remember that the method of M. Lussy is above all things psychological, which in each point considered involves many varying subjects. There is nothing at once so tempting and so dangerous as illustrating one art by another, each having its special and proximate origin, whatever may be the common origin. We have to guard against confusing mere rhythmical punctuation, which might be illustrated on the drum, with punctuation or rhythm in modern music, greatly dependent, as M. Lussy admits, on the final repose as a question of tonal relationship that has in itself little to do with either rhythm or punctuation, and to which in either poetry or grammar there is nothing that bears the slightest resemblance. In his philosophic work, M. Lussy is dealing less with the essence of music than with its external graces and embroideries. He cautions us against confounding rhythm with symmetry. "Rhythm," he says, "is the arabesque designed on the canvas; it matters little whether the arabesques be rigorously symmetrical or no; the melos, the varying sounds provide the colouring. Measure, rhythm, and melos are three entities which combined with harmony produce the marvellous picture called music." Rhythmical irregularities, he tells us, are infinitely more frequent than we imagine; and to them must be ascribed much of the variety and mysterious charm of music; although they are employed by composers with such skill and delicacy that they surprise and affect only cultivated and highly impressionable hearers. If we examine the works of great composers we shall be amazed, he says, at the immense number of unequal sections of 5, of 7, of 9, of 11 bars, that are found in the midst of strophes of 4 and 8 bars. Nevertheless, the laws of rhythm, that is, of rests and repose, are throughout strictly observed; the symmetry alone is destroyed. "A further proof," he adds, "that if rhythm is an indispensable element in music, a strict and rigorous symmetry plays only an accessory and subordinate part." All kindred questions are minutely treated in M. Lussy's work, and his name will be a sufficient attraction to our well informed readers; but we have chosen to dwell in particular on one point—irregular rhythms—and the following quotation will further illustrate our explanations that must necessarily be imperfect without many examples in music. M. Lussy remarks: "We have already said the inconveniences resulting from defective metrical formulas, exist only for the executant and not for the hearer. The latter, not seeing the bars which determine the time or measure, is influenced by the ictus; he perceives the true measure which results either from the approximation of the strong accents, or from their distance one from the other." He instances Verdi and Wagner as possessing in the highest degree the secret of creating psychological rhythms, and being at the same time very careless as to the choice of time signatures. But we must not suppose that M. Lussy, by the very nature of his labours a strict and profound pedagogue, is misled by his desire to organise apparent rhythmical irregularities into the worship of "tetralogies" and "monstrosities." He seeks a refuge, like Alice at the cross in "Robert le Diable," in the works of those geniuses who have "projected into the ærial ocean magical cathedrals, alhambras, and temples in sound." He appeals to "ces monuments, la Passion, le Messie, Armide, Don Juan, la Creation," &c. This common but somewhat antiquated apostrophising of the prophets and their works is sermonising; it is certainly not criticism; but it will reassure many, and draw them to a closer acquaintance with M. Lussy's new and excellent work on rhythm, every page of which is suggestive and full of interesting facts and inferences.

Music in Song: A Selection of Extracts, descriptive of the Power, Influences, and Effects of Music, from Chaucer to Tennyson. Compiled by L. L. Carmela Koelle, [London: Griffith and Farran.]

THE underlying current of musical feeling, present to a greater or less degree in all true poetry, has frequently been exemplified in the publication of volumes of excerpts from the writings of all the poets from the times of Chaucer and Spenser to the present day; and in the early numbers of this journal, now nearly thirty years ago, were published, as some of our readers may yet remember, selections judiciously made by Mrs. Mary Cowden-Clarke of—to quote her own words—"some of the choicest sentences on the subject of music from the finest thinkers in the world of letters." The little work now before us will, we think, however, form an agreeable addition to similar collections which have preceded it; whilst to any who may hitherto have overlooked the connection between the two graces we may certainly commend a perusal of its pages. Though scarcely so comprehensive in its character as the selections by Mrs. Clarke, and doing perhaps rather scant justice to the great fathers of English poetry we have already named, it is yet interesting to note how few repetitions of the earlier work are to be met with in the later. In Miss Koelle's book, too, some occasional cuttings from prose writers are also introduced, among them a short and striking sentence of Lord Beaconsfield's which says: "The greatest advantage a writer can derive from music is that it teaches most exquisitely the art of development." In its dainty "get-up"—parchment cover and Dutch hand-made paper—it will form an acceptable little gift-book; while a short Introduction, modestly signed with the initials J. S., will considerably enhance its intrinsic literary value. Our space will not permit us to quote from this Introduction as we should like, but most heartily do we agree with Dr. Stainer (whom an advertisement elsewhere has proclaimed its author) in his exclamation, "Has a man no music in him? he will never become a poet; has he no poetry in him? he will never become a musician!" We must not, however, omit to notice the Index (a most important and often neglected feature of any work) on which a laudable amount of care has evidently been expended, divided, as it is, into three parts—namely, a chronological as well as an alphabetical list of authors, together with a table of first lines.

Die Musik des Griechischen Alterthums nach den alten Quellen neu bearbeitet, von Rudolf Westphal.

THE veteran philologist has been long silent since his last well-known work on Ancient Greek music. Many—or perhaps we should say a few—of our readers will be pleased to know that Herr Westphal has returned to the subject in a work of some importance, which he has gratefully dedicated to Herren H. Weil, of the Academy of Belles-Lettres at Paris; Ch. Em. Ruelle, librarian of St. Genevieve, at Paris; and F. A. Gevaert, director of the Brussels Conservatorium, &c., &c. In the preface or introduction to the present work, which in its entirety we may review more at length on some future occasion, Herr Westphal again goes over the well-indexed but not very extensive list of authors, ancient and modern, who have treated of Greek music. He speaks of Aristoxenus as a not less deep thinker than his master Aristotle, and amongst the ancients looks to him, and finally to Ptolemy, as the great fountains of our knowledge on the subject. He pays high tributes of praise to Wallis, Böckh, and Bellerman, amongst modern and recent editors and commentators; and in mentioning his own contributions he observes that his opinions in regard to the Greek Melos have been received by some of his German fellow-workers with mistrust, and even with enmity; but he adds: "I had already forsaken Germany when there appeared that exhaustive work, 'Histoire et Théorie de la Musique de l'Antiquité,' by Frederick Augustus Gevaert, Ghent, 1875-1881, in which the learned inquirer acknowledges in every point his indebtedness to my Greek Harmonik, that is based on the nomenclature of the positional-scale-system of Ptolemy, and wherein on that system is clearly explained the non-unisonal accompaniment of Greek melody."

Herr Westphal tells us that he first paid attention to the subject of Greek melody at the end of his fiftieth year. From the study of Bellerman he turned to the ancient texts, and in 1863 published his "Harmonik." A second edition, with certain further explanations in regard to the Greek tone-system, appeared in 1867. In respect to his present work, he claims for it the same solid foundation on original texts and ancient sources, and he tells us that it is virtually the same system he presented in his previous work, but that it differs throughout in the method of arrangement. Herr Westphal has been reproached for writing on Greek music as a philologist and for philologists, just as physicists and acousticians write on music as scientists for scientists, but following perhaps the example of M. Gevaert, he has this time treated the history and systems of ancient Greek music in a style suited to musicians and amateurs who are not inclined to trouble themselves with Greek type and notation, and philology. Herr Westphal in his new work has some important chapters on the Greek rhythmical system; and in regard to this subject he tells the musician that by the study of the theories of Aristoxenus he will find that he has to unlearn much that he has learned from modern theorists. Westphal seems to think that neither Beethoven nor Mozart represented the Greek rhythmical feeling and theory, which, amongst the moderns, are found only in the music of Sebastian Bach. As a close and industrious seeker after the truth of the whole of the vexed question of Greek music in its original sources, the veteran philologist more than once expresses his disdain for the phantasies and divinations by the aid of which some musicians and authors create systems of Greek music. He treats the subject of Greek music not only as serious from an archaeological point of view, but as one of great practical importance to the musical art; and closes one of his introductory chapters with this quotation from Gevaert: "The music of the ancients, which I had until then considered as a subject absolutely devoid of interest, suddenly appeared to me in a new light; I saw in it an object of value to the musician, and worthy of his whole attention."

This revelation occurred to Gevaert after his study of Westphal's "Metrik," which led him to pursue the subject and elucidate it, and, as he has told us lately, not without a practical object. We may assume that both he and Westphal, now that certain parts of the Greek system have been made clearer and seem in many respects to more and more resemble the modern system, are of opinion that musicians will soon find that Greek music has more than a merely antiquarian interest. Westphal observes, in the book we are noticing, that more than two thousand years before the historical twelve major and twelve minor scales of Bach's well-tempered clavier, the same thing had been accomplished by the Aristoxenian innovation in regard to the Greek transposition-scales. The twelve scales, or "Tones," were of course a device arising from the temperament, as anyone can find by simply inverting the modern major scale of C natural. From the scale and its inversions we get eleven tonics. The twelfth is F sharp. To retain the twelve sounds in the equally tempered scale, we have to invert the F sharp as again F sharp. Inverting it regularly as G flat, gives us the canonical and Aristoxenian number of thirteen tones. We soon leave these commonplaces, when we remember that each tone had its double-octave system containing seven forms of scale; the "eidos," or form of scale, being the Mode. In the modern system each mode is, or can be, transposed, so as to commence on the key-note. Hence, perhaps our term "minor-key." Again, in the Greek system, each double-octave system was of the genus diatonic, chromatic, or enharmonic; and each of these genera had various ratios; and the original nomenclature of the tones, such as Lydian, Phrygian, &c., became changed by transpositions in higher or lower octaves; and the modes also, from sundry causes, not yet made very clear, received different names, such as Eolian, Locrian, Boetian, &c.; the whole system, together with great subtleties and refinements in regard to accent and rhythm, becoming a most complicated mechanism, which Westphal well characterises as die umfangreichsten Melopöien des Griechenthums. Those who are acquainted with his former works will not require to be told that in this, his last work on the subject, the history, harmony, metre, and rhythm of the Greek system have been treated by Westphal with consummate learning and penetration. As our intention was simply to refer to certain points in the introduction, we have only to repeat that the present work is adapted expressly to the requirements of musicians.

Valse in B flat minor. Gavotte. Composed for the Pianoforte by Gordon Saunders.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

BOTH these compositions are commendable specimens of refined and artistic dance movements. Dr. Saunders disarms any charge of imitation which might be brought against him by calling his Valse "A la Chopin"; but we cannot help expressing a wish that he had relied more upon himself, for he has amply shown in his Gavotte that he has sufficient artistic capital to hold his way without borrowing. Apart from the Chopin character of the Valse, however, we prefer the last-named piece, which is a good honest Gavotte, and may be conscientiously recommended to the many amateur pianists who so extensively patronise this class of music.

The Bible Psalter. By Sir Herbert Oakeley.

[Nisbet and Co.]

THIS work cannot be of service in the Church of England, as there is no likelihood of the Prayer Book version of the Psalms being superseded. In the northern country and among dissenting communities it may, however, be very useful. The pointing is simple and, on the whole, commendable. Sir Herbert Oakeley avows his preference for double, or, as he terms them, "whole," chants, and his book contains a very good selection, some of the old florid abominations being deprived of superfluous crotchets and thus made to assume an air of soberness and dignity undreamed of by their composers.

Quatuor pour 2 Violons, Alto et Violoncelle. Par Charles Dancla. [F. W. Chanoit.]

QUARTETS must be heard to be justly criticised; but an examination of the score of M. Dancla's work inclines us to believe that it possesses very high merit. The subjects are exceedingly attractive and the writing clear and spontaneous throughout. We may say that the composition obtained the prize from "La Société des Compositeurs de Musique," at Paris, in 1882.

Short Voluntary for Lent; Allegretto in D; Réverie; Three Pieces in F, D, and G; and Marche Sérieuse. By Luard Selby. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It is a healthful sign that composers are turning their attention with increased zeal to the organ as a worthy medium for the presentation of their creative ideas. Transcriptions have for a long period been and will continue to be necessary, and are not to be condemned when skilfully and artistically carried out; but music composed expressly for a certain instrument must always be preferable to arrangements. The English school of organ music, of which Henry Smart may be said to have been the founder, is growing in importance, and it may fill a definite position in art if its best workers succeed in avoiding modern Teutonic ponderousness on the one hand and modern Gallic flippancy on the other. The present pieces are Nos. 11, 16, 22, 23, and 24 of a new series of "Original Compositions for the Organ," by various native composers. Mr. Luard Selby is evidently a musician who is not disposed to walk tamely in the footsteps of his predecessors, his independency of thought being exhibited even in the opening bars of the Lent Voluntary. It is a sketch in three flats, but whether the tonic is E flat or C minor we are left in doubt until the close in the major key. The Allegretto in D is far more pleasing, and we may add, more satisfactory to a musician's sense. The principal theme in 3-4 time is extremely melodious, and the middle section, Allegro in G minor, is in excellent contrast. The Réverie is a flowing Andante con moto in A, 3-4 time, with a brief middle section in the relative minor. The three pieces are more vigorous in character, and will be useful as concluding voluntaries. In the Marche Sérieuse the composer indulges freely in double notes on the pedals, and the piece is remarkable for some abrupt and startling transitions of key. On the whole it is not the most attractive number of the series.

The Soldier's Mother. Song for Mezzo-Soprano or Contralto, with Clarinet obbligato. Words by James Baden Powell.

I am a little Milking Maid. Boddice's Song from "The Blue Lady of Milden Hall." Monthly Packet, 1880.

Over the Sea. Canzonet. Words by H. Knight. Composed by James Baden Powell. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IN the first two of these songs the want of definite design is observable, a few fragmentary phrases being so often repeated—sometimes with variety in the harmonies and figures of accompaniment—as to become tiresome. "The Soldier's Mother" has this peculiarity in an inordinate degree; but the simplicity of the second song on our list makes such musical reiteration less felt. "Over the Sea," however, is a highly effective composition, both melody and accompaniment being in true sympathy with the poetry. We shall be glad to welcome Mr. Powell in other songs as good as this.

Impromptu Gavotte. For the Pianoforte. By Walter Macfarren. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

AMONGST the many pieces of this kind by Mr. Walter Macfarren, the one before us should certainly take high rank. The melodiousness of the subjects—especially that in the tonic major—must commend the composition to all hearers; and there is just sufficient work in the last page to please those ambitious pianists who wish to have "something to do." There can be little doubt that this "Impromptu Gavotte" will become a general favourite.

Leslie's Songs for Little Folks. By Henry Leslie. [Cassell and Company, Limited.]

SOME years ago a volume was published by Messrs. Cassell, called "Little Songs for me to sing," the music by Henry Leslie, and the illustrations by J. E. Millais. The book now before us is a reprint of the former one, with the addition of several new songs, a frontispiece by Millais, and an illustration by H. C. Selous. All these fresh contributions are fully worthy to rank with their companions; and at the approach of a season when "little folks" look for such offerings, the publication of so refined and attractive a combination of musical and pictorial art is well timed.

The Prodigal Son. A Cantata. The words from the revised Edition of the New Testament.

The Fisherman's Wife. Song. Words by Claxson Bellamy.

When the soft light of Sunset. Song for Baritone. Words by A. M. H.

Three Songs. Song. Words by Claxson Bellamy. Composed by R. P. Paine. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

A CALM examination of these compositions convinces us that where Mr. Paine has been the least ambitious he has been the most successful. He tells us in his preface to the Cantata that he has especially designed the work for young people in churches, chapels, and Sunday-schools, who are capable of "singing a solo, recitative, or playing an accompaniment on piano or harmonium, and even the organ, as well as in chorus." We cannot say whether the want of an "Oratorio in miniature" really exists to the extent that Mr. Paine imagines; but, if so, his unpretending little work may find some favour where music of more importance must of necessity be excluded. Even for "young people," however, the part-writing must be pure; and we can scarcely pass without a protest such consecutive fifths as occur between soprano and bass in the last bar but one of the quartet "And the son said unto him." Some of the choruses, although very brief, would prove effective in performance; and in many of the solos the words are well expressed. The songs—especially "The Fisherman's Wife" and "When the soft light of sunset"—are exceedingly simple in the vocal part, but the accompaniments are laboured and distressing to the voice; indeed, it often appears that the composer is trying to find how many harmonies he can fit in to the notes of the melody. The same fault is observable in "Three Songs," but the pianoforte part is in this composition more sympathetic with the voice.

Music. By Henry C. Banister. Eleventh Edition. Revised, with new Appendix. [Deighton, Bell and Co.]

A REVIEW upon the new edition of this work, on which we have already expressed a highly favourable opinion, would be quite unnecessary were it not that from time to time it has received various modifications, and that in this (the eleventh edition) a very important appendix is added, explaining the theory and giving examples of those "fundamental" chromatic chords upon which the system propounded by the late Dr. Alfred Day is based. As Mr. Banister's book does not enunciate any absolute "method" throughout, it is quite consistent with his design that the author should place these views before his readers without committing himself to belief or disbelief in their truth. We may also say that since our notice of the work when it first appeared the many "modifications" to which we have alluded justify us in strengthening our then recorded estimate of its value as a text-book.

The Children's Christmas. Nine Christmas Scenes. Words by R. Spence Watson, LL.D. Music by Myles Birker Foster. [George Routledge and Sons.]

THESE short musical Christmas Scenes will be a welcome present to the many children who look forward to having something new, as well as appropriate to the season. It is not always that songs written for a special occasion are considered worth preserving after the occasion has passed away; but the organist of the Foundling Hospital has here given us music which, although simple, is good of its kind; and having associated himself with an author who has the rare faculty of sympathising with the juvenile mind, there can be no reason why the nine little pieces here given should not last for many Christmases to come.

The Lord is in His Holy Temple. Anthem for Dedication or General use. Composed by Gordon Saunders, Mus. Doc. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS smooth and musicianlike setting of the words may be found useful for its intended purpose. The movement in 3-2 is perhaps the most effective portion of the anthem; but there are some good contrapuntal points in the final chorus, "O come, let us worship."

Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in F. By E. Bambridge.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS is a tolerably free and modern setting of the evening canticles, so far as regards the independence of the accompaniment and the nature of the harmonic progressions. At the same time, the Service is not too elaborate for ordinary use, and its generally expressive character will favour its chances of popularity. It is a pity that Mr. Bambridge has marred an otherwise excellent composition by some technical errors too grave to be ignored by musicians. The consecutive fifths between bass and treble, at the words "Holy is His name," are inexcusable, and the rising third in the chord of the 6-4-3 on page 6, bar 4, has a very harsh effect. With a little care such a barbarism as "in th' imagination of their hearts" might also have been avoided. It is worth while to point out these blemishes, as the composer has undoubted talent which we trust he will turn to advantage.

Christmas Carols, Hymns, &c. [F. Pitman.]

THE anonymous compiler of this collection of 106 sacred and secular ditties, suitable for yuletide, has drawn his materials from every conceivable source, and the requirements of church, chapel, and the fireside have been studied in about equal proportions. The old favourites are mingled with a considerable number of new compositions in various styles, and the editing of the former has generally been carried out in a modest and judicious spirit. A remarkable exception, however, occurs in Mendelssohn's "Hark, the herald angels sing," in which the harmonies are grievously distorted, and progressions inserted of which the veriest tyro would feel ashamed.

Carols for the Church Seasons. By Henry Hudson.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE revival of carol-singing is a noteworthy feature in the routine of church work of the present time. Christmas, of course, is the most popular season for the practice of this semi-devotional vocal exercise, though other festival periods are now giving occasion for the composition and performance of carols. Mr. Hudson's series consists of eight examples, namely, three for Christmas and one each for Easter, Ascensiontide, Whitsuntide, Flower Services, and Harvest. Structurally most of them are a compromise between a hymn-tune and a brief full anthem, and they are scarcely simple or tuneful enough for congregational singing. They may be commended, however, for musicianly feeling and a pleasant freshness of manner.

There were Shepherds. Anthem for Christmas. By T. Mee Pattison. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

ALTHOUGH this Anthem is very brief and unpretentious, it consists of five distinct movements, namely, two choruses, two passages for tenors and basses in unison, and a quartet. Excepting one or two questionable progressions, Mr. Pattison's composition is smoothly and melodiously written, and may be recommended to parish church choirs.

The Holy Communion Office in F. By Harry A. Marriner. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of this Communion Service has evidently no sympathy with modern harmonies. He writes in a studiously plain and simple manner, and there is nothing in his music to prove that he is acquainted with the Church composers of the nineteenth century. He appears to have taken Kent and King as his models, and only manifests a sense of independence in the final cadence of the Gloria in excelsis, where he boldly violates the law against consecutive fifths and octaves.

Amice. Song. Words by Walter Raymond. Composed by E. A. Sydenham. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. SYDENHAM is always melodious, both in his vocal and instrumental pieces, but there is a delicacy of touch in the treatment of the song before us which should ensure it a warm welcome from artists as well as amateurs. The figure in the accompaniment, which ceases and re-appears in sympathy with the varied feeling of the words, is extremely graceful; and vocalists in search of novelty will, we are certain, thank us for drawing attention to so attractive and refined a composition.

Allegro ma non troppo. Six Miniatures. For the Organ. By Oscar Wagner. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

SIMPLICITY is one characteristic of Herr Wagner's pieces, and another is a certain dryness and monotony of style, or rather, a want of melodic interest which, in default of scientific treatment, is necessary for effect. One or two of the "Miniatures" (which are pieces of moderate length, not fragmentary trifles) are tolerably pleasing; but we should be glad to know the composer's authority for concluding a Postlude in E minor, with a fff cadence in the dominant key.

Te Deum Laudamus in D. By T. Tallis Trimmell.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE title page description of this as a Festival setting of the "Te Deum" might easily mislead organists and choir-masters. In parish choirs, where only chants are used on ordinary occasions, the term might apply, but not in those places where a full choral service is the rule and not the exception. The voices move either in unison or in simple four-part harmony, and the accompaniment rarely takes an independent course. In its way Mr. Trimmell's setting is one of the best we have met with for some time. It is at once melodious, dignified, and musicianlike, and may therefore be heartily recommended.

FOREIGN NOTES.

At the Hamburg Town Theatre, the first institution in Germany for producing novelties, two new stage works by Anton Rubinstein were recently performed, under the composer's own conductorship—viz., "Sulamith," a biblical stage-play, in five scenes, the libretto founded on the "Song of Solomon," by Julius Rodenberg, and "Unter Räubern" (Amongst Thieves), a comic opera in one act, written by Ernst Wichert. Of the two, "Sulamith" achieved the greater amount of success. The writer of this libretto has done his best to endow the simple biblical story with some dramatic feeling, but has protracted it to such an extent that he fails altogether to sustain the interest throughout. Rubinstein, though deriving little help from the words, has written some of his best music for this work, which abounds in most beautiful melodies, particularly in the first part. In the latter portion he seems to have laboured under the strain put upon him by the uninteresting words, and in consequence the music is here much weaker. Taken, however, as a whole, this new work of the prolific composer is a most remarkable one, and will certainly make its way and be heard on all the principal stages of Germany. As our readers are aware, our countryman, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, is now engaged on an Oratorio for the Norwich Festival of next year, founded on the same subject, the words written by Mr. Joseph Bennett. Long before it was announced that Rubinstein was to compose an opera on this theme, Mr. Bennett had selected it for Mackenzie's Oratorio, and we have no doubt that its purely lyrical character fits it far more for a work intended for performance in the concert room than for production on the stage. Nothing favourable can be said about the other work of Rubinstein's performed on the same night. The libretto, founded on a well-known novel, is entirely unsuited for dramatic purposes, and the music appears to have been written in such haste that the composer had not time to sift good from bad, interesting from uninteresting. The performance of both works was all that could be desired, and, as far as the orchestra is concerned, remarkably fine. Composer and artists were repeatedly called. The next novelty to be produced at this theatre is Mackenzie's "Colomba."

Gounod's "Redemption" was given on the 4th ult. at Vienna, in the great Hall of the Musical Society. The principal soloists and the entire chorus and orchestra of the Imperial Opera House took part in the performance, which was under the conductorship of Kapellmeister J. N. Fuchs. All the artists did their best to ensure a perfect interpretation of this master work, and the result was one of the most admirable renderings that has ever taken place in this centre of musical art. Herren Winkelmann and Rokitsansky gave the parts of the Two Narrators with great expression, as did also Herr Sommer, who sang the part of Christ. The solo parts for female voices were excellently rendered by Frau Papier, Fräulein Lehmann and Braga. Besides these, mention is due to Mesdames Schlager, Hauser, Devey, Messrs. Bronlik, Schittenhelm, Wiegand, and others, who greatly contributed to the general effect.

A most interesting musical event took place at Cologne, on Wednesday, the 14th ult., when Mr. Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda" (which was so successful in this country when produced by Mr. Carl Rosa last spring) was performed, for the first time in the German language, at the Town Theatre. We are glad to be able to report that the work met with a highly favourable reception and a decided success. Though the music cannot be said to mark any new departure in Opera, nor to present any features which would stamp it as a representative work of English musical art, yet it is so well written, and so full of pleasing melodies that it will doubtless keep its place with many other works written in the same style by Germans and Frenchmen. The three principal rôles of Esmeralda, Phæbus, and Frollo, were in the experienced hands of Madame Peschka-Leutner, Herr Goetze, and Herr Karl Mayer, artists who enjoy the highest reputation throughout Germany. The principal vocalists, as well as the composer, were called several times before the curtain, and at the close of the performance the same honour was bestowed upon the director of the theatre, Herr Julius Hofmann.

On the occasion of the Luther Commemoration in Germany, a number of Concerts of more or less interest were given. Meinardus's oratorio "Luther in Worms" was performed at many places and pleased greatly wherever it was heard. A specially noteworthy programme was that of a Concert given in connection with the celebration by the Directors of the Gewandhaus at Leipzig, which comprised Bach's Reformation Cantata "Gott der Herr ist Sonn und Schild"; Mendelssohn's a capella Chorus for eight voices, and the same composer's "Da nobis pacem"; a new composition by Dahl on Luther's choral "Ein feste Burg," and Beethoven's Eroica Symphony. Another new composition, which has been frequently heard throughout Germany on this occasion and has met with great success wherever it has been performed, is Albert Becker's Reformation Cantata.

At the Second Gürzenich Concert at Cologne, Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony was given with immense success, the composer himself conducting the performance. This most important work of our countryman has now been performed at nearly all the principal concert institutions in Germany, and has everywhere been highly successful. The enthusiastic reception given to the works of our young composers, Cowen, Thomas, and Mackenzie, wherever they have been heard in Germany, proves that Germans are ready to offer a welcome to art and artists irrespective of their nationality. It should, at the same time, encourage English composers to persevere in the production of music of a high class which shall worthily sustain the reputation they have lately achieved.

Director Pollini, of the Hamburg Theatre, has offered Anton Rubinstein the sum of £25,000 for 100 concerts, to be given during a tour of five months in the United States of America. The composer has not as yet, however, accepted this munificent offer. Joachim, Scaria, and a great many other excellent artists will go next year to the "land of dollars."

Undoubtedly the oldest of all German musicians is Herr Hilff, a former member of the Town Band at the watering place of Elslar, who celebrated last month his 100th birthday. In company with his sons and grandsons, who seem to have inherited his talent for music, he may still occasionally be seen taking part in the performances of the above-named orchestra.

The anniversary of Mendelssohn's death was celebrated at Leipzig by a performance at the Town Theatre of three of the composer's works, viz., "Hemkehr aus der Fremde" (Son and Stranger), "Walpurgis Night," and "Loreley."

The 400th performance of Mozart's "Zauberflöte," at the Royal Opera House in Berlin, took place on the 2nd ult. Eighty-nine years ago, on May 12, 1794, the work was given, for the first time, at the above-named theatre, by special desire of King Frederic William the Second.

Herr Max Friedländer, the baritone, whose concert, given at Vienna last month, was a great success, has discovered some valuable Schubert manuscripts, amongst others a part of the music to "Rosamunde." The newly found pieces will shortly be performed by the Vienna Philharmonic Society.

Robert Volkmann, whose death we notice in another column, has left a parcel of manuscripts, labelled "Unpublished Compositions," which contains, amongst sundry smaller works, two sonatas for piano, a duo for piano and violin, a string quartet, and the music to a dramatic fairy tale entitled "Midas."

Mackenzie's opera "Colomba" has been accepted by the directors of the Vienna Opera House, Madame Pauline Lucca being announced to sing the title rôle.

It is intended to hold next year, at Leipzig, an International Musical Festival for brass bands.

A new comic opera, "The Spanish Students," was performed recently at Copenhagen, under the conductorship of the celebrated composer Svendsen. The music, which obtained a marked success, is by the Danish composer Lange-Müller.

The Musical Society of Rotterdam will shortly perform Handel's "Saul," with additional accompaniments by the well known composer F. Gernsheim, the Conductor of the Society.

Berlioz's great Te Deum, which was produced at the Church of Saint Eustache, Paris, in 1855, under the direction of its composer, and has never been heard since, is to be performed in the Cathedral of Bordeaux on the 5th inst. The band and chorus are to number 1,000.

The Association of Musicians in Paris, founded by Baron Taylor, celebrated the Feast of St. Cecilia, on the 22nd ult., by performing, at the Church of Saint Eustache, a mass by Méhul, which had never before been heard in Paris.

The Gold prize medal of the Belgian Académie des Sciences has been awarded to M. Michel Brenet, of Paris, for an essay "Etude antique sur la vie et les œuvres de Gretry."

On October 28, Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust" was given at the Châtelet in Paris for the thirty-eighth (and for the present) last time.

General Count Frederic von Redern, formerly Intendant-General of the Royal Court Music at Berlin, and himself a composer of some merit, died in the German capital on the 5th ult., aged eighty-one years.

L. Stasny, a celebrated composer of Dance music, and conductor of popular concerts at Frankfort, died recently in that town, aged sixty years.

A new comic opera by Theodore de Lajartie, called "Le Roi du Carreau," has been produced at the Novelty Theatre at Paris, and is said to have had a great success.

Herr C. G. Röder, founder and, until 1876, principal of the renowned music engraving and printing firm of the same name, died on October 29, at Gohlis, near Leipzig, aged 72 years.

We also deeply regret to announce the sudden death, on the 12th ult., of Monsieur J. L. Heugel, the head of the celebrated Parisian publishing firm of that name, and founder and director of our excellent contemporary Le Ménestrel.

F. A. Pott, who was known some time since as an excellent violin virtuoso, died lately at Graz, aged 77.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MUSICAL COPYRIGHT.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Allow me, on public grounds, to revert to a subject which has formerly been discussed in your columns, viz.—the bearing of the law of copyright in music.

Two Concerts were given lately in Hertford in connection with our local School of Art. Claims were made upon the committee immediately for "damages" to the amount of £14 for the performance of the duet "The moon has raised her lamp above," by Benedict; and of £6 for the solo "Yes, let me like a soldier fall," by Wallace—£20 in all, and the payment of the £6 was enforced on our solicitor advising us that we had no remedy.

Thus it will be seen that men are fined heavily for damaging a person whom they have really benefited. The performance of a song advertises it and directs attention to its merits in the most effective manner; therefore the act promotes the sale of that song and does good to the owner of the copyright. This is proved by the fact that music publishers, even of the highest rank, habitually send songs "with their compliments" to known singers, both professional and amateur, in order that they may be performed.

It is the opinion of musical men that Lord Folkestone's Act of 1882 fails because it is not retrospective, and may even increase the danger to the unsupervised.

At present the chief sufferers are those who get up small Concerts for charitable objects: the local amateurs, the country clergy, the poor governesses, and people who know nothing about the "local agent of the Copyright Protection Association," and who think merely to promote some charity.

For their benefit let me add no song may be performed without written permission, unless that fact be printed on the title page.

C. T. COBHAM.

[We gladly insert the foregoing communication from one who has unknowingly placed himself in the power of Mr. Harry Wall, as agent of the "Copyright Protection Society," not only as a caution to vocalists and concert-givers, but because it strengthens the request of many other correspondents to reprint, with additions, the names of those works which cannot be performed without permission: As far as we can ascertain, the following is a correct list of all the compositions which are under the control of Mr. Wall.—Ed. M.T.]

Any pieces from the following Operas:—

Wallace's "Maritana," Benedict's "Lily of Killarney," Balfe's "The Bohemian Girl," and "The Rose of Castile." "She wore a Wreath of Roses" (Knight), "Cracovienne" Polka (Wallace), "Will-o'-Wisp" (Cherry), "The Winds that waft my Sighs to thee" (Wallace), "By the sad Sea Waves" (Benedict), "Sweet and low" (Wallace), "Who's that tapping at the Garden Gate?"

In addition to the above, we notice in the last number of the Figaro:—

"The Bellringer" (Wallace), "Why do I weep for thee" (Wallace).

MODERN FUGUES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—There appears to be a common idea, even among musicians of standing, that the composing of Fugues at the present day is a sign of affectation, or, at best, of a wish to exhibit mere scholastic skill, and that this style of composition cannot now be the natural outcome of genuine musical feeling. Louis Ehlert in his "Letters on Music to a Lady," after speaking of such Fugues as form part of, and grow from, larger works, says respecting the composition of "detached Fugues": "The modern spirit is of so boundless, so desiring, so liberty-loving a nature; and the Fugue is so limited, so undesiring, so subject to the law!" and again, "We will abandon the pure art of Fugue to the academists, the lords of debit and credit, who have neither wish nor courage to be free: for what is freedom to those who were born in a cage? Let them flutter patiently on, they might break their necks outside, for their notions are far too tender." Of course, musical ideas and forms of expression naturally change to some extent as the different ages succeed each other; but it does not follow from this that a really musical Fugue cannot now be written; there is no reason to doubt that the Fugue is one of the best vehicles for expressing the musical feeling of several modern composers of note. The fact that many dry and merely learned Fugues (without even a melodious theme to begin with) are written now does not justify the feeling against modern Fugue composition in general. Dry Fugues have been, and will continue to be, written, but not by those composers to whom the splendid capabilities of this form for the expression of some of the grandest musical ideas have been revealed.—Yours truly,

E. W. HEALEY, Mus. Bac., Oxon.

CHEAP MUSIC BOOKS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In these days of amazingly cheap literature—when Messrs. Cassell, Ward & Lock, and other enterprising firms seem constantly endeavouring to surpass one another in cheapness of publications, as well as excellence of reading matter—I have often been surprised to think that no music publishing firms have ventured on such a course as so successfully pursued by the above and other houses. Grant that there are fewer readers of works on music and musical works, yet the very fact of such works being comparatively dear, is just the reason why music publishers should adopt a plan similar to Cassell, &c., and thus the more speedily exchange their book piles for cash. The last named firm has already shown that works on music can be issued in farts, at a few pence each, and prove a decided success.

A great number of works might be named, which ought to be, if possible, in the hands of all students of music; but, alas, they are not, for the simple reason that they cannot be bought at popular prices. What a vast amount of valuable knowledge would be brought within the reach of all were such works as the following issued in monthly numbers at one shilling each: say, Ouseley's Treatises on Harmony, Counterpoint, &c.; Macfarren's Elementary and advanced works on Harmony, &c.; Hullah's Lectures on Musical History; Dr. Grove's Dictionary, &c. Most of the great Symphonies (full score) could also be issued in the same way, also the full scores of the Oratorios, &c. Imagine the eager demand there would be for Gounod's "Redemption," the "Elijah," and other great works in sixpenny monthly numbers.

Much might be added in favour of such a plan, but I will forbear. It is, however, sincerely to be hoped that some one of our great music publishing firms will see its way to take the lead in this matter, others will then doubtless immediately follow suit.—Yours respectfully,

PETER COULSON EDWARDS.

"BAPTIE'S BIOGRAPHY OF MUSICIANS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Allow me to express my thanks for your candid and impartial notice of my "Handbook," and for drawing my attention to certain errors and omissions in connection with it. As you justly remark, it is difficult in a small volume to compile a work of the kind which will do anything like adequate justice to the artists noticed, and I would add it is equally difficult for even a careful person to avoid some errors, omissions, &c. The vocalists you name ought certainly to have been included. Their omission arises merely from inadvertence, and, should my work reach a second edition, it is probable it will contain an addenda comprising both those you mention and several other musicians I think it desirable to insert.

One word more. One of your correspondents, "R. Y.," attacks me for saying that Sir Robert Stewart is "Organist of St. Patrick's (National) Cathedral, Dublin," which, according to him, is wrong, and certainly he seems to prove his case. Whether there are two St. Patricks in Dublin I know not, but on referring to my book I find Sir R. Stewart stated there as "Organist of Trinity College Chapel, St. Patrick's; and Christ Church, Dublin," &c., which information I took from Reeves' "Musical Directory" for 1880, and accepted as correct, believing the information to be inspired by Sir Robert himself.

That these are faults in my work for which I am undoubtedly fairly responsible is clear, but it does appear a little hard to incur blame under such circumstances as the above.—I remain, faithfully yours,

D. BAP. IE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In answer to your correspondent "R. Y.," of October 1, I am quite sure Sir Robert Stewart is organist of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin. But just as the late Sir John Goss was, and as Dr. Stainer is (I believe) at St. Paul's Cathedral, London, on the foundation and a vicar-choral, so Sir Robert Stewart is on the foundation and a vicar-choral of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin. The corporation of "vicars-chorals" (sic) was established by Charles II. on his restoration. On the two beautiful stained-glass windows, erected at Sir Robert's own expense in St. Patrick's Cathedral, to the memory of Sir John Stevenson and that of Balfe, he is styled "one of the vicars-choral of this Cathedral."

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

P. Q.

THE EISTEDDFOD CANTATA COMPETITION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—May I be permitted to add a few words to the observations of your correspondents? I differ from "S. E." as to the qualities of the libretto. Librettos do not rank as classics, and great demands are not usually made of them, though of course the higher the style of versification they attain to, the better. The requirements of musical setting impose some degree of restriction on the spirit and form of poetry, and the thought of musical adaptation must, in my opinion, become a fetter in the higher walks of poetry.

There are one or two weak phrases in the soft exchange of sentiment between Greenhwyford and Maldwyn, but I find the heroic portion which precedes of a decidedly vigorous character, and the rest is not inferior. I was glad to note the distinction between the naive form of the ballad and the legendary form of the recitative kept in view for musical purposes.

I wished to retain a few numbers for revision at the last moment, and thus refrained from competition, but not from the defects of the libretto.—I am, &c.,

Stroud.

VITE VIA VIRTUS.

P.S.—I have re-read portions of the libretto, and really can take no exception to any of them.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

. Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

R. C. HOPE.—The grievance complained of by our correspondent has been so often mentioned in THE MUSICAL TIMES that we cannot return to the subject.

Will "An Amateur Organist" favour us with his name and address—not for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith?

JOHN YATES.—All our correspondent's notices were sent too late for the November number.

J. L. H.—It is quite "right" to soften the effect of passing from key to key by a connecting modulation, but pianists rarely do so.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BATH.—On Saturday, the 10th ult., the first of a new series of Popular Concerts was held at the Pump Room, under the direction of Mr. W. Salmon. The orchestral selections were good and well rendered; the Conductors being Mr. W. Salmon and M. Lutzen. Signor Uricio gave a solo on the euphonium, and Mrs. Alfred Morris (who sang with much expression) was the vocalist.

BELFAST.—The members of the Choral Association gave the second Subscription Concert of the season on the 16th ult., in the Ulster Hall. The solo vocalists were Miss Marianne Fenna, Mr. Herbert Haigh, and Signor Foll. Mr. W. H. Madye played a selection of music on the Muehland organ, displaying its powers to the greatest advantage. The choir, under the direction of Mr. Kempton, showed decided improvement. The pianoforte accompaniments to the solos were played by Mr. Jude and Mr. C. H. Moss, the accompanist to the Association.

BIRMINGHAM.—The Band and Chorus of the Musical Association (which numbers upwards of 350) gave their first Concert on the 3rd ult., in the Town Hall, which was filled to overflowing. Mendelssohn's Elijah (1st part) and Hear my Prayer were given, the principal vocalists being Miss H. Johnson, Mrs. Worton Fielding, Mr. C. B. Bragg, and Mr. Bingley Shaw.—On the 10th ult., the second part of Elijah and Loreley were given, with full band and chorus, the soloists being Miss Johnson, Mrs. Fielding, Mr. B. Clarke, and Mr. Bingley Shaw. Mrs. T. F. James, Miss Oakley, and Mr. Mortimer sang in the Quartets; Mr. C. J. Stevens conducted with ability; and Mr. Stimpson presided at the Organ.—The Concert on the 17th ult. was Miscellaneous, the artists being Miss Emma Beasley, Miss Ameris, and Signor Ria (vocalists); Mr. Rickard (piano); and Mr. Collard (flute).

BRECHIN, N.B.—The new organ erected in the City Road United Presbyterian Church, by Wadsworth, of Manchester, was opened on the 2nd ult. by Mr. C. J. Smith, of Forfar. The Brechin Amateur Musical Society gave an excellent rendering of some vocal music, the programme being selected from the works of the best composers.

BRIGHTON.—The second of the Aquarium Orchestral Concerts was given on the 10th ult., before a large audience. The programme was well selected, and admirably rendered, the Overture to William Tell and a concert overture, "A Dream of Happiness," by C. E. Stephens, being received with the greatest enthusiasm. The vocalist was Miss Damian, who was highly successful in all her songs. Mr. Kube's pianoforte solos were also thoroughly appreciated. Mr. Greebe led the band and Mr. J. Greebe conducted.—On Thursday evening, the 22nd ult., Miss Annie Tate, R.A.M., gave her annual ballad Concert at the Royal Pavilion, assisted by the following artists: Miss Jeanie Rosse, Miss Brooke, Mr. E. Harper, Signor Isidore De Lara, Mr. Alfred Moore, vocalists: solo harp, Mr. Edwin Smith; solo violin, Mr. W. M. Quirke; solo piano, Signorina De Nigris; Conductor, Mr. H. S. Cooke. There was a large audience, and the Concert was in every respect a decided success.

BLACKBURN.—On Monday evening, October 29, the members of the Choral and Orchestral Union gave a performance of Bennett's May Queen, and Rossini's Maestro Martino in the Victoria Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. Bridson. Herr Karl Meyer led the band, Mr. T. S. Hayward accompanied, and Mr. George Mellor conducted. The works were excellently rendered.—On Wednesday evening, the 7th ult., Dr. Gladstone's Oratorio Philippi was given at St. Peter's Church by the members of the choir, assisted by ladies and gentlemen of local note in the town. Mr. W. C. Wood was the organist of the church, presided at the organ, and Dr. Gladstone conducted. The choruses were exceedingly well sung.

BOGNOR.—A successful Concert was given on Wednesday, October 31. The principal vocalists were Mr. and Mrs. Seymour Kelly, Miss E. Elliott, R.A.M., and Messrs. C. E. Pillow and George Fielder, assisted by several amateurs. The glees and part-songs were sung by a choir of twenty-six voices, under the conductorship of Mr. Seymour Kelly, of Chichester Cathedral, who deserves great credit for the admirable manner in which they were rendered. Miss Marie Osmond acted as accompanist with marked ability.

BURY.—The fifth of a series of Concerts for the workpeople was given, on the 3rd ult., in the Temperance Hall. Special arrangements had been made with Mr. J. H. Greenwood, of Facit, for his Concert party to appear, and the Whitworth Glee party also assisted. The vocalist, Miss Hardman, displayed a soprano voice of excellent quality, and was highly successful in all her songs, several being redemanded.

CHEL TENHAM.—The concluding service of the Dedication Festival of All Saints' Church was held on the 8th ult. The choir was augmented by the members of the Tewkesbury and Gloucester Cathedral choirs. Mr. Pollock, R.A.M., provided a small brass band, which was stationed in the organ chamber. Frost's Service in D was used, the band parts having been effectively arranged by Mr. von Holst, the Organist. The verse parts were sung by Masters Breeze and Walton, and Messrs. Bloxsome, Burge, and Forty. The Anthem was Gounod's Ave Maria, the verses being sung by band accompaniments as at the Tewkesbury Festival. The Conductors were Mr. C. L. Williams, Mus. Bac., Organist of Gloucester Cathedral, Mr. Forty and Mr. Hemingway, F.C.O., Organist of Tewkesbury Abbey.

CROYDON.—A Concert was given, on Tuesday, October 30, in the School-room of George Street Congregational Church. The programme included Trios for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, well rendered by Miss Johns, Mr. T. Johns, and Mr. Suggate. The vocalists were Miss Bessie Diamond, Miss May Lee, Mr. H. Gent, and Mr. Langman. Miss Diamond achieved a marked success in Faulstich's Les Rameaux, with organ, violin, and cello accompaniment. Miss May Lee gave in a pleasing manner "The New Kingdom," Mr. Gent sang "Shall love e'er die" with good expression, and Mr. Langman's voice was heard to great advantage in "The devout Lover" and "The King and Minstrel." The Concert was a great success.

DARTFORD.—Mr. Musgrave Tufnail (Gold Medalist, R.A.M.) gave his first benefit Concert on Wednesday, the 7th ult., at the Victoria Rooms. An excellent programme was well performed by Mr. Tufnail and some fellow students of the Academy. A MS. trio, from The Bride of Cambray (W. G. Wood), was extremely well sung by Mme. Wilson-Osman, Miss Rees, and Mr. Tufnail. Mr. Dyved Lewis, in a charming song by Pissuti, "Queen of the Earth," gained great applause. Mr. Tufnail was highly successful in his songs "Does my love know" (E. Hutton), and the "Toreador's Song" from Carmen, Miss Rees and Miss Jones rendering most efficient aid. Mr. Alfred Izard and Mr. Wiggins were able accompanists.

DERBY.—Gounod's Redemption was performed by the Choral Union on the 13th ult. The Drill Hall was occupied by an audience which filled every part of the building, and the performance was followed with the utmost attention. The rendering of the work, under the conductorship of Mr. Trimnell, was admirable; band and chorus being alike excellent. The solos were safe in the experienced hands of Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Blower, and Mr. F. King; and the organ part was well played by Mr. S. Neville Cox.

DUNDEE.—A farewell Organ Recital was given by Mr. A. J. Towsey, at St. Paul's Church, on September 7, before a large audience. A well-selected programme of classical music was excellently performed and highly appreciated. A presentation, on his retirement from St. Paul's Church, was made to Mr. Towsey on the same evening, Mr. Charles Statham expressing much regret at his resignation of the office of Organist, which he had held with much credit to himself for so many years. The testimonial consisted of a gold watch bearing Mr. Towsey's monogram, with the following inscription: "Presented to Mr. A. J. Towsey by the members and ex-members of St. Paul's Choir, as a token of sincere regard. Dunedin, 17th September, 1883."

DUNBAR, N.B.—On Thursday, the 15th ult., a successful Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms, under the direction of Mr. F. W. Bridgeman, of Edinburgh. The artists were Miss C. D. Hamilton, Mr. T. E. Gladhill, and Mr. T. Walker. There was a large and appreciative audience.

EASTBOURNE.—The Musical Society commenced its season, on the 12th ult., with a performance of Haydn's Creation, under the conductorship of Dr. Sangster. The solo vocalists were Madame Catherine Penna, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Signor Villa. Mr. Coles, F.C.O., ably presided at the pianoforte, and an orchestra of twenty-one performers was efficiently led by Mr. E. Halfpenny. The choruses were well sung, giving evidence of careful training, and the performance was in every respect a decided success.

EPSON.—A very successful Concert was given at the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 15th ult. The vocalists were Miss Damian, Miss De Fonblanque, Mr. Brown Taylor, Plater, and Horscroft (Glee Union) and M. Albert (violinello). Miss De Fonblanque and Miss Damian were highly successful in their songs, many being rapturously encored. Mr. Horscroft's rendering of "Anchored," by M. Watson, was thoroughly appreciated. The Glee Union sang with much precision and taste, and M. Albert played a solo of his own composition and several other pieces with fluent execution.

FROME.—A Musical Service was given at the Wesley Chapel on the 22nd ult., when selections from Mendelssohn's Elijah and Handel's Messiah were excellently rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Marie Gane, Mrs. A. H. Coombs, Miss Prawl, Miss Harvey, Mr. W. B. Harvey, Mr. Trotman, Mr. F. C. Tucker, Mr. J. Lewis, and Mr. M. Cogswell. The choir, strengthened for the occasion, was conducted by Mr. Harvey, and Mr. T. Grant presided at the organ.

GRAHAMSTOWN.—At the opening of St. Aidan's College Chapel, Pontifical High Mass was celebrated with due solemnity, the music—Haydn's Third or "Imperial" Mass—being excellently sung by a well trained choir and the following soloists: Miss De Beer, Miss Grace Davies, Mrs. Bayne, Miss Bayne, Miss Tidmarsh, Mr. Price, and Mr. Kay. There was an efficient orchestra, and Mr. Winny presided at the pianoforte.

GREENWICH.—The fifth of the new series of "Free Evenings" was given in the Lecture Hall, on Thursday, the 27th ult. The principal vocalists—Miss Millie Warne, Miss Alice Earle, Miss Ellen Luck, Mr. D'Arcy Ferris and Mr. Wellesley Lake—were highly effective in all their songs, and Miss Clara Walker's performance of a Tarantella by Claudet was one of the great successes of the evening. Special mention must also be made of the execution of a piece for the left hand only by Miss Macfarlane, and of a solo for the violin by Mr. Master E. J. Atkinson. Some of the songs were Miss Elise Worth, Miss Clara Walker, in consequence of an injury to the right hand of Miss Macfarlane, who was announced as the accompanist of the evening. Mr. Samuel Sims occupied the chair, and made an excellent speech between the parts.—The last but one of a series of Ballad Concerts was given at the Lecture Hall, on the 12th ult., under the direction of Mr. Ernest Williams. The vocalists were Miss Elise Worth, Miss Alice Keen, Signor Odoardo Barri, and Mr. E. A. Williams; violin, Herr Koenig; pianoforte and accompanist, Herr Rudolf Koenig. A feature in the programme was the rendering of Signor Barri's song, "No surrender," by Mr. Williams, and the vocal selections by all the other singers elicited warm and well deserved applause.

HANLEY.—An evening Concert was given in the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 8th ult., when the following artists took part: Mrs. Roberts, Mr. Arthur H. Malkin, and Mr. Wood (vocalists), Mr. Bedall (solo violin), and Mr. Nixon (accompanist), all of whom were highly successful.

HERDEN BRIDGE.—The annual Soiree of the Co-operative Society took place on the 10th ult. Mr. J. H. Greenwood's Concert party was engaged for the occasion, and gave every satisfaction, especially Miss Hardman, who was enthusiastically received.

HERNE BAY.—A very successful performance of Van Bree's Cantata St. Cecilia's Day, was given, on the 22nd ult., in the Parochial Room, under the conductorship of Mr. E. A. Crutenden. Miss Collard presided at the pianoforte, and Miss Nellie Hollands at the American Organ. The solos were most efficiently rendered by Miss Maude Kelly, who possesses an excellent soprano voice. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous.

HUDDERSFIELD.—The first Concert of the Glee and Madrigal Society for the present season was given in the Town Hall, on the 9th ult. The augmented choir of the Society was heard to the utmost advantage in several madrigals and part-songs—Mackenzie's choral piece from Colomba, "Let the past be dead," and Blumenthal's "Gather ye rosebuds," being amongst the most attractive items. The solo vocalists, Miss Amblar and Mr. Oswald, received several encores; and the Concert, which was conducted by Mr. Marshall, was a most successful one. The choruses were ably accompanied on the pianoforte and organ by Mr. Marshall's two sons.—On the 13th ult., an Organ Recital was given in the Fine Art Exhibition by Mr. J. R. Brooke, Organist to the Earl of Carlisle, Castle Howard. An excellent selection of music from the works of Bach, Wely, Handel, Mendelssohn, Strals, Clark, &c., was well rendered by Mr. Joe Hirst was the vocalist and gave Mendelssohn's "If with all your hearts" and Handel's "But thou didst not leave" and "Total Eclipse" with great taste and judgment.

HULL.—A Concert, in aid of the Cambridge Fund for Old and Disabled Soldiers, was given at the Public Rooms, Jarratt Street, on the 15th ult., under the direction of Herr R. Muller. The solo vocalists were Miss Farbein, Miss Thornham, Mr. C. Moxon, and Mr. Oldroyd. Mozart's Twelfth Mass formed the principal item in the programme. Mr. Bregazzi presided at the organ.

HURSTPIERCE.—An Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church, on the 17th ult., by the Organist, Mr. H. C. Young, B.A. The programme included choruses and other movements from the works of Handel, Smart, V. Novello, Gounod, Beethoven, and Lefebure-Wely.

IPSWICH.—Mr. James Price gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Public Hall, on October 25, before an audience which, considering the few who attended his performance only twelve months ago, was highly encouraging. The programme contained works by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schubert, Schumann, and Henselt, all of which were excellently rendered and thoroughly appreciated. The long selection from Chopin was received with marked favour.

KNOTTINGLEY.—The first Rehearsal by the members of the newly formed Choral Society took place in the Congregational Schoolroom, on Tuesday evening, the 20th ult. The work chosen was The Messiah; and the manner in which it was rendered was such as to give credit to the success of the Society. Mr. J. H. Eyre, of Doncaster, has been appointed Conductor; and under his tuition there is no doubt that the Society will supply a want which has long been felt in the neighbourhood. M. Stainsby, Esq., a gentleman well known as being always willing to help forward anything for the welfare of the public, has been appointed President.

LEEDS.—On Saturday evening, October 27, the Council Chamber in the Town Hall was the scene of a very interesting incident. Prior to the commencement of the Free Organ Recital, Dr. Sparks was presented with a very pleasing token of the esteem in which he is held by his numerous pupils. The presentation took the form of a handsome album, which had been subscribed for by the Borough Organist's past and present pupils, many of whose portraits grace its pages. This has been the first of a series of similar presentations. Mr. Ash, a well-known Wakefield amateur musician. At the presentation of the album to the Rev. Canon Bullock, Vicar of Holy Trinity (who presided), the Rev. Dr. Levy, the Jewish Rabbi, and others. The rev. Chairman, in presenting the birthday token, spoke in the highest terms of the services rendered to the town by Dr. Sparks, and the present was duly acknowledged by the recipient, who was received with cordial applause. After this the Free Organ Recital commenced, before a very full audience, attracted by the announcement that the programme was to consist wholly of reminiscences of the Leeds Musical Festival. The selection included the March and Chorus "Gloria Patri" from Mr. Barnby's 97th Psalm; the Allegretto from the Lobgesang of Mendelssohn; "O rest in the Lord" and the grand chorus "Thanks be to God," from Elijah; the aria "What though I trace," from Handel's Solomon; and, by particular request, the "War March of Priests" in Athalie. The most interesting number, however, was the selection from The World's End, which comprised four of its principal portions. All these pieces were very finely rendered, and elicited warm and well-deserved applause.

LUTON.—The Amateur Musical Society gave an excellent rendering of Mr. W. Carter's Cantata Placidia, the Christian Martyr, before a crowded audience, in the Town Hall, on the 13th ult. The principal soloists were Miss Pamela Winter, Mr. Elton Thomas, Mr. C. W. Fredericks, and Mr. Frank May, all of whom were highly successful. The parts of "Rufus" and "Nero" were ably sustained by Mr. John Spencer and Mr. W. Lillis respectively. The choruses were well sung, and an efficient band, under the leadership of Mr. T. Cokayne, played the instrumental music, the Overture and March being spiritedly rendered by Mr. A. F. Gostelow, assisted at the piano by Mr. H. Towle. It was followed by a miscellaneous selection, in which the principal singers took part with great success. Mr. F. Gostelow contributed a pianoforte solo, which was encored. Mr. H. Towle conducted.

MAIDSTONE.—On Friday, the 2nd ult., an Organ Recital was given at the Parish Church, by the Organist, Mr. S. Bath. The programme was selected from the works of Bach, Sterndale Bennett, Mendelssohn, Henry Smart, and Batside.

MILTON-NEXT-GRAVESEND.—On Sunday, October 28, special Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at Holy Trinity Church. At early celebration Tour's Service in F was sung, under the direction of Mr. C. R. Green, the Organist. The Procession at 11 a.m. was led by the Dean Alford's hymn "Come, ye thankful people, come," and the Anthem "Give unto the Lord," Dr. Bridge. In the evening the Processional "Praise, O praise our God and King," and the Anthem "Blessed be the Name of the Lord," Gadsby, were finely rendered by the choir. Albert Lowe's Harvest Carol "Holy is the seed-time," was sung before the sermon both in the morning and evening, and Tallis's Festal Responsory was used in the evening. Mr. John Shawcross preached by the Rev. George Barr and the Rev. James Hunt. The Offertories were for the new Organ Fund and Gravesend Infirmary.

MOSSLEY.—On Sunday, the 18th ult., the Annual Sermons in connection with St. Joseph's Cathedral Chapel were preached, morning and evening, by Dr. Vaughan, Bishop of Salford, Father Kaas, resident priest, taking part in the services. High Mass was celebrated at 11 a.m., the music selected for the occasion being Weber's Mass in G, which was well rendered by the choir, the soprano part being admirably given by Mrs. Berry. Miss L. Marshall, and Mr. John Shawcross. Mr. Meredith was also highly efficient in their solos. Mr. James Kane presided at the organ, and Mr. T. Kane conducted.

READING.—Mr. H. J. Hendy's annual Concert was given at the Early Schools, on the 13th ult., with much success. The principal vocalists were Miss Florence Wyldford, Madame Leonora Russell, and Miss Josephine Fulham, all of whom were highly successful. Several of their songs being encored. Weber's "Moto Continuo" was played on the pianoforte by Mr. Hendy, and there were also some orchestral and choral pieces.

SOUTHAMPTON.—On October 25, the Cantata Sennacherib, written by Dr. Arnold for the recent Gloucester Festival, was performed at the Handel and Haydn Concert, with marked success at the Starley Hall. The principal vocalists were the same as those engaged in the rendering of the work at Winchester, and all their solos were received with unanimous applause. The chorus of 150 voices was thoroughly efficient, and the Composer, who conducted, received quite an ovation at the conclusion of the performance. The London newspaper writers seem to have all in general the opinion that John the Baptist, Independent, for, in appealing from them to the public, it is said the organist of Winchester Cathedral "shows a moral courage which some of his critics might well envy."—A sacred Concert was given at the Hartley Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 13th ult., in aid of the Southampton Sunday School Union. The principal item in the programme was Root's Cantata Under the Palms, the choruses in which were well sung by a choir of 270 voices, selected from the affiliated schools of the Union. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Mackey, Miss Lottie West, Mr. J. T. Bond, and Mr. Worrall. Mr. R. Pim conducted, Mr. J. D. Wilson led the band, Mr. E. W. Lucas presided at the pianoforte and Miss K. Stephens at the harmonium. The work was very efficiently rendered.

WARF.—The fifth Organ Recital of the present series was given in the Parish Church, on Tuesday, October 30, by Mr. H. C. Tonking, and Mr. James L. Gregory, F.C.O., Organist of the Church. An admirably arranged programme, excellently performed, gave great pleasure to a large audience.

WINCHESTER.—The almost unanimous verdict of the press upon Dr. Arnold's Cantata Sennacherib when produced at the recent Gloucester Festival was reversed by October 26, by the audience at the Guildhall in the city at the Cathedral of which the composer is Organist. The Hampshire Chronicle says that Dr. Arnold was greeted with the most flattering marks of approbation, and that his work was received with enthusiasm throughout. The soprano solo "O Lord, Thou art great," the duet "O House of Jacob," the chorus "The soul in anguish," the song "Where are the gods?" (encored), and the concluding chorus were especially successful. In recording the triumphant reception of the Cantata, the journal from which we derive our information speaks with much contempt of the "hasty and flippant remarks made on it by some of the leading papers" on its first performance at Gloucester. Full justice, we are told, was done to the solo music by Mdle. Avigliana, Messrs. H. Kearton and W. H. Breerton.

WORCESTER.—The Philharmonic Society gave its first Concert of the tenth season, the 13th ult., at the Public Hall. The original programme was an interesting one, comprising excerpts from Mendelssohn's First Quartet in E flat, Beethoven's Fifth in A, and Mozart's No. 1 in G, by Mr. Burnett's Quartet party; madrigals and part-songs by John Barnett, Hatton, and Pinsuti, for the choir, and a variety of songs by Miss Clara Leighton and Mr. J. W. Turner. The vocal music was highly effective, but much disappointment was felt by the non-arrival of the second violinist, Mr. Frye Parker. All was, however, well done, for a copy of Beethoven's Serenade Trio having been procured from a well-known amateur in the neighbourhood, Mr. Burnett and his two colleagues, Mr. Hill and Mr. Whitehouse, gave the work in two portions in as creditable a manner as could be expected under the circumstances. Mr. Burnett's solo was a not very interesting Sonata in D by Rust, consisting only of two movements repeated in a somewhat condensed form. Mr. Whitehouse's cello solo was Schubert's Prayer, and a Gavotte by Popper, the latter being encored. Mr. Donce's body of singers were again, as always, refreshing to hear, both as regards tone, attack, and light and shade. Indeed, the subscribers to these Concerts would have been glad had a larger portion of the programme been entrusted to them, but with the Festival in view, much cannot be expected from the choir this season.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Arthur J. Randall, Organist and Choirmaster to Trinity Methodist New Connection Church, Forest Hill.—Mr. Charles Small, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Saviour's, Denmark Park.—Mr. B. Fearnside, Organist and Choirmaster to Prittlewell Church, Southend, Essex.—Mr. Frederic J. Vaughan, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Buckden, Huntingdon.—Mr. Arthur C. CAUTION—THE ONLY LEGAL—CAUTION

FOR

ATTACHING ORGAN PEDALS
TO A PIANOFORTE

WHICH ACTION HE HAS, AFTER CONTINUED STUDY, BROUGHT TO PERFECTION, AND GAINED THE APPROVAL OF HER MAJESTY'S COMMISSIONERS OF PATENTS.

The organ is the instrument

I long did wish to play,

But all in vain I tendered

My hours of useless train;

But having now succeeded

That instrument to play,

It is with tones of gladness

My vow of thanks I pay

To Ainsworth's Patent Action,

And Organ Pedals too,

To these success be ever

For they have brought me through;

No trouble with the Action—

The Pedals ever true,

A work of true "Perfection"

Is what I quote to you.

On thee, O King of Instruments,

To those who would XL (excel)

Why Ainsworth's Patent Action

IS SURE TO SERVE THEM WELL.

HIGHEST TESTIMONIALS ARE BEING CONTINUALLY RECEIVED.

J. AINSWORTH

Inventor and Patentee of the above, also Sole Proprietor, begs to draw the attention of the musical profession and trade to the fact that (having access to the finest and most improved machinery of the present day) the workmanship of Pedals and Action supplied by him is that which is sure to command favour.

Agents are required in every Town. Apply to the Inventor and Patentee as below.

The Pedals and Patent Action supplied by the above well-known Inventor are giving a great impetus to the present generation of Organists and Students in the art of Pedalling, and, as it is well known that most, if not all, of our great Organ Players had the advantage of a Pianoforte with Pedals attached by the old and cumbersome roller-board system, it should be known that by this new invention the Pedals can be purchased and attached at a small cost with a Mahogany Action which is perfectly noiseless, and without any springs or intricate parts to get out of repair. Organ music can thus be enjoyed and practised without the usual trouble and expense of an Organ blower. This invention is quite different to any other Patent Action, and, being the most recent, it is as great an improvement over others as the Steam Engine is over the old Stage Coach.

Send to the Inventor, as below, for the Drawings and Prices to the Profession and Trade.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE says:—

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. WM. CHINNOCK DYER'S Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ. "It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils."

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, is easily attached to any Pianoforte. £ 8.

Those who already have a set of Pedals can be supplied with the PATENT ACTION only, price £4 4s.

ADDRESS—WM. CHINNOCK DYER,

INVENTOR AND PATENTEE,

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

To show the popularity gained by this invention, and the way it is making in the houses of organists and students, the last Patent Action sent out previous to March 1 was numbered 2,024; thus it will be seen that the turn-out for six months as above will give a total of over 4,000 per annum.

CAUTION.—This being the latest Patent Pedal Action, intending purchasers should note that this is the most perfect and reliable, as it contains every improvement; and being manufactured solely of well-seasoned mahogany, carefully bushed with red cloth, will continue to give the very best Pedal practice to Organists and Students.

Kindly read the testimonial above. Before purchasing send to the Inventor for the drawings and prices of this the most recent Patent Pedal Action.

Organists should recommend these Pedals and Patent Action to their Pupils.

THIRTY-FOUR ORIGINAL TUNES

(NOW FIRST PUBLISHED).

COMPOSED BY

MRS. MOUNSEY BARTHOLOMEW,

Associate of the Philharmonic Society; and Organist at St. Vedast's, near Chapside.

"This book will be found to be of considerable interest to those in search of good and attractive tunes to words already well known—in fact, it is some time since we have seen a collection by a single composer of such uniform merit. The modulations are frequently to keys beyond the range generally adopted in this style of music, but they are always managed with musicianly skill, and, therefore, are apparently natural and easy. The ideas are well expressed, and the harmonies are vocal and interesting. We can heartily recommend this little work to all Church musicians."—Musical Times.

"Are very excellent as musical compositions, and will in many cases prove a welcome change from the familiar tunes which have become wearisome from constant repetition."—Graphic.

"The name of Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew is a guarantee of the excellence of this collection. In her preface the composer admits to fifty years of active professional life; and it is no small thing to find, after so long a period, that this eminent lady's ideas are still fresh, and her taste and judgment unimpeachable."—The Queen.

"An announcement of thirty-four original tunes, by Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew, will be warmly welcomed in the large circle of those who are aware of her eminent musical ability, and of the powers of composition she has displayed in past years. The tunes are set to favourite hymns by Milton, Heber, Montgomery, Keble, Bonar, Elliott, &c., and the compositions are all smooth and delicious in their melody and rich harmonies—some, indeed, being charming."—Ecclesiastical Gazette.

"Musicians cannot but hail with satisfaction the small volume put forth by Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew, with the simple and unpretentious title of 'Thirty-four Original Tunes.' Originality of thought and design are displayed throughout, and we would strongly commend these tunes to the attention of choirmasters and others."—City Press.

"The gifted composer has thoroughly studied the spirit of the words before writing, and we think she has succeeded in her interpretation, and attained better than average results."—Church Times.

"Many are admirable examples of what a hymn-tune should be—bright or sad, as the sentiment of the verse requires, but never flippant or secular: the collection has, therefore, high average merit."—Musical Opinion.

SIX CHRISTMAS CAROLS

BY

FRANK J. SAWYER, MUS. DOC., OXON., F.C.O.

3RD EDITION IN THE PRESS.

"Mr. Sawyer's Carols are as quaint and full of Christmas' as any we have seen for a long time. The store is large, but it cannot be too large so long as the quality is kept up; and these six are certainly first rate." Musical Standard.

"Praise must be awarded these fine conceptions. They display originality and good taste, on ground somewhat well trodden, and where temptations towards familiarity are not wanting. The best of the series are perhaps the pious lullaby 'Rocking so slowly,' and the quaint strain 'The Three wise Kings of the Rhine.'"—St. Cecilia Magazine.

2. In excelsis gloria } (Second Thousand).

The above Anthems are from Mr. Crament's "Six Anthems" (2s. net). Composed for the choir of the English Church, Berlin, and dedicated by special permission to H.R. and I. Highness the Crown Princess of the German Empire.

EXTRACTS FROM REVIEWS.

"A thoroughly good collection, full of good music, and worthy of a place in the libraries of our Cathedrals. We shall be glad to see further efforts from this composer."—Church Times.

"They are one and all well written and tuneful. . . . The collection may be fairly pronounced to be above the average of such publications. In these Six Anthems we find evidences of much careful and thoughtful work."—Musical Times.

"The music is tuneful, and the endeavours to draw the distinction between supplication and thanksgiving are clever."—Athenaeum.

"Rarely does so much fresh and bright material come to us in the shape of Anthems. . . . All these Anthems contain short solos, and the voices require to be efficient to do the music justice; but any well-trained choir, we feel sure, would take pleasure in singing Mr. Crament's music."—Choir.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

NEW PART-SONG. PRICE 3D.

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"This Part-Song, written for, and dedicated to, the Kyrie Society is laid out in Mr. Gaul's very best manner, and while recalling, for beautiful effects, his elegant Part-Song 'The Silent Land,' the resemblance begins and ends there. Mr. Gaul knows to the very letter the capabilities of the voices he writes for, and one is peculiarly safe, even after a single experience only, in predicting a widespread popularity to 'The Children's Hour.'"—Birmingham Daily Mail.

EUDORA

OR, THE BRIDE OF THE GREEK ISLE
A DRAMATIC IDYL

FOR

SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

WILLIAM CRESER, Mus. Doc., OXON.

"There are many touches of melody and brightness and powerfully concerted passages."—Leeds Mercury.

"The chorus for women's voices only, 'Gloomy lies the shore,' is not merely an attempt, but a successful adaptation of music to the spirit of the words. Not the least important part of 'Eudora' is its orchestration."—Yorkshire Post.

"The music has a charming freshness which, combined to the touching story of the book, cannot but be thoroughly admired. It is a clever production, and the composer, it is evident, has a vigorous comprehension of dramatic effect."—Newcastle Daily Chronicle.

THE HOLY CITY

A SACRED CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The Holy City is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

IMPORTANT to all TEACHERS of the PIANO-FORTE.

THE old method of teaching Music is now entirely superseded by a far more excellent method, which claims to be the only correct and reasonable method for teaching Pianoforte-playing. Mr. Felix Sommer, one of the most efficient music-masters in the neighbourhood of London, writes as follows concerning this NEW PIANO-FORTE TUTOR. (For particulars see below.)

"Sutton Lane, Chiswick, October 30, 1883.

"Dear Herr Hoering,—I am very much obliged to you for your pamphlets and specimen copy of 'Tutor.' I have only had time to look rapidly through the latter, but I have seen sufficient to show me that it contains everything you claim for it; and I shall cordially recommend it as far as it may be in my power. It is conscientious, and thoroughly musicianlike, and I feel quite sure that it will be much appreciated by the majority of the musical profession."

Now ready.

BOOKS I. and II. of A. HOERING'S NEW METHOD

FOR THE PIANOFORTE, on an entirely new principle:—

OPINIONS FROM PROFESSIONALS.

"I like it immensely."

"An excellent method, and worthy of all teachers' notice."

"I find your method excellent."

"Infinitely superior to all I have tried before."

"I think your system wonderfully good, and just the thing that was wanted."

"Comparison only shows the merits of your system to greater advantage."

THE ART OF PLAYING AT SIGHT. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF.

"The author believes his system to be infallible; after a fair trial, we must say, we believe so too."

"We have almost practised our finger-ends off, but could never read half-a-dozen bars correctly. The few hints in this little manual have shown us the way to accomplish it."

LITTLE DIFFICULTIES WHICH OCCUR IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING, ILLUSTRATED AND EXPLAINED.

By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF. Price 1s.

"The little difficulties which occur to the average player, and which make playing so irksome, are here fully illustrated and explained. It is astonishing what an amount of information is conveyed in a small compass."

HOW TO FORM AND TRAIN A VILLAGE CHOIR.
